Since March Halifax has been courting Russia for an Anglo-French-Soviet alliance, if not with Poland then without her (though her at least passive acquiescence to any arrangement would have to be obtained). The British and French missions to Moscow proceed into August, but the negotiations bog down especially on the question of Poland's role. The British and French give their OK to the possible movement of Soviet troops through Poland in a "protector" role in the case of German-Polish war. But Poland absolutely refuses any such deal. It is clear that time is running out, especially as Stalin—distrustful, with reason, of the Western Powers, and having given a series of diplomatic "hints" for months previous—begins to eye Hitler favorably, and vice-versa. Stalin would like to see a war of attrition between Germany and the West without his involvement, so that he could move in and pick up the pieces after the combattants had bled themselves dry. Hitler would like to have his hands freed in the East, after a defeat of Poland, by an accomodation with Stalin. Ideally, he hopes that such an accomodation will shock the Western Powers into thinking twice about their apparent plans for what would then amount to a one-front Western war with Germany. In this way Hitler hopes to prevent a general European war.

Roosevelt and the Attempt at an Anglo-French-Soviet Alliance

American Ambassador Bullitt at Paris was not enthusiastic about the Anglo-French attempt to conclude an alliance with the Soviet Union. He was inclined to agree with the hostile Polish attitude toward Russia. Bullitt had been American Ambassador at Moscow from 1933 to 1936, and he had few illusions about the Soviet Union. He suggested in his final report from Moscow on April 20, 1936, that the Russian standard of living was possibly lower than that of any other country in the world. He reported that the Bulgarian Comintern leader, Dimitrov, had admitted that Soviet popular front and collective security tactics were aimed at undermining the foreign capitalist systems. He insisted that relations of sincere friendship between the Soviet Union and the United States were an impossibility. He admitted that a conflict between Germany and France would expose Europe to the danger of Communist domination. He believed that it was worth taking this risk in order to destroy Germany, but he was fully aware of the danger involved.

President Roosevelt was aware that economic and social conditions in Germany were far superior to those in the Soviet Union. Ambassador Joseph E. Davies, who succeeded Bullitt at Moscow, reported to Roosevelt on April 1, 1938, that the terror in Russia was "a horrifying fact." Davies also complained about the gigantic Soviet expenditures on armaments, and he reported that about 25% of the total Soviet national income in 1937 was spent on defense, compared to 10% in Germany. Davies reported that Stalin, in a letter to Pravda on February 14, 1938, had confirmed his intention to spread the Communist system throughout the world. Stalin promised that the Soviet Government would work with foreign Communists to achieve this goal. He concluded his letter by stating: "I wish very much . . . that there were no longer on earth such unpleasant things as a capitalistic environment, the danger of a military attack, the danger of the restoration of capitalism, and so on." Davies mentioned that General Ernst Koestring, the veteran German military attache in the Soviet Union, continued to hold a high opinion of the Red Army despite the gigantic purges of 1937 in the Russian military services. Davies concluded that the Soviet Union could best be described as "a terrible tyranny." The presentation of these reports did not prompt President Roosevelt to withdraw the statement he had made in his major address at Chicago on October 6, 1937, that the Soviet Union was one of the peace-loving nations of the world. Roosevelt was fully aware of the danger from Communism, but he believed that this consideration was unimportant compared to his preferred objective of destroying National Socialist Germany.

Premier Daladier of France would have been furious had he known that Kennard was sabotaging British pressure on Poland with the argument that American sensibilities had to be taken into account. He told American Ambassador Bullitt at Paris on August 18th that he was shocked and angered by the "violence" with which Lukasiewicz and Beck had rejected Soviet aid to Poland. Daladier claimed that it would be easy to internationalize Soviet aid to the Poles by sending two French and one British divisions to Poland by way of Russia. Daladier repeated to Bullitt three times with increasing emphasis that he would not send a single French peasant to give his life for Poland if the Poles rejected Russian aid.

Bullitt was alarmed by this revelation of what he considered a violently anti-Polish reaction on the part of Daladier. He had applied pressure for months on Daladier and Alexis Leger, the Secretary-General at the French Foreign Office, in the hope that they would distance themselves from the peace policy of Georges Bonnet and repudiate that policy. He had visited London in May 1939 to coordinate his strategy with the efforts of Sir Robert Vansittart. The Diplomatic Adviser to His Majesty's Government considered relations with France to be his own special province, and he hoped to support the Halifax war policy by securing French participation in any war against Germany. Vansittart assured Bullitt that Alexis Leger was his "intimate friend," and that Leger could be relied upon to support the efforts of Halifax and Roosevelt to involve France in war with Germany.

Bullitt, Vansittart, and Leger feared that Sir Eric Phipps, the British Ambassador to France and brother-in-law of Vansittart, shared the negative attitude of Prime Minister Chamberlain toward an alliance between the Western Powers and Russia. Bullitt had begun to dislike Bonnet, and he reported to President Roosevelt without any regard for accuracy: "in point of fact both Bonnet and Sir Eric Phipps were opposed to bringing the Soviet Union into close cooperation with France and England." Bullitt also feared that Prime Minister Chamberlain might attempt to challenge the policy of Halifax and restore his own control over the conduct of British policy. American Ambassador Kennedy had reported from London on July 20, 1939, that Chamberlain was "sick and disgusted with Russians." The British Prime Minister believed that Hitler would welcome any tangible opportunity for a peaceful settlement. Chamberlain knew that Hitler was not bluffing and that he might gamble on a war, but he told Kennedy that Hitler "is highly intelligent and therefore would not be prepared to wage a world war."

President Roosevelt had intervened directly in the negotiations between the Soviet Union and the Western Powers on August 4, 1939. Lawrence Steinhardt, who had succeeded Davies as American Ambassador to Russia, was instructed by confidential letter to tell Molotov that the interests of the United States and the Soviet Union were identical in promoting the defeat of Italy and Germany in a European war. President Roosevelt urged the Soviet Union to conclude a military alliance with Great Britain and France, and he intimated that the United States would ultimately join this coalition of Powers. The American Ambassador was informed that President Roosevelt had told Soviet Ambassador Konstantin Umansky, before the latter departed for Russia on leave, that the United States hoped to achieve a position of solidarity with the Soviet Union against Germany and Italy.

The Russians were pleased with the Roosevelt message because it strengthened their position in negotiations with both the Western Powers and Germany, and the support of Roosevelt made it easier for them to gain consent for their ambitious program of expansion in Finland, Poland, Rumania, Lithuania, Latvia and Estonia. The Russians had no desire to conceal from the foreign Powers the contents of the confidential Roosevelt message. The news of the message appeared in the Voelkischer Beobachter at Berlin on August 11, 1939, and its contents were published by the Ilustrowany Kurjer at Krakow on August 13, 1939. Steinhardt knew that Umansky had been informed of the contents of the Roosevelt message before leaving the United States. The letter with the message was sent by way of Bullitt at Paris, and Steinhardt did not receive it until August 15, 1939. He concluded that Molotov had instructed Umansky to reveal the contents of the letter before it reached Russia, and that Molotov had proceeded to permit the news of the letter to reach the foreign Powers before he had actually received it himself.

Steinhardt presented the Roosevelt letter to Molotov on August 16, 1939 and the two diplomats proceeded to discuss its contents. Roosevelt, in writing the letter, had hoped to influence Russian policy in favor of the Western Powers, but it is not surprising that he failed completely in this effort, and that Molotov used the message for his own purposes. Molotov told Steinhardt that the British and French military missions had come to Russia to discuss military collaboration in terms which the Soviet Foreign Commissar characterized as "vague generalities." Molotov added that these missions were unable to contend with the specific points which Russia had raised.

Steinhardt reported to President Roosevelt on August 16th that he was personally convinced that the Soviet Union would seek to avoid participation in the early phase of a European conflict. This annoyed President Roosevelt, who seemingly would have led the United States into a European conflict on the first day of war had American public opinion and the American Congress permitted such a policy. The American President was perturbed to learn, a few days later, that Alexis Leger at the French Foreign Office was not the unconditional advocate of war-at-any-price which Bullitt had claimed. Leger revealed his opinion that it would be exceedingly unwise for Great Britain and France to attack Germany without military support from the Soviet Union. This seemed to indicate that there would be virtually no support for a war policy in France if the negotiations at Moscow failed. Roosevelt also learned that Premier Daladier was continuing to denounce the "criminal folly" of the Poles. President Roosevelt knew that Halifax would abandon his project for war against Germany if he was unable to gain the military support of either the Soviet Union or France. The possibility that the peace might be saved was perturbing to the American President who hoped to utilize a European war to achieve his dream for the perpetuation of his tenure and the increase of his personal prestige and glory.

By August 11th, even as negotiations with the British and French are still in progress, Stalin decides to exercise the option with Germany. A definite indication is sent to Berlin the next day. Russian Foreign Minister Molotov and German Ambassador Schulenberg engage in preliminary talks. With the final failure of the British and French missions, the way is open for a German-

Soviet agreement. On August 23rd, after the settling of a commercial treaty, Ribbentrop flies to Moscow; that night a German-Soviet nonaggression pact is signed and announced to the world. It is a desperate, quickly-snatched triumph for Hitler, whose satisfaction at his position is marred only by the knowledge that Count Ciano, the Italian Foreign Minister, had backed Italy down and out of the "united front" with Germany in the face of an evident Anglo-French determination to go to war over Danzig.

The German-Soviet Pact

Hitler hoped to recover the diplomatic initiative through his Kremlin pact of August 23, 1939. The effort launched by Halifax on March 17, 1939, to build a formidable British alliance front in Eastern Europe had failed. Hitler also hoped that Great Britain and France would react to this situation by withdrawing their support from Poland. He knew that his pact with Russia placed him in a strong position to resume negotiations with the Western Powers. His recent success was too sensational to permit new negotiation efforts to be readily confused with weakness. The British Government gave Hitler an excellent opening for his new diplomatic campaign by commissioning Chamberlain to write to him. The British leaders, of course, did not intend to embark on major negotiations, but Hitler had other plans. The presentation of the Chamberlain letter by Henderson on August 23, 1939, was the signal for a major German diplomatic offensive in Great Britain.

The situation would have been relatively simple for Hitler by August 23, 1939, had it not been for the unpardonable indiscretion of Ciano and the incredible conduct of General Gamelin. The statement of Ciano on August 18th that Italy would not support Germany cushioned Halifax from the impact of the German treaty with Russia, and it gave General Gamelin an excuse to rationalize the unfavorable French military situation, which had been created by the Russian agreement with Germany. The action of Ciano was especially unwarranted because the Italian Foreign Minister knew that Hitler hoped to create the maximum effect of surprise with his Russian pact. Ciano knew that his own pledge to the British would greatly reduce the impact of Hitler's diplomacy. It was easy to argue in London that the position of Hitler would be insecure if the Italians refused to be loyal to their engagements with him. Italian loyalty to Hitler and a clear decision from France against war on behalf of the Poles would surely have pulled the teeth from the Halifax campaign to launch a preventive war against Germany. The absence of these contingencies made it exceedingly difficult for Hitler to capitalize on his Russian success in negotiations with the British leaders. He was not fully aware of this situation on August 23rd. He knew nothing of the Italian pledge to the British on August 18th, or of the crucial debate in the meeting of the French Defense Council. He failed to appreciate the adamanat determination of Halifax for war. He knew that British Ambassador Henderson was opposed to war, and he hoped that the views of the British diplomat at Berlin were shared to some extent by his master at London. Hitler was more optimistic than the facts warranted, but this was mainly because he was not fully aware of the existing situation.

The Russians too were unduly optimistic about their prospects on August 23, 1939. They overestimated the military power of France, and they expected a hopeless military stalemate on the Franco-German front reminiscent of World War I. Stalin hoped to expand his position in Eastern Europe, and to intervene militarily against Germany in the latter phase of a European war, when both Germany and the Western Powers were exhausted. There was one notably great difference in the attitudes of Stalin and Hitler. The Soviet Dictator, like Halifax and Roosevelt, was hoping for the outbreak of a general European war. Hitler considered that a European war would be a great evil, and he was anxious to prevent it. It is ironical to anticipate that the leaders of the Soviet Union, Great Britain, and the United States ultimately joined together in true Orwellian fashion, at Nuremberg in 1945-1946, to condemn the German leaders for deliberately seeking, as "aggressors," to destroy the peace of the world.

In July, Hitler had launched a private program for peace at the suggestion of Reichsmarshall Goering. Goering's friend Birger Dahlerus, a Swedish engineer with many contacts in both Britain and Germany, arranged unofficial meetings throughout July and August between Germans and British supporters of the Chamberlain government. Other private contacts between the Germans and the British developed. Potentially good news about the attitude of influential Britons—their desire to see peace between Britain and Germany maintained—came from these conferences, including a report stating that William S. Ropp, who had been selected to head the British Air Ministry intelligence service division for Germany in wartime, claimed that there was lively opposition to war with Germany in the British Air Ministry. Ropp had further suggested that a British-French declaration of war on Germany need not be taken seriously, because it would be possible to conclude peace after the completion of the Polish phase of hostilities. Goering, ever suspicious, suspects the Ropp remarks may be a British ploy, designed to lure Hitler into gambling in Poland. But Alfred Rosenberg, head of the Foreign Policy office of the National Socialist Party, believes the sentiments may well be genuine and accurate. His report on the matter is forwarded to the German Foreign Office and to Hitler.

Hitler Hopes for Peace—Despite Roosevelt

The German Foreign Office also received a confidential report on August 16, 1939, from Paul Legrenier, a French journalist who was sincerely friendly toward Germany. Legrenier insisted that Great Britain and France would not go to war against Germany in a conflict between Germany and Poland arising from trouble at Danzig. He was basing his report on the determination of French Foreign Minister Bonnet not to fight for Polish interests at Danzig, and on the obvious fact that Great Britain would not attack Germany without French support. Joseph Barnes, the Berlin correspondent of the New York Herald Tribune, estimated to the German diplomats on the same day that there was still at least a 50-50 chance that Great Britain and France would not attack Germany. Barnes added that he was basing his estimate on the assumption that Germany would make a great effort to avoid needless provocation of Great Britain and France. The reports of Ropp, Legrenier, and Barnes were received by Hitler on August 16, 1939, before the announcement of the Russo-German Pact. Hitler was convinced that the conclusion of the Pact with Russia would increase the chances for peace. It is not astonishing under these circumstances that he was more optimistic than Goering or Mussolini about the possibilities of avoiding an Anglo-German war.

The German Foreign Office was under no illusion about the official policy of President Roosevelt in the current crisis. They knew that his policy was based on the twin assumptions that there should and would be a general European war. There was also reason to believe that some of the American diplomats in Berlin did not share this attitude. British Ambassador Henderson informed the Germans that American Charge d'Affaires Kirk was constantly prodding him to insist that Great Britain would fight rather than retreat, but there was ample evidence that Kirk hoped a show of British firmness would prompt Hitler to make new proposals for a settlement. The Germans also knew that Kirk had severely reprimanded Louis P. Lochner, the American journalist, for questioning the determination of Germany to go to war. Lochner was following the tactics of the Polish journalists by claiming that Hitler was bluffing, because he knew that these tactics would encourage German defiance and make war more likely. It was obvious that Kirk would not have intervened with Lochner on his own initiative had he personally favored war, and the German diplomats were pleased to learn that Kirk had denounced his warmongering.

The Roosevelt Messages to Germany and Poland

President Roosevelt sent insincere peace messages to Germany and Poland at 9:00 p.m. on August 24, 1939. He ignored in his message to Germany the rebuff he had received from Hitler's speech to the Reichstag on April 28th by claiming that "to the message which I sent you last April I have received no reply." He proposed a settlement between Germany and Poland by direct negotiation, arbitration, or mediation. He was treading on difficult ground, because Poland, whom he favored, rather than Germany, whom he opposed, blocked the resumption of negotiations. The messages from President Roosevelt forced President Moscicki of Poland to pay lip service to negotiation, although the Polish Government did not desire to resume contact with the Germans. The reply of President Moscicki was a definite pledge to President Roosevelt that Poland would negotiate, although the Poles actually had no intention of doing so.

President Roosevelt informed Hitler that "it is understood, of course, that upon resort to any one of the alternatives I suggest, each nation will agree to accord complete respect to the independence and territorial integrity of the other." President Roosevelt imagined that this arrangement would preclude in advance any tangible Polish concessions to Germany, but its terms were entirely consistent with the Hitler offer of October 1938 which the Poles had rejected. The original German proposals were actually based upon the respect of the independence and territorial integrity of Poland. This had not prevented the Poles from rejecting them and from ordering the partial mobilization of the Polish armed forces against Germany. Hitler had revealed to the world the inaccuracies and fallacies in the Roosevelt proposals of April 15, 1939, to Germany and Italy, but President Roosevelt rarely accepted criticism. He blandly concluded his message to Hitler with the statement that the United States was prepared to contribute to peace "in the form set forth in my messages of April 14 (advance release of the messages to the American press on that date)." The Roosevelt messages to Germany and Poland were made public at Washington, D.C., at 10:00 p.m. on August 24, 1939. The message to Hitler was not submitted to the German Foreign Office by American Charge d'Affaires Kirk until 9:00 a.m. on August 25th. Hitler decided to defer his reply to President Roosevelt for several days. He was intent, because of the importance of German-American relations, upon preparing a carefully cogent and courteous exposition of the German position for the benefit of the American President.

German Ambassador Mackensen had a satisfactory conversation with Mussolini about the Russo-German treaty early on August 25, 1939. The Italian leader warmly assured Mackensen that he approved of this Pact, and he recalled that he had suggested this himself the previous Spring. Mussolini told Mackensen that he was whole-heartedly in accord with Germany's position in the Polish question. The Italian leader described the worsening of German-Polish relations as "so acute that an armed conflict can no longer be avoided." He was convinced that the Polish mentality was "no longer responsive to reasonable suggestions, no matter from which side they might come."

Mackensen was immensely impressed by the attitude displayed by Mussolini in the absence of Ciano or [Italian Ambassador to Germany] Attolico. Mussolini claimed that the Poles should have responded to Hitler's original offer by accepting the German annexation of Danzig as an indication that they were sincere in their desire to come to a general agreement with Germany. Mussolini was convinced that "a general conference might have followed" which would have "assured European peace for fifteen to twenty years, as is desired by all." The attitude of the Italian leader on the morning of August 25th was everything which Hitler could have desired, and the German leader concluded that it would be possible to rely on Mussolini's full support. He expected a favorable statement from Italy later in the day in response to the earlier initiative of Ribbentrop.

Mussolini and Ciano had renewed their discussion about a general peace conference with [British Ambassador to Italy] Sir Percy Loraine after the announcement of the Russo-German pact. Loraine reported to Halifax on August 23rd that Mussolini wanted peace, and that he would like to mediate in the German-Polish dispute. Mussolini assured Loraine that Hitler would not accept the terms of a general settlement unless they included the German annexation of Danzig. Loraine reported that the Italians were concentrating on an attempt to gain a British concession on this one decisive point. Loraine informed Halifax that both Mussolini and Ciano were convinced that a successful diplomatic conference was the only hope for a solution of the current difficulties.

American Ambassador William C. Bullitt was advising both Halifax and the French leaders to maintain their military missions in Moscow, and to continue their efforts to detach Italy from Germany. Halifax recognized that the situation in Russia was untenable by this time. The Anglo-French teams had no choice other than to leave Russia empty-handed. Molotov granted an audience to French Ambassador Naggiar on August 25th, immediately after the British and French military men departed from the Russian capital. The Soviet Commissar for Foreign Affairs took pleasure in announcing to the West that the Poles were exclusively responsible for the failure of Anglo-French negotiations with the Russians for a mutual assistance pact. This announcement confirmed suspicions which French Foreign Minister Bonnet had entertained for many days, and he was inclined for this reason to accept the Russian explanation at face value. Bonnet continued to be furious with the Poles. They had allowed Lipski to engage in an inconclusive conversation with Marshal Goering the previous day, but they had haughtily rejected his suggestion for Franco-Polish consultation on Danzig. The French Foreign Minister was resolved to retaliate by seizing the first opportunity of releasing France from her military obligations to Poland.

Halifax was no longer concerned about Russia, and he did not share the desire of Bonnet to repress Polish excesses at Danzig. He was primarily interested in creating the impression everywhere in the world that the Russo-German pact had not caused him to reconsider his policy toward Germany. Halifax dispatched uniform instructions to British diplomatic missions in all countries on August 24th. He urged them to accept the superhuman task of correcting the impression that the pact had been a blow to the "peace front" headed by England and France. He also claimed that the pact "had produced no effect" on the British Cabinet. He exhorted his diplomats that the British course was straight ahead under the slogan of "preventing the domination of Europe by Germany." Halifax did not explain how a revived German nation of eighty million German citizens could fail to be the leading continental power. After all, it had been said after 1871 that the Germany of Bismarck, with her forty million inhabitants, dominated Europe. The policy of Halifax was calculated to destroy Germany rather than to permit that normal growth and development which for centuries had been considered the natural right of every nation. It was a policy which led to the destruction of a friendly Germany and to the domination of Europe by a hostile Union pledged to overthrow the capitalist system in Great Britain.

Percy Loraine in Rome exposed himself to ridicule in an effort to meet the diplomatic requirements of Halifax. He informed Ciano on August 24 that the Russo-German pact had given him "the first hearty laugh he had had for some weeks." The same man had previously informed the Italian leaders that a pact of mutual assistance with Russia was a necessary feature of the British program. The Italians could be pardoned for suspecting that his "hearty laugh" closely resembled an hysterical scream, because they had never heard him laugh. Loraine soon learned that Halifax was under heavy pressure at home on August 24th to modify the uncompromising British stand at Danzig. The British Foreign Secretary confided to Loraine, despite his earlier circular instructions, that Great Britain might ultimately consider the return of Danzig to Germany as part of an international settlement. Loraine was bewildered by this information, and he wondered if Halifax intended after all to encourage Mussolini to take the initiative for a conference, which again might resolve British difficulties. There had been no similar suggestion from Halifax during the entire period from the British guarantee to Poland of March 31st to the conclusion of the Russo-German pact. Unfortunately, the momentary weakening of Halifax's rigid stand at Danzig was of short duration, and he soon concluded that he could maintain his original position against the mounting opposition at home. Gilbert and Gott, in The Appeasers, attempt to present this incident as a sustained effort on the part of Halifax to come to terms with Germany at Danzig. Unfortunately, this was not the case.

The Polish Pledge to Roosevelt

President Roosevelt received the text of President Moscicki's message on August 25, 1939, and forwarded it to Hitler. Roosevelt emphasized to Hitler that he had a binding promise from Moscicki that Poland would engage in direct negotiations with Germany. The American President added that "all the world prays that Germany, too, will accept." Hitler knew that the message from President Roosevelt was merely a propaganda gesture to discredit Germany, and he was sufficiently shrewd to recognize that a promise made by Poland to the United States was not worth the paper on which it was written. The Poles knew that Roosevelt would support any Polish move to increase the prospect of conflict with Germany and that the American President would not react unfavorably if they refused to honor a pledge to negotiate with Germany. Hitler also knew this, and hence he concentrated on his effort to convince the British that the Poles should negotiate rather than seek to exploit the meaningless Polish response to President Roosevelt.

Beck assured American Ambassador Biddle shortly before midnight on August 25, 1939, that war between Germany and Poland was inevitable. He claimed that Poland had an adequate legal basis for a declaration of war against Germany, in case the Germans failed to take the initiative against Poland within the next few days. Beck denied that there was any truth in the Bielitz massacre, which had been confirmed by neutral sources. He claimed instead that a Polish soldier had been killed by the Germans on August 16, 1939, and that the Germans had proceeded to cut open the stomach of the corpse and to conceal in it the skull of a baby. This story was widely repeated by Polish spokesmen in the days and years which followed, although no attempt was ever made to document the incident. They failed to realize that this type of savagery was based upon certain primitive voodoo-like superstitions in Eastern Europe which were not shared by the Germans. It would have been an unique historical event had modern Poland elected to base a declaration of war on this fantastic charge. American Ambassador Biddle was much impressed by the aggressive attitude of Beck. He predicted to President Roosevelt that Poland would present a series of ultimata to Germany if Hitler backed down in the Danzig dispute.

Beck was impressed by a public German announcement on August 25, 1939, that the Tannenberg and Nuremberg conclaves had been cancelled. The cancellation announcement, and the impressive number of incidents between the Germans and Poles on the following day, convinced the Polish Foreign Minister that a German attack would come at any moment. He did not conclude until August 27th that Hitler, after all, had taken no decisive military measures. French Ambassador Noel claimed that Beck was a very sick man at this time. The French diplomat charged that he was suffering from aggravated fatigue, tuberculosis, and an excessive addiction to stimulants. The Polish Foreign Minister ultimately died of tuberculosis in Rumania in 1944, after the British authorities had denied him permission to come to England. The French Ambassador, who detested Beck, delighted in conveying the impression that the Polish Foreign Minister was both morally and physically decadent.

German troops at the Slovak-Polish frontier had begun their advance on the morning of August 26, 1939, before countermanding orders reached them, and they crossed into Poland at Jablonka Pass. Fortunately, the Poles were not holding a position there, and an engagement was avoided when the Germans speedily retreated a considerable distance across the frontier and into Slovakia. The Poles engaged German patrols in nearly a dozen skirmishes in the Dzialdowo region directly north of Warsaw and across the East Prussian frontier. The engagements ended when the German units were suddenly withdrawn. It was significant that these serious incidents occurred on two of the most crucial sectors of the German operational plan. A massacre of minority Germans in the Lodz area and constant violations of the German frontier from the Polish side tended to deflect attention from these incidents. A Polish warship on August 26, 1939, fired at a German civilian transport airplane on which State Secretary Wilhelm Stuckardt of the Ministry of Interior was returning from Danzig. Stuckardt and the Danzig leaders had discussed the legal problems involved in the projected return of Danzig to the Reich.

Hitler's reversal of military orders naturally created perplexity in the German Army. One of the German Generals was dispatched to the Wilhelmstrasse on the night of August 25, 1939, to inquire indignantly why the soldiers had been sent out if it was intended to settle differences with Poland by diplomatic means. The German Foreign Office had no ready answer with which to meet this embarrassing question.

In Berlin, British Ambassador Henderson, a sincere advocate of a British-German understanding who privately sympathizes with Germany in the Polish question, works tirelessly for peace in the difficult position of having to officially represent Halifax's war policy. He tries to persuade Halifax of the reality of the German minority's sufferings in Poland. He stresses that unless Poland finally negotiates with Germany there will undoubtedly be war. He remarks that from the beginning "the Poles were utterly foolish and unwise."

Roosevelt Hopes for War and Strives to Coordinate Policy

Phipps reported from Paris that Bullitt had received new instructions from President Roosevelt designed to facilitate a closer coordination of British and American policy against Germany. The American President suggested that everything possible should be done by propaganda to bring down the German regime in revolutionary chaos. Roosevelt believed that wireless propaganda should be broadcast to Germany around the clock. He expected that it would produce a great effect to argue in advance that Hitler would be solely responsible for any war. He hoped that the pacific desires of the German people might be exploited to undermine the loyalty of Germans toward their government after the outbreak of war.

Henderson continued to do what he could at Berlin to preserve peace. He contacted Polish Ambassador Lipski again on August 25th and urged him to discuss the problem of the German minority in Poland with the German Government. Henderson reported to Halifax that Italian Ambassador Attolico was horrified at the prospect of war. Attolico had declared with indignation that warmongers such as Anthony Eden should be hanged. Henderson avoided criticizing Attolico's statement about Eden in any way. Eden, to be sure, had worked with Churchill to sabotage appeasement, but the chief role in the scuttling of the appeasement policy had been played by Halifax, the man to whom Henderson addressed his report.

Sir Ronald Lindsay, the British Ambassador to the United States, addressed a series of final reports to Halifax prior to his return to England and his replacement by Lord Lothian. Lindsay indicated that Roosevelt was delighted at the prospect of a new World War. The American President had damaged his prospects in May 1939 with his unsuccessful attempt to pull the teeth from the American neutrality laws, but he assured Lindsay that he would succeed in emasculating this legislation after the outbreak of war. He admitted that he would be forced to delay a new effort to do so "until war broke out." The American President also promised that he would not actually abide by the neutrality laws if he was compelled to invoke them. He would frustrate the purpose of the laws by delaying a proclamation of neutrality for at least five days after the outbreak of war. He would see that war material in the interim was rushed to the British in Canada in enormous quantities. Lindsay reported with his usual excessive moderation that there "was every indication in his language that the American authorities would be anxious to cheat in favor of His Majesty's Government."

Roosevelt also promised Lindsay that he would delay German ships under false pretenses in a feigned search for arms, so that they could be easily seized by the British under circumstances which would be arranged with exactitude between the American and British authorities. The British Ambassador was personally perturbed that the President of one of the important countries could be gay and joyful about a tragedy which seemed so destructive of the hopes of all mankind. He reported that Roosevelt "spoke in a tone of almost impish glee and though I may be wrong the whole business gave me the impression of resembling a school-boy prank." It was an American and world tragedy to have at this important juncture a President whose emotions and ideas could be rated by a friendly Ambassador as childish.

Halifax was inclined to regard the attitude of the American President as a product of one of the most successful British efforts in colonial propaganda. The American President, who was an enthusiastic militarist, had accepted the idea of World War II as his best escape from the economic depression in the United States. The British Foreign Secretary had studied the fantastic Lochner report about the alleged remarks of Hitler to his military men on the Obersalzberg on August 22nd. He wired Loraine in Rome on August 26th that recent information from Berlin indicated that Hitler had some kind of Polish partition in mind. His purpose was to convey to Mussolini the idea that the German leader was too extreme in his plans, at the expense of the Poles, to be amenable to a reasonable settlement of German-Polish difficulties. Halifax hoped in this way to discourage Mussolini's ideas for a diplomatic conference.

Thomsen's View of Roosevelt

State Secretary Weizsaecker had invited American Charge d'Affaires Kirk to call at the German Foreign Office on the evening of August 26th. Weizsaecker conveyed Hitler's acknowledgment of the two recent messages from President Roosevelt, and Kirk expressed his pleasure at this act of courtesy. Weizsaecker advised Kirk that it would be more timely to present warnings in Warsaw than at Berlin. German Charge d'Affaires Thomsen reminded Hitler on August 28th that Roosevelt would do everything he could to encompass the downfall of Germany. He predicted that Roosevelt would employ ruthless tactics to force active American participation in a European war despite opposition from American public opinion. Thomsen was convinced that American raw materials and machines would be made available to Great Britain and France immediately after the outbreak of war, and that this measure would be popular because it would aid in overcoming the extensive unemployment. Thomsen concluded that the existing American neutrality legislation would be either abrogated or circumvented.

On August 25th, the British guarantee to Poland becomes a formal military alliance. Hitler appeals to Britain and France not to make a German-Polish dispute the cause of general European war. He offers a remarkable alliance to Britain in which German troops would guarantee the British empire around the world. The offer is brushed aside. Henderson continues his attempt to save the situation at Berlin; he urges Lipski to enter into discussions with the Germans, to no avail. Henderson's exertions are joined by those of Dahlerus, by now communicating directly between Hitler and Chamberlain and Halifax. France strongly urges Poland to negotiate with Germany. Britain does not. Poland calls up more reservists to active service. On August 29th, Hitler presents a moderate 16-point basis for direct negotiations with Poland. Poland does not respond. Beck refuses to go to Berlin to take part in discussions. On August 31st, Lipski, minus plenipotentiary powers, meets with Hitler but refuses to consider one final German proposal.

Chamberlain and Halifax

No one in the position of the British Ambassador could be blamed for desisting from further efforts to prevent war, but Henderson never stopped trying. It is this fact, combined with his unquestionable British patriotism and his determination to stand by his own country through thick and thin, regardless of the dreadful blunders of the British leaders, that make his mission to Berlin a study in courage. He tried every possible tactic to persuade Chamberlain to express his own views, and to encourage the British Prime Minister to resume leadership at the British Foreign Office before it was too late. He made a special effort to convince the British leaders that he had always been firm with Hitler, and he recalled that he had bombarded Hitler with arguments and answers in the conversation of August 28th, which had apparently turned out very favorably for Great Britain.

Halifax continued to advise Chamberlain to ignore the complaints of Henderson and others about the attitude and policies of Poland. He received a very useful letter from Count Raczynski on August 30th. The Polish Government in this letter solemnly swore that no persecution of the German minority was taking place in Poland. The American journalist, W.L. White, later recalled that there was no doubt among well-informed persons by this time that horrible atrocities were being inflicted every day on the Germans of Poland. The pledge from Raczynski had about as much validity as the civil liberties guaranteed by the 1936 constitution of the Soviet Union.

Chamberlain complained to American Ambassador Kennedy after the outbreak of World War II "that America and the world Jews had forced England into the war." Kennedy himself was convinced that "neither the French nor the British would have made Poland a cause of war if it had not been for the constant needling from Washington." Kennedy in 1939 was subjected to constant pressure from the American Ambassador at Paris, and he placed primary emphasis on "Bullitt's urging on Roosevelt in the summer of 1939 that the Germans must be faced down about Poland." Kennedy was instructed by President Roosevelt on the telephone "to put some iron up Chamberlain's backside," a gratuitous instruction because Chamberlain had abdicated control over British policy to Lord Halifax in October 1938. Kennedy, Bullitt, and Roosevelt never succeeded in understanding this situation. They were neither well-informed, nor astute about discovering facts for themselves, and Halifax never chose to confide in them. The subsequent sting of conscience which caused Chamberlain to complain to Kennedy about America and the Jews was an attempt to shift the blame rather than a full confession. He was merely saying in different words that he and his friends might have found the courage to challenge Halifax had not the latter enjoyed the support of President Roosevelt. This was undoubtedly a defensive rationalization, because none of them ever displayed the slightest inclination to oppose Halifax. Furthermore, Halifax had decided upon a policy of war with Germany long before the German occupation of Prague, and before Roosevelt attempted to exert any considerable bellicose pressure on the British leaders. Halifax had stirred Roosevelt against the Germans before Hitler went to Prague, rather than the other way around. Roosevelt was a novice in international affairs compared to Halifax, and it was inconceivable that he could exert a decisive influence on the British Foreign Secretary.

Halifax had considered an Anglo-German war inevitable ever since 1936, and he never wavered in his campaign to destroy Germany, from October 1938, when he assumed personal control over British policy, to the outbreak of World War II in September 1939. He was more than a match for Chamberlain, the Unitarian business leader from the Midlands, or for any of his soft-spoken friends. He had refrained from wresting control over foreign policy from Chamberlain until the British leader returned from Munich to face the hostile critics within his own Conservative Party. He had never seriously criticized Chamberlain's conduct of policy until he was in a position to dominate it himself. Halifax would have been amused to hear Winston Churchill telling his friends in August 1939 that he feared the British Government "would run out over Poland." This was the wrong way to put it. Halifax was primarily worried by the possibility that France would run out over Poland. This was the only event which would prompt him to abandon his own policy of war against Germany.

On the morning of September 1st, German troops attack Poland. Hitler announces the invasion before the Reichstag, stating that the brutal suppression of the ethnic German minority and the lack of freedom and self-determination for Danzig necessitated military action. Mussolini makes last-minute pleas for a grand peace conference dealing with all causes of European conflict, to meet on September 5th, on the precondition that Danzig is returned to Germany in advance. Hitler and, initially, France, are agreeable. Britain is not, and goads France into joining with Britain in insisting on a precondition that fighting must stop in Poland. The conference plan fails. On the night of September 2nd, British ministers led by Halifax virtually demand of Chamberlain that an ultimatum be issued to Germany. It is presented the next morning, demanding not only that the fighting cease but that all German troops withdraw from Poland. With the expiration of the ultimatum at 11 a.m., Britain declares war on Germany. A French ultimatum follows, somewhat reluctantly. With its expiration at 5 p.m., France declares war on Germany. World War II begins.

Halifax and Roosevelt

It was clever of Halifax to claim that further intimate Anglo-German conversations would displease President Roosevelt. Chamberlain had been severely criticized for failing to respond favorably to an impractical proposal from Roosevelt, in January 1938, for a grandiose diplomatic conference, which would not only have failed to commit the United States to the British imperialistic program, but undoubtedly would have weakened the effort of Chamberlain to increase British influence in Italy. Lord

Lothian had succeeded Sir Ronald Lindsay as British Ambassador to the United States. Lothian, like Henderson at Berlin, favored a peaceful understanding with Germany, but he was a disciplined diplomat who subordinated his own personal views to the requirements of Halifax's war policy. The new British Ambassador was destined to play a more active role behind the scenes of American politics than any previous British diplomat. Lothian confirmed Lindsay's judgment that there was "nothing neutral" about Roosevelt's attitude. The American President insisted that "the most serious danger from the standpoint of American public opinion would be if it formed the conclusion that Herr Hitler was entangling the British Government in negotiations leading to pressure on Poland by England and France to abandon vital interests." It was obvious to Lothian that Roosevelt wanted war in Europe.

The American President knew that a diplomatic settlement of the European crisis would extinguish his own plans for American military aggression in Europe. Lord Lothian assured Halifax that the partisanship of Roosevelt extended to the minute details. Roosevelt intended to urge the belligerents at the outbreak of the expected war not to bombard civilians, because he hoped in this way to protect Warsaw, one of the Allied capitals. Lothian knew that Roosevelt would never object to a later effort by Great Britain to massacre the civilian population of Germany by means of mass bombing attacks. Roosevelt confided to Lothian that his primary objective at the moment was to evade American neutrality legislation after the outbreak of war. He was intent on renewing the struggle in the American Congress to remove the legal embargo on war material. He promised that he would refuse to admit from the very start of hostilities that aluminum sheets for airplanes were "aeroplane parts" or that airplane engine blocks had anything to do with airplanes.

Lothian confirmed the report of his predecessor that Roosevelt was delighted at the prospect of a new World War. This warlike attitude of Roosevelt was exploited by Halifax in adducing artificial arguments for closing the door on further negotiations with Hitler. There was actually no reason to fear that President Roosevelt would be in a position to cause trouble for Great Britain in the event of a negotiated settlement in Europe. The American President did not have the support of Congress or public opinion for his aggressive foreign policy, and he was nearing the end of his final presidential term, final according to the sacrosanct political tradition established by George Washington and Thomas Jefferson. It was obvious that he would need a crisis of the greatest dimensions, such as a big war in Europe, to campaign successfully for further terms of office. It would have been easy for the British Government to improve relations with a more conciliatory successor had war been averted and had Roosevelt been defeated in the American election of 1940.

For space reasons the 98 footnotes with which Professor Hoggan supports his case in this article are omitted from this issue of The JHR. They appear in the German edition of The Forced War (Der erzwungene Krieg: Die Ursachen und Urheber des 2. Weltkriegs [Tuebingen: Grabert Verlag]), the latest (12th) revised edition of which contains some substantial supplementations, and will of course appear in the forthcoming English edition.

DAVID L. HOGGAN received his Ph.D. in History from Harvard University in 1948. His academic career has included teaching posts at the University of California at Berkeley, San Francisco State College, and the Amerika Institut of the University of Munich. In 1964 he was awarded the Leopold von Ranke Prize for historical scholarship by the Society for the Promotion of Historical Research, of West Germany. His book on the origins of World War II, Der erzwungene Krieg, was based on his doctoral dissertation dealing with German-Polish relations. First published in 1961, it has been kept continually in print in revised, updated editions. Dr. Hoggan's other books include: Frankreichs Widerstand gegen den Zweiten Weltkrieg, Der unnoetige Krieg: Deutsche Aussenpolitik 1939-1945, The Myth of the New History, and Das blinde Jahrhundert Teil I: Amerika - Das messianische Urteil. LETTERS TO THE EDITOR, continued from page 2

Dear Editor: 15 January 1983

A few years ago, the bankers purposely set their interest rates so high so that they could gather up all the money to protect the people from the evils of inflation (too much money). Is their scheme working?

A $62,500 home purchased with a 20% cash down payment of $12,500 and a 30-year bank loan of $50,000 at 13¼ percent interest requires monthly payments of $562.89 to the bank.

The following chart gives in 5-year intervals of this 30-year loan, the homebuyer's equity acquired in this loan, the amount that went to the bank for interest, and the amount paid in monthly payments to the bank.

AGE	BUYER EQUITY	BANK INTEREST	PAYMENTS
5	$ 913	$32,861	$33,773
10	$ 2,677	$64,870	$67,547
15	$ 6,086	$95,234	$101,320
20	$12,674	$122,419	$135,094
25	$25,407	$143,460	$168,867
30	$50,000	$152,625	$202,625

Out of the first 41 payments, the homebuyer acquired one payment ($562.89) of equity in the loan; the bank gets the remaining 40 payments for interest.

Out of each monthly payment, interest eats up: over $500 for the first 13 1/3 years, over $400 for the first 20 2/3 years, and over $300 for the first 24¼ years.

Averaged out over the 30-year loan, interest eats up $423.96 of every monthly payment.

The home costs $215,125. $152,625 goes to the bank for interest, $50,000 repays the bank loan, and the down payment is $12,500.

With these high interest rates the homebuyer doesn't acquire a ¼ equity in the loan until 10 years (approximately) from the end of the contract, and a ½ equity until just 5 years (approximately) from the end of the contract in loans of 25 to 40 years duration with rates of interest of 13 to 14 percent. . .

Dear George: 14 January 1984

From the time I was old enough to read, I studied Adolf Hitler and his National Socialist program because he fascinated me. For many years I believed that audacious lie, the 6 Million Hoax. To me, it is a disappointment to learn the Holyhoax is a lie. I know Hitler told the truth about the Jews and their 'Christian' toadies, but I have always wished it had been twelve million dead chosen 'rats' instead of six million.

Herr Dietz, please print my name and address in case any KIKES happen to read this copy of the Liberty Bell. I want them to know that I, for one Aryan, would have killed them all and laughed about it. It's very disappointing to discover that the Six Million 'Dead' Kikes was just another technique of the professional Jew Liars.

Dear Mr. Dietz: 14 January 1984

Thank you for the October 1983 complimentary issue of Liberty Bell. If the back issues carrying the remainder of Ben Kriegh's 'Germany After World War I' are still available, please start my subscription with the November 1983 issue. I thoroughly enjoyed his informative mini-review of pre-WW I German history and am looking forward to reading and learning from the remainder of his series.

However, I found the Talmudic hatred expressed by some writers towards Jesus Christ and Christians disturbing although their frustration is understandable. The present pro-Jew, anti-White hog-wash promoted by unscrupulous men under the guise of Christianity is definitely detrimental to the survival of our White Race.

History proves unscrupulous men corrupt and re-write secular history to further their own selfish goal of world domination. Is it not reasonable to believe they would corrupt and re-write the Word of God for the same purpose? To throw the baby out with the wash water before making an exhaustive search for Biblical truths is a shortsighted solution. Christianity is the religion of Western man. This nation was founded by White Christians and our laws were based on Bible principles. Today, as in the past, numerous White Christians remain steadfast in their dedication to the preservation of our race and culture (Western Christian civilization) and should not be lumped together with those Judaized Christians aligned against us.

Please do not construe the views expressed in this letter as an attack on the integrity of any individual contributor to your magazine, it is not. I respect and admire all members of our White Race courageous enough to take a positive stand against the forces aligned against us; it is their HUMANISTIC short sighted solutions I disagree with.

Respectfully,
Mrs. P.R., Washington

Thanks for all your good work, George.

I have received a couple of issues of a German newspaper and it has had the result of starting me on a crash program to learn to read German. Yesterday, I was up at 4:45 AM and at my German book. As soon as I know enough German, I want to subscribe, and I am very interested in "Der Ehrenbund Rudel." To use a vulgar comparison, Rudel must have a comparable position in our Valhalla as "St. Peter in Heaven." [Der

SOME QUOTABLE QUOTES FROM AMERICA'S DECLINE

On Race: "We must further understand that all races naturally regard themselves as superior to all others. We think Congoids unintelligent, but they feel only contempt for a race so stupid or craven that it fawns on them, gives them votes, lavishly subsidizes them with its own earnings, and even oppresses its own people to curry their favor. We are a race as are the others. If we attribute to ourselves a superiority, intellectual, moral, or other, in terms of our own standards, we are simply indulging in a tautology. The only objective criterion of superiority, among human races as among all other species, is biological: the strong survive, the weak perish. The superior race of mankind today is the one that will emerge victorious—whether by its technology or its fecundity—from the proximate struggle for life on an overcrowded planet."

FREEDOM OF SPEECH—FREEDOM OF THOUGHT
FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION

The editor-publisher of Liberty Bell does not necessarily agree with each and every article in this magazine, nor does he subscribe to all conclusions arrived at by various writers; however, he does endeavor to permit the exposure of ideas suppressed by the controlled news media of this country.

It is, therefore, in the best tradition of America and of free men everywhere that Liberty Bell strives to give free reign to ideas, for ultimately it is ideas which rule the world and determine both the content and structure of culture.

We believe that we can and will change our society for the better. We declare our long-held view that no institution or government created by men, for men, is inviolable, incorruptible, and not subject to evolution, change or replacement by the will of the people.

To this we dedicate our lives and our work. No effort will be spared and no idea will be allowed to go unexpressed if we think it will benefit the Thinking People, not only of America, but the entire world.

Revilo P. Oliver

In Is There Intelligent Life on Earth? I cited several times Ruth Brandon's excellent book, The Spiritualists (New York, Knopf, 1983), which gives the first comprehensive account of the success of clever swindlers in convincing gullible persons, including intelligent men who should have known better, that there was life after death and that the deceased became spooks who hover around the earth, waiting for 'spiritualistic mediums' to give them a chance to rap on tables and utter inane platitudes.

Mrs. Brandon's meticulous research deserves every commendation, but she seems to have missed the most exalted and famous dupe of 'spiritual' hokum and crude trickery, Queen Victoria. And with this we turn from pathetic illusions engendered by an uncontrolled yearning for a better life in a nice world to political realities—from psychology to the dark mysteries of secret conspiracies and the covert forces that have determined so much of modern history.

I owe my information to the January 1984 issue of a periodical, Two Worlds, published in London to exploit the credulity of the women and weak-minded men who still find in 'spiritualism' a refuge in which they hide from the reality of a universe they have not the hardihood to contemplate. I assume that in the article verifiable facts, as distinct from oleaginous sucker-bait in which they are conveyed, are reported with a fair accuracy, but the subject obviously calls for detailed and extensive research for which I do not have the means or the time. I hope it will be taken up by some honest scholar in the field of modern history.

We must notice first the character of the only queen in Britain's long history who rivalled in fame and influence the first Elizabeth. Victoria was the daughter of Edward, Duke of Kent, the fourth son of George III, and at the time of her birth the rashest gambler would not have taken any odds on the chance she might eventually succeed to the throne. But on the death of William IV in 1837, she, at the age of eighteen, became Queen of England, but not Queen of Hanover, since the latter nation retained the Salic law that forbade the succession of females. (Speculate, if you wish, what the history of Europe might have been, had the two countries remained united by the Crown.)

If her early portraits are to be trusted, Victoria was a rather pretty and appealing young woman, though not beautiful; the photographs taken when she was in her mid-thirties show her as plain-featured, though not quite homely. And in all the pictures her countenance is that of a woman who is not sure of herself. If the portrait were that of an unidentified young lady emerging into womanhood, a sympathetic physiognomist might sense in her a potentiality for the uxorial affection versified by a great poet of her era:

> Teach me, only teach, Love!
> As I ought
> I will speak thy speech, Love,
> Think thy thought.

It was perhaps Victoria's misfortune that she became Queen during the administration of Viscount Melbourne. He was, beyond question, the handsomest man ever to be Prime Minister of Great Britain and he may have been the most urbane, but he was very far from being the wisest or the most scrupulous. He had the personal accomplishments that charm women, and with courtly suavity he quickly acquired a quasi-paternal ascendency over the impressionable young lady, who remained attached and even devoted to her "dear and excellent Lord Melbourne" until his death. He so surrounded her with Whigs and artfully formed her politics that, incredible as it may seem, there was even a question whether England's greatest general and statesman, the Duke of Wellington, would receive an invitation to her wedding. And Melbourne undoubtedly had much to do with arranging that marriage.

Before she was twenty-one, Victoria became the wife of Albert of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, who was officially the younger son of her mother's brother, Ernst, Duke of Coburg. Gossip rife at the time and never forgotten had it that he was the son of a cultivated Jew in the Ducal court who offered himself to the Duchess as a surrogate for the Duke, who detested her. It is unlikely that the truth will ever be known.

Albert, a tall, fairly handsome, and undoubtedly talented young man, was sent to England to engage the affections of Victoria, and he succeeded brillliantly, securing her love and devotion for the rest of her life. Many letters written by Victoria to her relatives and close friends, and quite a few written by Albert to his, are still extant. Significant excerpts from them are given in biographies, notably in Cecil Woodham-Smith's Queen Victoria (New York, Knopf, 1972). The reader will be impressed by the contrast between Victoria's lyrical admiration and passionate affection for Albert, both before and after their marriage, and the attitude of Albert, who stoically undertook a job that had devolved on him, that of pleasing and cajoling a weakly sentimental young woman. He worked at his job diligently and expertly, and Victoria, it is clear, never suspected the real nature of his feelings toward her. She adored him. In the words of her biographer, Albert became "the mainspring of her life. She depended on him in every detail of her existence, important and unimportant. He drafted her [official] letters and despatches; she never chose a bonnet or dress without his approval; after more than twenty years of marriage she grudged every hour they were apart. She trusted his judgement, in the crises which were shaking Europe, completely; she would always take his advice." There is a photograph of the Queen and the Prince Consort taken in the last year of their life together. (You may conveniently find it in Alison Gernsheim's Fashion and Reality, London, 1965, plate 59.) If the two persons in the picture were unidentified, you would say that you see a submissive and probably downtrodden Victorian wife looking up to the arrogantly virile man who is her lord and master.

Through his infatuated wife, Albert exerted an enormous influence over the policies of the British Empire—an influence that often proved detrimental to its interests. He, more than any other one man, was responsible for the failure of Great Britain to act as her own interests and honor demanded in the Trent affair—a failure that was pregnant with eventual disaster for the realm and perhaps for the world. "That," a British historian writes me, "is where we really missed the boat."

When Albert died in 1861, Victoria, then 42, was heart-broken in the full meaning of that term, and went into a mourning so extravagant that it seriously impaired her popularity. And the question in the minds of informed Englishmen was, On Whom will the Queen henceforth depend? It is now clear that some persons acted to make sure.

The story, as it emerges from the article in Two Worlds when stripped of the garbage in which it is enclosed, is simple enough and, to a tantalizing point, clear.

There was in Birmingham an English boy named Robert James Lees. We are told that he was a "born psychic" and in childhood he gave "weekly seances to his family." That is likely enough. He was probably a clever lad and, like the Fox sisters at about the same age, probably took delight in seeing what he could make the silly parents believe. When he was thirteen, some shrewd but still unidentified persons got hold of him and trained him. And so, lo and behold, ye godly ones! He went into a trance and Prince Albert's spook began to speak with a voice that was said to be recognizable, delivering an urgent message to his beloved widow. The revelation was brought to the attention of Victoria, who sent two trusted courtiers (unidentified in the article) to disguise themselves as commoners and visit the wonderful boy-'medium,' giving fictitious names.

From the information given us, we cannot even guess whether the envoys were parties to the plot or only English gentlemen chosen for their credulity. Well, what do you know? The wonder boy went into a trance, and Prince Albert's Ghost jumped into the boy's body and, in his own voice, recognized his friends, and not only called them by name but gave them the secret Masonic handshake which could be known only to Masons of the highest degree. And, of course, he gave them a message for his beloved widow.

The envoy's report left poor Victoria starry-eyed and prepared for a letter from Lees, in which her "darling Albert" signed the pet name he used in letters to her, which, of course, no one else could possibly have known, and mentioned a secret that, we may be sure, was known only to him, to her, and all the maids and footmen in Windsor who knew how to keep their ears to closed doors. That was a wow! Victoria sent for Lees and had a heart-warming chat with her presumably vaporized husband.

Young Lees was probably as good an actor as the boys who were once so popular in the cinema, but, no matter how well he had been trained for his rôle, he obviously could not have the judgement of a mature man in carrying out intricate and delicate political manipulations for his superiors. Albert accordingly instructed his widow to send the boy home and summon a really high-powered medium, one John Brown, a gillie on the secluded estate that Victoria had bought for her darling spouse and on which she had built an imitation Mediaeval castle to serve as a hunting lodge for the love birds. And, doesn't God plan things nicely in his infinite benevolence? Brown was precisely the gillie who always carried Albert's gun when the Prince Consort went out to slaughter a few dozen deer, and had been Albert's pet attentant. Evil-minded sceptics will notice that the psychic Johnnie had for a long time perfect opportunities to study the voice, the mannerisms, and the behavior of his quasi-royal master.

And that was how John Brown climbed the beanstalk into the Royal Court and became Victoria's most intimate associate and companion. And it is doubtless true that, as the spooky magazine triumphantly assures us, "through his [Brown's] mediumship the ruler and her husband maintained regular contact, the Prince continuing to advise her on many questions of State right up to her death." The penultimate word in that quotation is a typographical error for 'his.' The anonymous author of the article knows, and later states, that Brown died first, so that in 1883 the infatuated Queen was left a broken-hearted widow for the second time.

I think we have been given the logical and convincing explanation of what puzzled or scandalized all of Victoria's subjects in the upper classes and many in the lower, the amazing intimacy between the prudish Queen of the greatest empire on earth and an uncouth, uneducated, and vulgar peasant. He was there, wherever she resided, in apartments adjoining hers, to which he had access at all hours. He was the only man with whom she was ever alone in the intimacy of her own boudoir—and, many members of the court believed, of her bedroom.

Brown's personality, as observed by persons who knew him then, strikingly resembled the game-keeper who is the hero of Lady Chatterly's Lover, the novel by D. H. Lawrence which is so grossly explicit in its sexual scenes that frantic efforts were made to suppress it before it became a best-seller and required reading for moppets in American grade schools. The novel does have a literary interest as a study of the way in which a well-bred and refined woman may be fascinated by the crude masculinity of a coarse and vulgar rustic. Psychologists variously explain the fact that some women of delicate nurture and cultivated taste are paradoxically submissive to the boorish strength and brutish virility of ruffians. Brown treated Victoria as she had never been treated before in her whole life, and as no other living being would have dared to treat the Queen of Great Britain and Empress of India.

We have no means of knowing whether the considerate ghost of Albert appointed Brown his vicar for the consolation of his widow: it is, of course, quite possible that he did, and that the analogy with Lady Chatterly's Lover is almost complete. According to Ghislain de Diesbach in his Secrets of the Gotha (translated by Margaret Crosland, New York, Meredith, 1968), "certain cheap newspapers even dared to call her Majesty 'Mrs. Brown.' " He also quotes the dissenting opinion of Philippe Jullian, the biographer of Edward VII, who, with specific mention of Victoria's beloved gillie, concluded that "Victoria, who had violent physical needs, transposed them into exclusively sentimental attachments."

Whether sexual intercourse did take place or Victoria and Brown merely got drunk together in her boudoir is not a matter of much importance. What is important is that the uncouth confidence man was the master of the Mistress of the greater part of the civilized world—of a great and noble empire that, in the reign of her grandson, went mad with humanitarian hallucinations and began its toboggan-slide to the abyss.

What advice the Prince Consort, who evidently continued to work hard in the spirit world, gave his widow will never be known. In the grief of her second bereavement, Victoria composed an eulogy of the wonder man who had brought her darling Albert back to her, a second Laodamia, and she doubtless drew on the journal in which she entered the revelations she received via Brown. The besotted woman wanted to publish her literary achievement for the edification of all her subjects, but her private secretary and other sane men who could influence her persuaded her to withhold that evangel from a world not ready for it, and they saw to it that her manuscript, together with the journal of her confabulations with Albert's Manes, was opportunely consigned to the flames that save so many reputations.

Brown left a diary and other papers, but these were incinerated with great care after his death. Victoria left a detailed diary, from which her daughter, Princess Beatrice, wife of the partly Jewish Henry of Battenberg, made censored and revised excerpts, burning each page as she went along. And many other documents from which we might obtain some indirect knowledge of the wisdom of Albert's wraith were fed into the fire.*

Now I have been unable to strike up an acquaintance with any of the billions of invisible and impalpable ghosts that are said to be haunting this planet, and I can't bend even a paper clip by thinking about it, but I do have enough psychic power to ascertain one piece of advice that the disembodied Albert must often have given his doting widow: "Make a pal of that sweet Jew, dear 'Dizzy' Disraeli, and lubricate his way into ever higher offices, and boost him into the peerage, making him at least an Earl." It is known that Victoria did rely heavily on the Anglicized Sheeny and corresponded extensively with him on matters of State, but the noble Lord Esher, grandson of the Jewish financier, Louis Mayer, intimate friend of King Edward VII, and Deputy-Governor of Windsor, in coöperation with the puissant Baron Rothschild, saw to it that no line of that correspondence reached us.

Perhaps you can think of other instructions the bereaved Queen and Empress probably received from her vaporous spouse when he vicariously advised and consoled her. And even if your heart be of flint, it will, I hope, strike a spark of compassion for poor Victoria.

One symptom of our decaying civilization that frequently troubles and distresses me is the sheer incompetence and fecklessness of persons who profess to be experts in one or another branch of learning and are accepted as such by persons who have some moral responsibility to verify credentials before accepting them. Consider, for example, the translations into English that are too frequently published by old and established publishers who have reputations they should presumably be trying to maintain.

Translation from one language to another is a difficult and exacting labor and requires not only mastery of both languages but also literary ability. I always think of Charles Francis Atkinson's translations from the German of Oswald Spengler and Egon Friedell as exhibiting an art that is nearly perfect, rendering complex and profound German into English not only accurately, but so felicitously that one could imagine that the authors had thought and written in English. Such great skill is rare, and one cannot expect to find it often, but we do have a right to expect at least a reasonable accuracy.

When I write for a general public, I try to give references to books in English, whenever possible, and that entails some verification of translations that I cite instead of the originals. In a book on which I am now working, I have occasion to discuss astrology, and the best work of which I know that adequately describes the ambivalent place of astrology in the culture of the Renaissance is Professor Eugenio Garin's Lo zodiaco della vita (Bari, Laterza, 1976). I accordingly made a spot check of the English version, published late last year in London by the old and highly respected firm of Routledge & Kegan Paul. The title page says that Garin's work was "translated by Carolyn Jackson and June Allen, the translation being revised in conjunction with the author by Clare Robertson." The consequences of this accumulation of expertise are simply deplorable. The reference to the author's participation is, I suppose, correct, but must be discounted. Professor Garin, with whom I have a slight acquaintance, writes a fluid and pellucid Italian and an excellent French, but would, I know, be modest about his English and unlikely to overrule three presumably educated and expert natives.

The Italian and Latin of the original are frequently mistranslated, and sometimes appear in such a galimatias of verbiage that one cannot imagine what the translators thought the original meant. The English is generally awkward and sometimes so contorted that while one can puzzle out the meaning, it is simpler and faster to refer back to Garin's original to ascertain what the three experts were trying to say.

Although Garin writes an elegant and clear Italian and quotes Latin that should give no difficulty to anyone who has more than a smattering of what Hermann called "the native language of scholarship," the subject of his book is complex and would present difficulties to anyone who had no previous knowledge of the ramifications of astrology and astronomy at a time when the two had not yet been separated into an exact science and a swindle. One can therefore at least pity the three ladies who made such a botch of the translation.

What is even more ominous is translations that simply violate ordinary common sense. I have noticed quite a few of these over the years in translations that I have had to examine for one reason or another, but there are two that I always remember as clear examples.

A descriptive essay by Gilbert and Colette Charles-Picard was translated into English under the title Daily Life in Carthage at the Time of Hannibal and published in 1961 by the old and respected British firm of Allen & Unwin, evidently in the hope that there would be a considerable public that had a serious interest in the subject and could not read French. The book is so full of preposterous mistranslations that one can only wonder what gave the translator, A. E. Foster, the idea that he knew French. Here is a memorable example: we are told correctly that Phoenician commerce early extended as far west as Spain, and then that "The first contemporary evidence is in the seven hundredth verse of Isaiah." The French reads: "Le premier témoignage contemporain . . . est celui d'Isaïe (vers 700)," i.e., 'that of Isaiah (around 700 [B.C.]).' The translator, of course, is not responsible for the Charles-Picards' historical error—the book of Isaiah (one of several attributed to that probably fictitious author) that was included in the Bible was concocted by at least three different writers at various times and in its present form cannot be older than 200 B.C.—but surely no literate person today can be so little acquainted with the Christian story book that he does not know that its screeds are divided into chapters and verses, and that no chapter could conceivably have a length of 700 verses. The translator's mind must have been taking a vacation when he wrote what he did. It was bad enough to mistake the adverb vers for a noun of identical spelling, but worse to write a statement that a moment's reflection would have shown to be impossible.

There is a biography of Ignatius Loyola that is based on reminiscences he dictated to his secretary, Luis Gonzáles de Cámara. A pious Jesuit, William J. Young, piously translated into often ungrammatical English this biography of the founder of his order, and his translation was published in 1956 by the Catholic and politically conservative house of Regnery in Chicago. In the course of his peregrinations the yet unsainted Loyola came to a certain town in which lived a lady who wished to consult him clandestinely. Accordingly, she did not go to his residence during the day, but waited and then, we are told, she, after veiling herself, went to it "between two lights." The reader naturally imagines the lady as paying a furtive visit while escorted by two linkboys bearing flaming torches, and wonders why she didn't have a drummer along to make herself even more inconspicuous. The point, of course, is that the learned Jesuit did not recognize the extremely common Spanish idiom, entre dos luces. The prudent lady paid her stealthy visit at dusk. If one knows so little Spanish, one should not set oneself up as a translator from that language, but what is really impressive is the translator's total lack of common sense in setting down a meaning that was the very antithesis of what the context demanded.

Incompetent or negligent translators make silly blunders, but that is not the worst of it. All major publishers have large editorial staffs. At least one editor and commonly two or three read a manuscript before it is accepted for publication; another editor marks it for the press; and the printer delivers galley proofs, which are corrected, and then usually a "revise" of the galleys, and finally page proofs, of which a "revise" is often called for before the proofs are finally marked "press" and initialed by the firm's chief proofreader and often by an editor also. Normally, in a large publishing firm, the text of a book will have been read at least once by each of six or more presumably literate persons. Did none of them do his work while awake?

* * * * *

In the December issue of Liberty Bell, I commented on the astounding behavior of the Aryans in South Africa, of whom a majority approved the new constitution by which they will knowingly follow their kinsmen in Rhodesia into the abyss. Writing soon after the results of the election became known, I suggested that the behavior of the Aryans might be caused by some epidemic or endemic disease that could be compared to kuru, which eats away the brain.

Since then, quite a few cuttings from South African newspapers came to hand. The English-language press, which is said to be entirely owned by Jews, was naturally filled with obscene rejoicing. Its hireling editors discovered "demands here and overseas for the government to move more rapidly" toward the liquidation of the Aryans by implementing "the need to come to terms with Black political, economic, and social aspirations," and yelled for the immediate scrapping of the Mixed Marriages Act which still inhibits large-scale breeding of diseased and mindless mongrels, filled with a justified hatred of the race that is responsible for their schizophrenic existence. And with the putrid venom of Yahweh's Master Race, the editors described as a "dwindling band of tattered scarecrows" the one-third of the voters who voted against the suicide of their race and opposed "what is right." The "scarecrows" must be suppressed, of course, but some editors magnanimously proposed that they be forgiven, if they promptly repent of their sin in entertaining the vile notion that the White race is fit to live. All this, I need not say, was only what was to be expected from the race that celebrates Purim each year and gloats over the glorious butchery of Aryans described in one of their favorite fictions.

The newspapers published in Afrikaans were little better, although many of them are said to be still owned by White men. Rapport squeaked about the "deceit and pious talk of the far-right leaders" who didn't want South Africa to go the way of Rhodesia, and demanded that all Whites be "educated for the dispensation that lies ahead." Die Transvaler crowed over the triumph of "the White conscience of South Africa" and the "overwhelming rejection" of the "radicalism" that wanted to preserve the nation they inherited from their ancestors.

The real gem, however, was excreted by Die Volksblad on 5 November. That sheet averred that the result of the election had been "predetermined by the Creator" but was also the result of the "prayers of many believers—prayers that are placed in hearts by the Holy Spirit." Well, it is just possible to understand that: old Yahweh had decreed the liquidation of the Aryans, so he detached a third of himself and sent it to inject ideas into the minds of True Believers so they would ask him to do what he was going to do anyway. That is certainly peculiar behavior for a god and it sounds like some kind of con game to me. But if that is what happened, how can the pious Christians preen themselves on the moral excellence of what they said when a high-powered ghost had them hypnotized and put words into their mouths? One might as well attribute musical genius to a phonograph that plays a recording of César Franck's Symphony in D-minor—or praise the wit of a ventriloquist's dummy.

What follows is still more confusing, if one isn't a Christian and so tries to understand what is going on. The godly editor of Die Volksblad exhorts his readers that since "God's will was done," they have to get down "humbly on their knees" to thank him, not only for doing what he intended to do, but also for having fulfilled the prayers he, as a ghostly hypnotist, made them utter. But how, prithee, can prayers that asked for what was inevitable have been "fulfilled"? Who could imagine that the supplications had altered the celestial tyrant's intent or changed anything? Surely, they had no effect whatsoever. One wonders, furthermore, about the psychological explanation of what the pious energumena will do when they are down on their well-calloused knees. Will the Holy Spook continue to plant prayers in their hearts so that he will just use them to thank and admire himself? Or if the True Believers have recovered possession of their own faculties, will they thank him for what they did when they were out of their minds?

Oh, I know: Christians mustn't think. Their Jesus ordered them to be like "the fowls of the air" and have bird-brains that "take no thought for the morrow" or for any other time. But wicked pagans can't keep their minds a perfect blank; they have a wicked propensity to be rational, and to try to understand the causality of what the Heavenly Father is up.to.

Die Volksblad's sapient editor, for that matter, tries to explain. He tells us that a few weeks before, when the crops in some parts of South Africa were withering in a disastrous drought, the Christians got down on their hard-working knees and prayed for rain, and then old Yahweh gave them some—not as much as they needed and not always in the right places, but still, even though he was grudging and evidently confused by the topography, he did squeeze some sky-water out of his clouds for his pets. I admit that was kind of the old duffer, but since "nothing happens without God's will," it must follow that the Christian's rain-god must have caused the drought in the first place, presumably to distress his True Believers and make them yammer in desperation. So what about his morality? Does he take a perverse pleasure in making his darlings suffer? And since everything was "predetermined by the Creator," including the drought and the insufficient largesse of sky-water, what good did it do the witlings to yammer to their Jesus Pluvius anyway?

Well, however that may be, the righteous editor believes the Christians' prayers were as efficacious as the Navajos' rain dances or the magic that pure-hearted Hopi make with their rattlesnakes, so that is a proof that old Yahweh likewise responded when his Christians prayed for "the spirit of tolerance and brotherhood" that will make South Africa a Hell for White men and women. We are to infer that Yahweh thereupon tampered with the minds of the Aryans in that country and made a majority of them vote for the new constitution. That, at least, was in character, for, as all Christians know, the Big Jew in the clouds did tamper with the mind of an anonymous Egyptian king so that he would have a pretext for torturing to the limit the innocent Egyptian people for the delectation of his Chosen Bandits before they stole the Egyptians' portable property and ran away with it. One can understand why Christians' knees shake when they think of their capricious and sadistic god, but what is incomprehensible is the idiotic sentimentality of Christian females who try to cotton up to the ferocious monster by saying "God is Love."

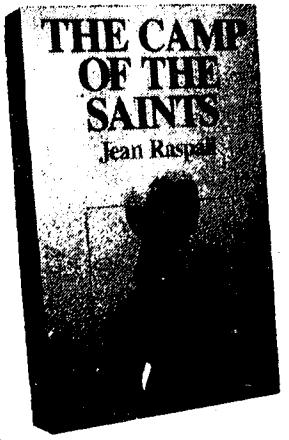
Perhaps they are trying to placate him, but the editor tells us that everything happens according to "God's will" and that the whole "course of history has been predetermined by the Creator." Whence it follows that the said Creator is responsible for every atrocity and every horror in all of human history and stands convicted of responsibility for every crime that has been or will be committed on this planet. Nice god, isn't he? But South Africans realize that "now, more than ever, it is necessary to go down on one's knees to join hands and look to the future in a spirit of continued humility and reconciliation."

Yes, there is an epidemic disease that rots brains, and it isn't kuru. □

Does the West have the will to survive?



That is the obvious question posed by Jean Raspail's terrifying novel of the swamping of the White world by an unlimited flood of non-White "refugees." But there is also a less obvious and even more fundamental question: Must Whites find their way to a new morality and a new spirituality in order to face the moral challenges of the present and overcome them? THE CAMP OF THE SAINTS is the most frightening book you will ever read. It is frightening because it it is utterly believable. The armada of refugee ships in Raspail's story is exactly like the one that dumped 150,000 Cubans from Fidel Castro's prisons and insane asylums on our shores in 1980 – except this time the armada is from India, with more than 70 times as large a population. And it is only the first armada of many. If any book will awaken White Americans to the danger they face from uncontrolled immigration, it is THE CAMP OF THE SAINTS. SWEET CHARITY

Jim Taylor

I have received a message from Mother Teresa of Calcutta, India. She wants to warn the American people about certain fraudulent practices, including outright theft of funds, which have been going on in the U.S. under her name. According to her, Robert Pearlman, a New York Jew, has been collecting money nation-wide under a fund name of the Foundation of Tribute to Mother Teresa.

The good sister said that none of the funds collected were ever sent for her use in alleviating poverty in India or anywhere else. She claims that Mr. Pearlman is stealing the money for his own use. She declared, "He and others are making use of our poverty to enrich themselves."

Sister Teresa said that she had asked the Attorney General of the State of New York to stop the unauthorized use of her name by a bunch of thieves. Her complaint, filed in the state court, states that the foundation in question uses mail solicitations and offers gifts in exchange for contributions.

Mr. Pearlman's foundation issued a statement that they fully intended to send the money to Mother Teresa but just hadn't gotten around to it yet because they were so busy. I guess this means they "forgot" to do so.

I don't envy Mother Teresa in her legal battle in New York. Her chances of getting a fraud conviction in that state are next to nil. □

by
Paul Knutson

As Aryans, we, by a biological imperative, are concerned for the survival and welfare of our race and, if we are not suffering from sickly delusions, we desire its supremacy over all other races. As Aryans, however, we have a probably unique capacity for objective thought. That permits us to examine the history and present status of our race without regard for our biologically necessary loyalty to it and temporarily strive to view ourselves with the cold impartiality with which a visitor from another solar system or another galaxy would regard us as merely one of the several races that are competing for existence and dominance on this odd planet.

We tend to consider the Nordic component of our race as its genetic élite, and we often encourage ourselves with one or another explanation of its present fecklessness in the United States or some other country in which it should theoretically be dominant. Almost all of the common explanations emphasize the Jews' success in destroying Germany and in doing so by inciting a kind of racial delirium in the Aryans whom they used for that purpose. Some explanations also take account of the effects of the enervating religion the Jews foisted upon our race in the early centuries of the present era.

This makes an objective appraisal of Sweden a datum of crucial importance in our problem. In his Racial Contours (Douglas, Isle of Man, 1965), H. B. Isherwood, an acute observer, confirmed by personal observation the anthropometric statistics that indicate the populations of Norway and Sweden contain the largest proportion of pure Nordic stock to be found in any nation, and expressed a belief that in those favored countries the Nordics, at least in terms of numbers, were still dominant.

Sweden maintained a precarious neutrality during the catastrophe that is called the Second World War or, more properly, the Suicide of Europe. She therefore escaped the terrible consequences of that insane war between Aryan nations. It is furthermore true that in no nation of our world has the population more completely emancipated itself from the trammels of the Christian superstitions, at least insofar as these are represented by avowedly Christian cults. Sweden has an established Lutheran church, but actual belief in its dogmas is not more common than is belief in Anglican doctrine in England.

A paucity of historical evidence makes obscure the early history of the Swedes (the Suiones, whom Tacitus mentions as the northernmost Germanic peoples), but we may be sure that in Sweden, as everywhere in the civilized world, as soon as the population became sufficiently prosperous to make swindling them profitable, Jews appeared to prey on them. And after Sweden succumbed to Christianity, a religion that forbade candidates for eternal bliss to lend money at interest, the nation's economic life was controlled by Yahweh's race, who, as Toynbee remarked with neat irony, were so persecuted by the Christians that they were forced to become rich and ever richer.

The parasites were naturally resented, but, by means of Christianity, they made the ignorant believe that they were a religion, not a distinct biological species. Thus, when it was best for business, they could have themselves sprinkled with the Christians' magic water and claim identity with the people they secretly despised. Otherwise, they were subject to laws that forbade them to settle permanently anywhere in Sweden—laws that they found many means of evading. The simplest means, of course, was that of keeping kings and territorial nobility enthralled by debts and usury.

The wars of Charles XII gave the Jews their great opportunity. When he was killed while directing a siege in 1718, leaving no successor but his weak and irresolute sister, Sweden was both financially prostrate and demoralized by the calamitous defeats that had followed some of the most brilliant victories of military history. The subtle invaders not only tightened the financial noose about the neck of the impoverished nation but had abundant tinder for surreptitiously kindling the blazing political and social antagonisms that ruin nations and make it easy for the parasites to batten on their deluded victims.

By 1782, Sweden was so corrupt that its government was eager to have wealthy Sheenies settle in the country and eat on the natives, but it had to conciliate the Swedish majority by maintaining a few restrictions: the dregs of the international race were excluded; the Jews were forbidden to traffic in liquor and drugs, their favorite means of spreading corruption and profiting from it; and Swedes were not permitted to marry Jews who had not been laundered in the Blood of the Lamb. But prosperous aliens were regularly exempted from all regulations by dispensations issued by the Department of Commerce, administered by bureaucrats who, when not simply overawed by wealth, responded to small bribes.

Even Jewish sources admit that the Chosen began to plunder Sweden so rapaciously and ostentatiously that they provoked a reaction. One cannot guess what might have happened, had not all Europe soon been distracted by the butchery and savagery of the French Revolution.

The Swedes had not lost all their healthy instincts, for when their government in 1838 tried to put over legislation in the interests of the "Mosaisker," as Jews were called to disguise their racial peculiarity, popular indignation forced revocation of the decree, and by 1846 at the latest the Swedes were aware that the question was one of an intolerable race, not of a bizarre religion. But the invaders had their mandibles too firmly fixed in the nation to be dislodged at that late date, and with their power over the press and imaginative "intellectuals," they induced a reaction in their favor by peddling "democracy" and "social welfare" and all the verbiage by which the acquisitive instincts are camouflaged as altruistic "idealism." Since 1853, they worked patiently and gradually to tighten their control over the unfortunate nation. And they made it a minor outpost of their financial empire, including the Nya Banken in Stockholm, through which went a considerable part of the Jewish financing of the Bolshevik Terror in Russia.

It was necessary to sketch this much of the background to explain the present plight of Sweden, which is now generally known throughout the world as a model of "social welfare" legislation with, of course, its concomitants, crushing taxation, general alcoholism, and a phenomenally high rate of suicide. In the United States, the word 'Swedish' is coming to mean just one thing, an especially blatant kind of pornography, perfected in a society "liberated" by universal promiscuity. Much "Swedish" pornography is produced in Hollywood, of course, so the adjective has become merely descriptive, just as French windows are not made in France.

It is true that Sweden was the country in which was produced a pornographic film that provided an occasion for

"landmark" decisions by the American courts in 1968, so that it became as important to the manufacturers of cinemas as Lady Chatterly's Lover had been to the book trade. It was entitled "I Am Curious" and was distributed in the slightly less offensive "yellow" version. The pornography was sicklied over with a pretense of "social significance" that enabled Jewish "experts" to testify in court that it was a highly artistic presentation of "the idea that we are living in a time of profound change," marked by "the emergence of the working class into what it hopes will be a classless society." That was window-dressing, of course, but there was some truth in the claim that the film did portray "Social Democracy" in Sweden.

The heroine is a young Swedish girl, quite pretty with or without her clothes and obviously feeble-minded—not by heredity but by the mental debility that, as all educators know, has to be induced to permit belief in such patent absurdities as the equality of races. In one scene in the film the weak-minded girl is shown seated on the floor in religious meditation before an icon that is an enlarged photograph of the bestial black face of America's most venerated rapist, and Communist hireling. In front of the saint's icon is an altar bearing symbolically a broken shotgun, and at the foot is a placard lettered in Swedish, "Non-Violence," below which the girl has written "Martin Luther King and I." In that one picture you have, in capsule form, a perspective of the degradation and degeneracy of the Aryan race in Sweden, as elsewhere.

The debasement of Sweden was recently exhibited to all the world by a case that unexpectedly embarrassed her venal politicians, who had doubtless counted on doing their dirty work without attracting attention.

In January 1982 the Swedish parliament passed an act that made it a criminal offense to show "disrespect for people of a certain race." The law was enacted, of course, at the behest of Yahweh's Master Race, but the commonly stated pretext for it was concern for the sensitive souls of the biological refuse that the Swedes were importing from Asia and even Africa to prove how broad-minded and imbecilic their race had become. It should be noted that since the act mentioned religion, it could not become law without the formal consent of Kyrkomöte (Convocation) of the Established Church of Sweden (essentially Lutheran), according to a provision of the Swedish constitution that has not yet been rescinded.

On 28 November 1982, Ditlieb Felderer was arrested on a charge of having been disrespectful to God's Race and brought before magistrates who, horrified by such wickedness, had him incarcerated for examination and harassment by Jewish or Jew-trained "psychiatrists," whose criterion of sanity, of course, is the ability to believe anything that Jews say.

Felderer is a man in his forties, born in Austria. According to the "Swedish" press, which is, I need not say, owned or controlled by the international race, Felderer is a Jew in the strict sense of that word (i.e., the son of a Jewess; that his father was also a Jew would be immaterial). Such charges are, of course, mere routine when the Jews set out to defame a man whom they wish to destroy—it will be remembered they even tried to blacken Hitler's name by concocting "evidence" that he was a Rothschild by birth—but in this case there appears to be some truth in the allegation. Felderer is said to have defected from his conspiratorial race by becoming a member of one of the odder Christian sects, Jehovah's Witnesses, from which he was speedily excommunicated when it was discovered that his Christianity did not include subservience to Jehovah's Pets.

Such a racial origin naturally makes Felderer a target of the special venom with which the Jews try to terrorize persons who have grown up in Jewish households and whom they consider Jews for the purpose of racial solidarity.* It also entitles Felderer to our special gratitude for the services he courageously performed for our cowed race.

Felderer's great crime was to write a booklet that listed the absurdities in the well-known hoax called "Anne Frank's Diary," for the benefit of persons who did not read it while awake. That is, of course, one of the most ludicrous of the Jewish hoaxes and cannot have imposed on anyone who read it while sober and had sufficient intelligence to remember what he had read on one page when he encountered flagrant contradictions a few pages later. The fiction is below the standards of even the most inept scribbler for "pulp" magazines, and the only problem is whether the numerous internal contradictions were the result of sheer negligence or were knowingly introduced in contempt for Aryans so feeble-minded or craven that they could believe, or profess to believe, such arrant nonsense.

* This includes a noteworthy nastiness. A wealthy Jew, who became nominally a Christian, married an Aryan woman, and publicly repudiated the racial religion, reported that when he was staying in a lavishly luxurious apartment hotel, such as few but Jews rich enough to afford, the wealthy Jews of both sexes whom he encountered in the elevators would spit on the clothing that he and his wife were wearing. An artist, son of a Jew by a White woman, was excluded from the house when his father remarried, and was even forbidden to attend his father's funeral.

Felderer wrote his exposé several years before the Jewish author was finally compelled to produce in a German court what he claimed was the original "diary" and German documentary experts had no trouble in ascertaining that part of the manuscript had been written with a pen that had not been manufactured, and with ink that had not been chemically compounded, until years after the supposed death of the "martyred" Jewess at the hands of the awful Gestapo. He first issued his analysis of the imposture on mimeographed sheets printed from stencils cut on a typewriter with type so small and condensed that the only readers were persons with acute eyesight and indefatigable patience. But then in 1979, his work was published as a well-printed booklet, entitled Anne Frank's Diary—A Hoax, by the Institute for Historical Review in Torrance, California. That was something that could not be ignored.

When Felderer was tried in the Swedish court, some of his other writings were also in question, but there could be no possible doubt about the accuracy of his analysis of the impudent hoax called a "diary." He was prosecuted for his "disrespect," to establish the principle that while cats may look at kings with impunity, no cur, whatever his race, shall look at one of God's Regents on Earth without fawning and frantically wagging his tail to propitiate his God-given masters. Felderer was also tried for "violating the freedom of the press," which, in Sweden, is freedom to print whatever Jews have approved. The penalty for Felderer's crime was two years in prison, but, with a great show of leniency, the court sentenced him to serve only ten months in jail, it probably being assumed that he would conveniently suffer a "heart attack" before he was released.

Sweden's great statesmen, however, were astonished to receive letters of protest from audacious Aryans in the United States, and, at first, they, with the efficiency of a pack of Chesapeake retrievers, laid the letters at the feet of their Jewish masters. But when a campaign of letter-writing, initiated by David McCalden, who publishes a "Revisionist Newsletter" in Manhattan Beach, California, brought a barrage of protests to various international organizations that profess concern for freedom of speech and could not ignore Felderer's case, the situation became embarrassing for the Swedish government, and the guilty man was summarily released from prison on 11 May 1983, since it was too late to murder him without unfavorable publicity that might react on Sweden's tourist trade. At last reports, however, Sweden's tame Nordics continue to harass him in whatever quasi-legal ways their ingenuity can devise, but he has not been silenced.

I thought it best to sketch this much of the background to the following translation from the Swedish. Justly perturbed by the Parliament's act of January 1982, designed to put Swedes in their proper place in the country that once was theirs, Nils Rydström, editor of Wärendsbladet, reprinted in his issue No. 7, 1983, an article about the persecution of a rather well-known Swede under less stringent earlier legislation in 1954. The article appeared early in 1955 in the periodical, Krets Nytt, and was prudently signed "Tirfing." (Students of Norse religion and literature will remember that Tyrfing was the name of the inerrant sword, forged by the Dvergar, mentioned in the Saga Heiðreks Konungs.) Here follows the translation; footnotes are distinguished by the appended names of their authors.

Introductory Note by Nils Rydström

Einar Åberg's international activity in opposition to the expansion of the International Zionists' power after the Second World War was the reason for the enactment of the law about the "Baiting of an Ethnic Group." In the text of that law, however, there is nothing to indicate that it is applicable to the mere fact of dissemination of information about what the Zionists are actually doing, nor does the law abolish our fundamental right to freedom of speech, as would be possible in our country, since we, in contrast to other lands, lack a corpus of constitutional laws. So the law about "Baiting of an Ethnic Group" is actually illegal.

IS EINAR ÅBERG IN THE RIGHT? IMPRISONED FOR QUOTING!

by Tirfing

The Magistrate's Court of Stockholm, by its decision No. BD

10/1954, sentenced Einar Åberg to two months' imprisonment for "baiting of an ethnic group." Entirely apart from the objections to that verdict that could be raised in terms of legal technicality (Åberg's leaflets were not publicly distributed in Sweden and therefore, according to Chapter 1, ¶6, of the freedom-of-the-press statute, his writing ought not be actionable), it is a fact that Åberg's writings in practically every single instance do no more than repeat what the Jews in various countries have themselves said about their own and their kinsmen's relationship to Marxism in general and to Communism in particular.

If, as those statements evince, it is clear that the international world-bankers have financed the Communist revolutions, that the leaders in the majority of cases have been Jews, and that the members of this tribe have done everything to support and spread Communism, then must we not demand presentation of the evidence instead of stoning the man who dares to utter the dreadful truth? But it seems to be true now that, as Luther said in his time, "When the Devil cannot accomplish something himself, he relies on men." Despite the fact that Communism and its bloody reign of terror, which has continued for more than thirty years, is now horribly threatening our culture and, indeed, our very existence, people refuse to discuss the facts as they are presented. Every demonstration of Jewish promotion of Communism and of Jewish efforts to create catastrophe on a global scale is called "'baiting an ethnic group of a certain ancestry and declaration of faith." All this is in complete conformity with the crucial demand that Red China made of Hammarskjöld,[1] "The West is to take official measures to impede all publicity with anti-Communist tendencies." Unpleasant facts are not to be presented or even mentioned.

That the Jews and their loyal troops, the Marxists of various cults, no less than the parlor Bolsheviks, attempt to silence men who know the truth is entirely understandable. But even though the lying Swedish press is constantly laying down a smoke screen of distorted news, it is nonetheless both alarming and humiliating to discover that the Swedish public is so totally blind to what is happening behind that smoke screen. If it were only the sluggish minds of the common folk[2] that succumbed to poisonous lies, one would not be greatly astonished. But it is more than ominous when one sees bureaucrats, judges, and physicians unhesitatingly volunteer to help the government in the foulest of the dirty work it performs whenever it is given the slightest hint by a Jewish organization or even by an individual "Israelite." We can only wonder whether they are charlatans who cravenly prostrate themselves before the red Hydra or they really have heads so stuffed with false ideas that they can neither perceive with their senses nor understand with their minds. The attitude they take reminds one of the Danish girl's reaction when she saw a giraffe at the zoo, "No, there can't be such an animal!"

1. Dag H. A. C. Hammarskjöld,. Ph. D., scion of a politically prominent Swedish family, was (as we would expect) Chairman of the Board of the Bank of Sweden and an indefatigable mouthpiece for the Jews' "One World" balderdash. He became the Secretary General of the talk-show called the "United Nations" and went to Peking to persuade Mao Tse-tung to participate in the song-and-dance act; he was given the ultimatum quoted in the text. In 1961, when he set out to "negotiate" with one of the savages he had helped install in the Congo, he or his corpse was on a plane that crashed in the jungle.—Knutson.

Even those who are unaware of the origin of Marxism and its development since 1847, when Karl Marx (Mordecai) and his German associate, Engels, wrote the Communist Manifesto, should be able to see that the incredible speed of the Communists' rise to power after 1917 must have been achieved by secret financial subvention, help from a mendacious press, and covert international direction. In what other way could a tiny minority, that numbered approximately 80,000 Communists in the whole world, have succeeded in devouring and subjugating about a third of the world's population in 1918? In his several pamphlets, Einar Åberg tries to elucidate the mystery. If he is wrong or the information he publishes is incorrect, that should be proved. But no one ever dares to mention the subject or say anything about it. Instead, attempts are made to shut him up at once with threats of "psychiatric examinations" as a preliminary to confinement, prosecution, and imprisonment. So long as Einar Åberg's reports of what the Jews themselves have said have not been proved to be either his own inventions or false quotations, the persecution of him is clearly comparable to the lettres de cachet of the French kings or the methods by which present-day dictators silence those who speak the truth.

That is precisely the crucial point of the whole question.

2. The Swedish is Medelsvensson, the equivalent of the German der deutsche Michel or the American 'Joe Blow' or 'Joe Doakes.'—Knutson.

Einar Åberg's writings, almost without exception, consist of quotations that come from Jewish leaders and learned and famous Jewish authors and journalists who were eminent in various periods of history. Among other things, he has repeatedly republished the pronouncement made by the leading Jewish periodical in the United States, the American Hebrew, September 10, 1920—a declaration that has also been quoted by Ford in his book, The International Jew:[3]

> That achievement (the Bolshevik Revolution in Russia) . . . was largely the outcome of Jewish thinking, of Jewish discontent . . . What Jewish idealism (!) and Jewish discontent have so powerfully contributed to accomplish in Russia, the same historic qualities of the Jewish mind and heart are tending to promote in other countries.

Isn't that confession alone enough to prove Einar Åberg's charges against the Jews? But innumerable others can be cited from different parts of the world. Here is an example from Bombay, India, from the Jewish Tribune of July 5, 1922:[4]

> The German Revolution[5] is the achievement of the Jews; the liberal democratic parties have a great number of Jews as their leaders, and the Jews play a predominant rôle in the high government offices.

3. Vol. I, p. 221, in the four-volume edition published by Liberty Bell Publications, $26.00 plus postage. This complete edition should not be confused with one-volume abridgements of Henry Ford's great work. —Editor.

4. Since the files of the Jewish periodical published in Bombay were not available, the quotation has been verified from the well-known compilation, Judaism in Action, 2d edition, 1964.—Editor.

5. The reference is to the Bolshevik Terror in Germany, 1918-1919, which was finally suppressed by veterans of the German Army, after which the Jews had to content themselves with stench and corruption of the Weimar Republic, which they used to plunder the entire nation by inflating the currency until it became worthless and the impoverished population could be stripped of its property, after which they continued to suck the blood of the Germans through their banking system. Germany became an independent nation in 1932, but the Jews, through their control over the rest of the Western world, reëstablished their ownership of their German serfs in 1945.—Knutson.

The functioning of Jews is even more forcefully expressed in a pronouncement by Rabbi Judas L. Magnes in 1919 (quoted in Léon de Poncin's Secret Forces Behind Revolutions[6]):

> Compare for an instant the present situation in Germany and Russia: the Revolution there has liberated creative forces,[7] and then admire the quantity of Jews who were there, ready for action and immediate service! Revolutionaries, Socialists, Mensheviks, Bolsheviks, majority and minority Socialists, whatever name one assigns them, they are all Jews, and one finds them as the chiefs or the workers in all revolutionary parties.

To these confessions we can add a few more data. The British Government's White Paper, published in April 1919 and entitled Russia, No. 1 (1919), contains a report, dated September 6, 1918, from M. Oudendyke, the Minister of the Netherlands' Government in St. Petersburg (later called Leningrad), who was then protecting British interests in Russia::

> I consider that the immediate suppression of Bolshevism is the greatest issue now before the world, not even excluding the war which is still raging, and unless . . . Bolshevism is nipped in the bud immediately, it is bound to spread in one form or another over Europe and the whole world, as it is organized and worked by Jews, who have no nationality and whose one object is to destroy for their own ends the existing order of things.

For further confirmation, one can find witnesses even in Sweden. Arthur Engberg wrote (naturally before he fell into financial entanglements and was subject to blackmail by certain

7. It must be remembered that the "creative forces" over which Rabbi Judas gloats were the wholesale butchery in Russia, about which a few statistics are given below, and the atrocious murders perpetrated by the Jewish Terrorists in Germany, who had not yet been checked at the time that the rabbi exulted over the slaughter in both countries of the Aryans his race has always hated; it annually refreshes its lust for Aryan blood in a ceremony called Purim, which celebrates a fictitious massacre of Aryans throughout the Persian Empire at some time a few centuries before the beginning of the Christian Era.–Knutson.

THE "HOLOCAUST" — FACT OR FICTION?

Were six million Jews really gassed . . . or has a colossal hoax been perpetrated on the world?

Professor Butz has carefully investigated the alleged extermination of 6 million Jews during WW II and has written a book which thoroughly documents his startling findings. His book strips away the cover of fraud and deceit from this emotion-charged topic and lays bare the full and complete truth.

HERE IS A BOOK in lucid question/answer format that tackles virtually all the myths and distortions propagated by the "Holocaust" Establishment—a book for young and old alike.

- Presents ideas and information not found in other books in this field.
- Short, well-organized and up-to-date on the latest ideas and research.
- Suitable for the classroom as a counterbalance to "Holocaust" studies.
- Gives a historical background of the Jewish problem in Europe, examines the motivations of various groups with regard to the Extermination thesis, and introduces the reader to the more detailed literature on the subject.
- Written by a former professor with a Ph.D. in an historical discipline whose training as a linguist gave him access to literature in various languages, and whose U.S. military intelligence experience in WWII included his residence in Europe during 1945-48 with assignments involving him in preparations for the Nuremberg Trials.

In the classroom; in debates; for the novice revisionist, the inquisitive and skeptical—nothing could be as useful as Dr. Weber's The "Holocaust"—120 Questions and Answers. 120 questions that rouse thought. 120 fully-referenced answers that blow the lid off the blackout. A book of this scope and format has been needed for a long time. Here you have it: easy-to-read, written and priced for wide distribution—and an answer to today's obsession with Holocaustiana.

photographers) in the newspaper Arbetet on March 3, 1921:

> Everywhere in the realm of the commissars one finds the Jews. There is warrant for the claim that the dictatorship of the proletariat really means the dictatorship of the Jews over the Russians.

If we investigate the identity of the leaders of the Revolution and of the ruling class that followed it, we quickly find that the statements quoted above were correct. Of course, the Jews tried to hide their identity in every possible way[8] and they assumed Russian names as aliases, thus escaping detection by the stolid masses. But their real names are known, and we shall here publish the true names of a few of the most famous characters:

Kerensky = Adler.[9] Trotsky = Bronstein. Kamenev = Rosenfeld. Zinoviev = Apfelbaum. Litvinov = Finkelstein. Kamkov = Katz. Steklov = Nakhamkes. Radek = Sobelssohn.

The list could be extended indefinitely, but instead we shall give statistics to show how many Jews there were among the leaders. In Lenin's[10] time the proportions were the following:

8. By the simple device of using two names and taking citizenship in both the 'host' country and the international Jewish-Zionist state, they (the Jews) easily deceive unsuspecting Christians and the Zionists' other fellow-travellers.—Rydström.

9. Unlike the other criminals listed here, Kerensky did not simply invent the Russian name under which he disguised his race. He was the son of a Jew named Aaron Kerbis by a Jewess named Adler; if his father and mother were married, his real name would be Kerbis, but it appears that he was illegitimate and so entitled only to his mother's name. Kerensky was the name of a Russian so stupid that he married the Adler woman, thus becoming her illegitimate son's stepfather. It is beyond doubt that Kerensky, as he called himself, prepared the way for the Bolsheviks by every means within his power when he was head of the government that replaced the Czar in 1917. Jewish apologists like to claim that he did not know what he was doing, and that he was heart-broken when he left Russia and took up a very comfortable and luxurious "exile" in France. However that may be, he is a perfect specimen of the "non-Communist Left" that the American people are financing throughout the world, as their so-called Central Intelligence Agency admits it is doing; it, however, knows what it is doing. The "non-Communist Left" is precisely like a woman who is only a little pregnant.—Knutson.

10. As is well known, "Lenin" was the alias taken by a vicious criminal named Ulyanov, who is generally classified as "Russian" although he did not have a drop of Russian blood. His father was a Tatar (i.e., Turco-Mongolian) who had taken a Russian name; his mother was a 1917-1918: out of 316 high-ranking commissars, 300 were Jews.

1920: out of 457, 322 were Jews.

1921: out of 550, 447 were Jews.

1922: out of 525, 445 were Jews.

Approximately the same proportion existed in Stalin's time. The following summary is extracted from The Jewish Question, published at Paris in 1931:

The Council of the People's Commissariat: out of a total membership of 22, 17 are Jews = 72.2%.

The Commissariat of War: out of a total of 43, 33 are Jews = 76.6%.

The Commissariat of Finance: out of a total of 30, 24 are Jews = 80%.

The Commissariat of the Foreign Ministry: out of a total of 16, 13 are Jews = 81.2%.

The Commissariat of Justice: out of a total of 21, 20 are Jews = 95.2%.

The Commissariat of Propaganda: out of a total of 53, 42 are Jews = 79.2%.

The Commissariat of Public Works: out of a total of 8, 7 are Jews = 87.5%.

The Social Commissariat: out of a total of 6, 6 are Jews = 100%.

The Commissariat of Journalism: out of a total of 41, 41 are Jews = 100%.

The Red Cross Delegations in Berlin, Vienna, Warsaw, Bucharest, and Copenhagen: out of a total of 8, 8 are Jews = 100%.

These figures should suffice, so we should now notice the savagery by which the Revolution was conducted and achieved. In the newspaper Red Gazette, September 1, 1918, Trotsky (Bronstein) declared, "We shall make our hearts as hard as iron. We shall harden them in the fires of perseverance and in the blood of the enemies of freedom(!). We shall drown those enemies by the thousands in their own blood." His comrade and kinsman, Zinoviev (Apfelbaum) wrote, at approximately the same time, in the Leningrad newspaper, Nordkommunen, September 18, 1919: "We shall take control! Ninety million of the Russian people are already under Soviet power and control. We shall liquidate the rest!"

It is estimated that in the early part of Lenin's régime, Trotsky caused the death of more than three million people, most of them in the most bestial fashion. A. D. Fredex refers to this in his book, Soviet America,[11] as follows: "There are large numbers of eyewitnesses to these events . . . And in every case[12] the details are so horrifying in themselves that it is impossible to print them."

Some conception of those appalling events may be derived from the official report of the United States Röhrberg Commission of Inquiry,[13] which is quoted in the monthly magazine, Nation and Race, August, 1936, under the title, "The Mystery of Red Russia":[14]

Jewess. He was therefore a Jew by orthodox Jewish standards, according to which the race of the father is of no significance.—Knutson.

14. The periodical cited in the Swedish was not available, and text of the report of the Röhrberg Commission is—for obvious reasons—hard to find these days. I have accordingly transcribed a section of that report quoted by S. P. Melgounov in The Red Terror in Russia (London, Dent, 1926), p. 176. I have copied the long paragraph without a break, thus including sentences that were omitted when it was condensed by either the Swedish journalist or the magazine from which he translated.—Knutson.

11. This book was not available, so the quotation is translated back into English from the Swedish.—Knutson.

12. Swedish i sin helhet, 'in their entirety.'—Knutson.

13. The Röhrberg Commission was sent into Kiev (a city on the Dnepr River in the northern part of the Ukraine) immediately after it was recaptured from the Bolsheviks by the army of General Denikin in August, 1919. The Commissioners reported the evidence, seen with their own eyes, of the operations of the Cheka. (The word is an acronym formed from the initial letters of a Russian title meaning 'Extraordinary Commission.' The use of such abbreviations was once characteristically Bolshevik, but has now been popularized in the civilized world by the proto-Communist governments of "welfare states.") The officers of the Cheka were all Jews, but they had with them degenerates of Tatar and Tatar-Chinese ancestry, who were used for menial tasks. Much of the actual butchery may have been done by those subordinates for the entertainment of their superiors. After their capture of Kiev, the Jewish officers of the Cheka felt free to enjoy themselves, as described in the quotation below, and did not anticipate that the results of their fun would become known to the civilized world when they were, for a short time, driven out by the Russian army of General Denikin, who could have reëstablished civilization in Russia, had he received any real support from the West, where, however, Britain and the United States were in the hands of Lloyd George and Woodrow Wilson, who favored the Bolsheviks and made a few token gestures of support for the anti-Communist Russians to cover their clandestine sabotage of opposition to the Bolsheviks, both in Russia and the Ukraine and in Siberia.—Knutson.

The place had formerly been a garage, and then the provincial Cheka's main slaughter-house. And the whole of it was coated with blood—blood ankle-deep, coagulated with the heat of the atmosphere, and horribly mixed with human brains, chips of skull-bone, wisps of hair, and the like. Even the walls were bespattered with blood and similar fragments of brain and scalp, as well as riddled with thousands of bullet holes. In the centre was a drain about a quarter of a metre deep and wide, and about ten metres long. This led to the sanitary system of the neighboring house, but was choked to the brim with blood. This horrible den contained 127 corpses, but the victims of the previous massacre had been hurriedly buried in the adjacent garden. What struck us most about the corpses was the shattering of their skulls, or the complete flattening out of those skulls, as though the victims had been brained with some such instrument as a heavy block. And there were corpses the heads of which were altogether missing. But in these cases the missing heads cannot possibly have been cut off. They must have been wrenched off. In the main, bodies were identifiable only if they had left on them some such mark as a set of gold-mounted teeth [i.e., having gold dental fillings]—left, of course, only because the Bolsheviks had not had time to extract them.[15] And in every case the corpses were naked. Also, though it had been the Bolsheviks' rule to load their victims on wagons and lorries as soon as massacred, and take them outside the town for burial, we found that a corner of the garden near the grave already described had in it another, older grave, and that this second grave contained eighty bodies which in every instance bore almost unimaginably horrible wounds and mutilations. In this grave we found corpses with, variously, entrails ripped out, no limbs remaining (as though the bodies had been literally chopped up), eyes gouged out, and heads and faces and trunks all studded with stab wounds. Again, we found a body which had had a pointed stake driven through its chest, whilst in several cases the tongue was missing. And placed together in one corner of the grave we found a medley of detached arms and legs, as well as, near the garden fence, some corpses which bore no sign at all of death by violence. It was only a few days later that, on these unmarked bodies being subjected to post-mortem examination, our doctor discovered their mouths and throats and lungs to be choked with earth. Clearly the unfortunate wretches had been buried alive, and had drawn the earth into their respiratory organs through their desperate efforts to breathe. And it was persons of all ages and both sexes—old, and middle-aged, and women and children—that we found in the grave. One woman was lying tied with a rope to her daughter, a child of eight; and both bore shot wounds. Further, a grave in the yard of the building yielded the body of a Lieutenant Sorokin (accused of espionage on behalf of the Volunteer [General Denikin's] Army) and the cross on which he had been crucified a week before our arrival. Also, we found a chair like a dentist's chair which still had attached to it straps for the binding of its tortured victims. And the whole of the concrete floor around the chair was smeared with blood, and fragments of human skin, and bits of hairy scalp. And the same with the premises [headquarters] of the district Cheka, where, similarly, the floor was caked with blood and fragments of bone and brain. There, too, a conspicuous object was the wooden block upon which the victims had had to lay their heads for the purpose of being brained with a crowbar, with, in the floor beside it, a traphole filled to the brim with human brain-matter from the shattering of skulls.[16]

The report concludes, characteristically, "Similar events happened simultaneously or at other times throughout

16. If you want more information about Jewish Idealism in Action, you will find, immediately following this excerpt in Melgounov's book, another excerpt from the report of the Röhrberg Commission, which describes some of the methods of torture used with Talmudic ingenuity to prolong suffering by delaying death. Most of the book deals with similar

Russia."[17]

The worst of the angels of death was Béla Kun,[18] subsequently the executioner in Hungary and Spain. Among his prominent assistants [in 1918] one could name: Kohn in Kharkov, Länder in the Northern Caucasus, Schwartz in the Ukraine, along with Schulmann, Finkelstein, Ehlenkrieg, and Greenstein in Kiev—all Jews!

The "Swedish" press has kept silent about almost all of these outrages and, naturally, it has never breathed a word about the part played by "men of Jewish heritage" in those incredible cruelties. But our journalists cannot exculpate themselves by pleading ignorance of the Reign of Terror! An official document from the Cheka's Bureau of Statistics in Lyubiyanka gives exact figures showing the number of persons who were "liquidated," that is to say, murdered in the years 1921 and 1922. The death toll for those years is the following:

The Czar's family in its entirety.[19]

Bolshevik amusements as reported by many witnesses. It is remarkable that Melgounov, either through ignorance or to meet his publisher's requirements, never discloses the fact that the Jews were totally responsible for this application of their famous longing to bring Righteousness and Social Justice to the world; he always refers to Jews by their Russian aliases, and he even refers frequently to the "All-Russian Cheka," a phrase which will mislead readers who do not know that that was the official name for the overall supervision of the Cheka as distinguished from its regional branches. All, of course, were run by Jews, who were naturally happy that they did not have to moderate their pleasures to avoid shocking the unsubjugated goyim. It is quite possible that Melgounov's work was censored by the publisher. The pavid British publisher (Butterworth) excluded from Robert Wilton's The Last Days of the Romanovs the information about the Jews that Wilton included in his French version, Les derniers jours des Romanof.—Knutson.

17. Note that here, as often happens, 'Russia' is improperly used to designate all or most of the whole territory of the former Russian Empire, just as one sees the designation 'Russian' given to Ukrainians, Georgians, Tatars, or almost any other inhabitants of the polyglot and multi-racial territory that the Jews took from the Russians in 1917-1918.—Knutson.

18. Kun is, of course, the Hungarian spelling of Cohen. The infamous slaughterer began his career as a journalist at Cluj in Rumania, and, by the way, he was the editor of the Bolshevik newspaper, the Red Gazette, when it published the statement by Bronstein that was quoted above.—Knutson.

19. There can be no doubt about the accuracy of the offical Bolshevik report about the murder of the Romanovs, particularly since Ekaterinburg came into the hands of an anti-Bolshevik army for a time and the site was

The Soviet Government published substantially the same reckoning in an official publication in May, 1922, wherein it stated that those victims were persons who had been despatched on account of their "anti-social mentality."[20] Accordingly—please note!—it was not for offenses against or activities inimical to the Bolsheviks, but only for their "'mentalities." [21] then inspected. For the details, see the work, cited in Note 16 above, by Robert Wilton, who was at that time the correspondent of the London Times in Russia. Various impostors, both male and female, have appeared from time to time, each hoping to obtain a substantial income from a claim that he or she survived the massacre by some miracle. More recently, two gullible American journalists, inspired by the sweet aroma of gold supposedly stored in Switzerland, helped launch a more ambitious canard, a claim that the entire Imperial family had been secretly rescued and brought to safety in the West, whereupon the Czar, taking his entire family with him, as secretly returned and they all, disguised, lived happily in Soviet territory. Fish never learn not to snap at worms dangled before them.—Knutson.

20. The Swedish tänkesätt means 'way of thinking, turn of mind,' and could be translated as 'mind-set,' in the psychological and sociological jargon that is continually coined to confuse superficial minds. The purpose which the Bolsheviks indiscreetly confessed in this statement corresponds to what advanced thinkers euphemistically call "social engineering," i.e., altering a subject population biologically by extirpating the genes and other hereditary factors that may make individuals insubordinate to their masters. As a French historian said of an ancient attempt to enslave a nation, "after striking down those who complained, the tyranny began to extirpate those who might complain." We should not underestimate the extent of the biological change that the Bolsheviks' wholesale slaughter effected in the Russians and Ukrainians, the only two native populations that really counted when the Russian Empire was conquered by the Jews.—Knutson.

21. This fact makes the perpetual harangue about "six million Jews gassed to death" fade into insignificance. But this fact is always passed over in silence, and why shouldn't people [i.e., journalists, etc.] do what they have already been paid for doing?—Rydström.

Commenting on those official statistics, the periodical Kyrka och Folk ("Church and People"), edited by a distinguished clergyman, in the issue of June, 1925, remarked: "This means that three years ago one and three-quarters millions had already lost their lives, often after unimaginable suffering and actual torture, because their minds were of a certain quality and they were therefore suspected, rightly or wrongly, of disliking their governors. And what an ocean of human suffering lies behind those numbers! And it is only a small gang of a few hundred or thousand power-hungry individuals, most of them Jews (a fact that must be italicized), who, without the slightest moral or human compunction, are sending a flood of blood over an entire nation."

Our cowardly press has suppressed that awful truth and has kept silent when confronted by the efforts of packs of murderers of the same "descent" to reproduce their work in practically every country of Europe. We need only mention a few names which are in themselves fully significant: Karl Liebknecht and Rosa Luxemburg, Kurt Eisner (Salomon Kosmanovsky from Poland)[22]; Jakob Berman, the dictator in Poland; Anna Pauker in Rumania; Moisje Pijade in Yugoslavia; Kirchenstein in Riga; et al., et al. There are fairly complete lists of the leading Jews behind the Iron Curtain, and we intend to return to this subject on another occasion. The talk about official anti-Semitism[23] there is absolutely without foundation.[24] Lazar Kaganovich (Kohn) has occupied a position of

22. Kosmanovsky seems to have been born in Berlin, the son of Jews who came into Germany from Poland. He disguised himself by assuming a German name, and in reference works that have been subjected to Jewish censorship he is described as a "German"!—Knutson.

23. The Swedish, like other languages, uses the term 'anti-Semitism' that was cunningly foisted into modern languages by the Jews to confuse their victims. There is a strong Semitic strain in the Jews, but they must not be confused with the real Semites, members of the race that the Jews, according to their legends, exterminated when they invaded Canaan and are now trying to exterminate or enslave in Asia Minor. Writers who respect language as a means of factual communication will always use 'anti-Jewish' to say what they mean.—Knutson.

24. This was certainly true when Tirfing wrote in 1954 and is probably true today, although propaganda in the Jewish-controlled press would pretend otherwise, and much is made of the supposed plight of Jews in Soviet territory who want to go to Israel on their way to the United States to reënforce the hordes that now occupy that country.—Knutson.

secret power behind the Soviet régime ever since 1917, and he sees to it that the "Chosen People" are not impeded in the exercise of their domination.[25] Of course, there have been "purges" in which some Jews got into trouble, but these were caused by struggles between their different factions or, as in the case of Slánský in Prague, by the fight between Zionists and International Jews over a policy directed against the Arabs, whom the latter were trying to win over to the Communist side at that time. And the Slánský affair itself offered the best proof of the Jews' position of power in Czechoslovakia: of the eleven principal figures in the government, nine were Jews!

The confession made in the American Hebrew, September 10, 1920, which we quoted above, contains the significant admission, "What Jewish idealism and Jewish discontent have so powerfully contributed to accomplish in Russia, the same historic qualities of the Jewish mind and heart are tending to promote in other countries." This statement, coming from an authoritative Jewish source, is further evidence of the Jews' relation to Communism, and it provides an explanation of the fact that most of the spies connected with the development of the atomic bomb are Jews. We can name, as examples, Rosenberg, who was sentenced to death in the United States, and his assistants, Harry Gold and David Greenglass; Klaus Fuchs, who, thanks to Albert Einstein's recommendation, gained access to atomic secrets; and the famous Pontecorvo, who escaped to Russia through Sweden. And we cannot overlook Robert Oppenheimer, who sabotaged development of the hydrogen bomb in the United States for four years in order to give the Communists in Russia time to take a head-start in 25. It is little noticed that at least during the years 1936-1939, the supreme control over the Soviet was exercised by the "'Secretariat of the Central Committe," a position that was held jointly by Kaganovich and Stalin, who married Kaganovich's daughter. It was Kaganovich who directed the famous "purge" in 1936-1937, which Jewish propaganda claims was anti-Jewish because a few of the victims were Jews. It was widely believed that Stalin (whose real name was Dzhugashvili and who appears to have been a Georgian) intended to take action against the Jews after he discovered that he was being systematically poisoned by his Jewish physicians, but he died very promptly thereafter and even before he could bring to trial the practitioners of Jewish medicine, who were, of course, released and exonerated after his remarkably convenient death. What part Kaganovich played in that operation is, of course, unknown. He probably held the reins of power while Malenkov had his turn on the stage as Stalin's successor, but he is said to have become senile before he was "expelled" from the Politburo in 1957.—Knutson.

If one is neither blinded by prejudice nor anxious, for some reason, to obstruct the communication of the truth, he must certainly admit that Einar Åberg has adequate grounds for the campaign he has carried on for years and years to warn us. But instead of being honored as a courageous national hero, Einer Åberg has been persecuted unremittingly and in the most shameful way by the government, the press, and all sorts of stooges within the bureaucracy, and by physicians and judges. The government's position can be explained by reference to a pronouncement made in the Jüdisches Volksblatt of Vienna in July, 1900:

> Let us help the Social Democrats wherever that is possible,[26] but let us do it cautiously so that the large masses will not notice that they are actually Jewish outsposts.

With Dagens Nyheter and the Göteborgs Handels- och Sjöfartstidning firmly in Jewish hands, together with the Svenska Dagbladet, inspired by its evil genius, Järte (who could well be called 'Bonnier'), it is not hard to explain the attitude of the principal press organization, but the fact that the rest of the press joins in the howling of the wolf-pack shows a baseness or stupidity so great that one cannot avoid asking himself whether there is not one single brave man in the profession or whether all of the gentlemen who sit at editor's desks throughout the nation are totally without intelligence, honesty, and loyalty.

The Jews everywhere try to dodge the charge of Communist conspiracy by calling it all "anti-Semitism." That is nonsense! We who are Swedes do not hate them or blame them for being Jews. It is their Communist activity, whether as individuals or in organizations that operate throughout the nation, that we condemn and fear. Their action to promote Satanic Marxism in its various guises is what we believe to be a menace to the world that must be fought to the utmost.

The suppression of truth is treason to the Western World, and the persecution of Einar Åberg is a disgrace to Sweden.

(End of article.)

26. Former Prime Minister Tage Erlander [the head of the Social Democrats in Sweden] must have based his idle dreams of establishing a Soviet state in Sweden on an expectation of generous financial subsidies from International Zionism. That would explain his crocodile tears at the time of Israel's "Six Day War,"" which he first expected them to lose.—Rydström.

It was in 1954 that Tirfing, in the article we have translated, deplored the disgrace and degradation of his country. In thirty years that have followed, Sweden has only become more morally abject. The Social Democrats, the great engine of political corruption that battened on Sweden for forty years, were defeated in the elections of 1976, but in Sweden, as elsewhere in the world, the political victory of professed "conservatives" brought no alleviation, and the Social Democratic gang returned to power in 1982. In nations, a "welfare state" is the counterpart of addiction to morphine or heroin in individuals. A very few persons have the intelligence and fortitude voluntarily to place themselves in a sanatorium before their dependence on narcotics has become irreversible. That is impossible in nations that have paralysed their national will-power by "democracy." Unless, perchance, they still have a healthy and sane minority that has the courage and means to carry out a revolution, they can only sink ever deeper into imbecility and the status that Jews grant to their livestock.

In Soviet Russia a Professor of Semitic Languages, Valery Nikolayevich Yemelyanov, circulated among persons he thought trustworthy a confidential memorandum in which he proposed the formation of an international organization to prevent completion of the Jewish conquest of the globe. A copy came into the hands of Jews and poor Yemelyanov was promptly fired from his university position, seized by the Russian secret police and incarcerated in a "psychiatric hospital" as "paranoid." His fate is unknown. In Sweden, Ditlieb Felderer dared to suggest that the Jews' Holohoax was what it is, a gigantic fiction. He was arrested by the high-minded Swedes, handcuffed, and dragged away to the government's Psychiatric Bureau (States Rättspsykiatriska Klinik), where he was "examined" for two weeks by the learned psychiatrists (race undetermined), who certified that he was a persona pathologica paranoides, but did not authorize his confinement as violently insane. He was then tried and convicted of the atrocious crime of not believing whatever Yahweh's Master Race chooses to tell its serfs. Thrown into a prison filled with rapists and murderers, who, he says, were treated far more kindly than he was and were not subjected to physical and mental torture, Felderer would probably not have been heard of again, had not vehement protests from the United States procured his release.

We, who still hope that the Nordics may represent the best of the entire Aryan race, can take no comfort from the fact that, at latest reports, Felderer is still alive and enjoys a precarious freedom. The well-known South African journalist, Ivor Benson, had not heard of the imprisonment and torture of Felderer by the Swedish Government, and did not even know that such a thing was possible in Sweden, when he wrote his recent tribute to the memory of George Orwell, the author of the famous book 1984. In the course of that essay he wrote: "Sweden today is an even more chilling prototype of socialist totalitarianism than the Soviet Union, precisely because it has nothing remotely resembling the KGB, no torture chambers [!] and no slave camps—for there the great majority of the people have been so thoroughly conquered in their minds that these appurtenances of violence are not yet needed."

It is true that there was still in Sweden one man who dared to speak the truth, but remember, please, that Felderer was not a Swede by birth and is not a Nordic.

The best that can be said for the Nordics of Sweden, who now bark at men of courage and try to bite them in the expectation that the Jews will throw them a bone, is that those heirs of Vikings and Varangians have thus far strangely failed to take advantage of their opportunity to give a public demonstration of their devotion to their God-given masters.

As all readers of the Bible (e.g., Isaiah 49:23) and the Dead Sea Scrolls (The War, p. 297 in Gaster's translation) well know, when Righteousness is established on Earth, Aryan kings (but no lesser creatures) will be accorded the privilege of using their tongues to lick the dirt from the feet of barefoot Jews. Now Sweden, unlike many Aryan nations, has a king, but, for some reason, His Majesty, Carl XVI Gustaf, has not instituted a practice that would win for his Nordic nation commendation from the New York Times and the other mouthpieces with which Jews manufacture "world opinion" for the guidance of their cattle.

FAREWELL TO A DOOMED NATION

by
Jim Taylor

This is one story I wish I didn't have to write. But it is necessary. I feel I am writing an obituary for a once-proud and gallant nation. And that nation, presently a very disturbed one, is the Republic of South Africa.

During the past three years I have studied carefully the South African situation in all the broad spectrum of political turmoil which exists there. When will the catastrophe come? I cannot tell you the exact date. It may be fairly soon. Or it may be after a gradual erosion, already started by the nation's leaders, which will require a few more years. But make no mistake about it. The end is near. The breakdown in the barriers which always protected this fine country began with the Prime Minister's decision to "go along with it." Now that same theory in Rhodesia didn't work very well, did it? So why should any sane person believe it will be any different for South Africa? Yes, the last hour will strike. The course is set. There can be no turning back. From now on, it is merely a question of time.

I always liked and admired South Africa. The people, the climate, and the progressive spirit which built the nation from dirt, sand, swamps, and grassland to a small but powerful country which has more than proved its worth despite a world-wide propaganda program against South Africa. The industrious people who live around the Horn of Africa deserve a far better fate. I most certainly wish that the South African story could have a different ending. But there is no chance of that now. To use an old saying from the southern part of the U.S., it's all over but the shoutin'. South Africa is done for. It is fruitless to talk about saving the country, because the majority of the whites have already voted for their own untimely destruction. I must conclude that although powerful forces outside South Africa brought great pressure to bear on the nation, in the final analysis it was the white citizens inside

South Africa who sealed their everlasting fate on this earth.

During the past year, I have studied newspapers and magazine reports on South Africa, especially the excellent articles in the South African Observer, edited by Mr. S. E. D. Brown. If everyone in South Africa were as knowledgeable and astute as Mr. Brown, there would be no need for me to write this column about the demise of such a lovely land.

There are many reasons for the pending downfall of South Africa. No need to discuss most of them because they are already so well known. But I should like to let readers all over the world know of a direct cause of the coming disaster which most have not thought about or mentioned in any way. I refer to the extremely close-knit relationship between South Africa and the parasitic state of Israel. Despite some minor aid which South Africa may have received from the Zionists, Jews living in South Africa, the United States and Israel worked together in order to change public opinion on race relations just enough to shift the balance of power away from apartheid within the country. And they did it behind the scenes, without publicity and without most South African whites even knowing that a trap had been set for them at the voting booths.

Despite the official friendship, if you can give that name to any relationship with an untrustworthy ally like Israel, every single program or piece of American legislation to restrict or boycott South Africa had the backing of American and Israeli Jews. Yes, South Africans, your supposed "friends" did this to you. Editorial after editorial in the American press against the policies of South Africa originated with either the Jewish Lobby or the Israeli Embassy in Washington. And no daily newspaper in the United States of America is ever going to refuse to print anything sent to it by the all-powerful Zionists.

I really hesitate to bring a personal reference into this article, but it is the only sure way I have to convince readers world-wide of Zionist influence in the fall of South Africa.

In 1979, after I had written articles and spoken at universities about South Africa in highly-favorable terms, I received a very nice letter from Mr. Donald B. Sole, then South Africa's ambassador to the United States. Even in that period I was one of the very few writers, if not the only American journalist, who dared to state any complimentary truths about South Africa. It just wasn't a popular thing to do. And I took a lot of abuse for it. There was so much anti-South African propaganda in the U.S. secretly, and at times openly, disseminated by American Jews through the NAACP and other organizations, that no newspaper, radio or television program would even allow spokesmen from South Africa to give their side. I appeared to be very much alone in my efforts to be fair to the people of South Africa.

Anyway, Ambassador Sole informed me that the South African Consulate in Chicago would send someone from that office to Kansas City to talk with me about visiting South Africa. At that time, I was working as an editor of TV Guide at the magazine's regional office in Kansas City.

In January of 1980, the South African government sent Mr. Piet Gerber of the Consulate in Chicago to meet me in Kansas City. He phoned me one morning at my office in the Country Club Plaza district and informed me that he was staying at the Alameda Plaza Hotel, a few blocks from my office. That evening we had dinner at his hotel. We talked about the political situation in South Africa and he told me that he had visited the Kansas City Star and several Kansas City television stations in an attempt to get interviews and/or newspaper space. He got nothing. Not a single word in the newspapers or any television interviews. I knew that there was a press boycott by the controlled U.S. press against anything which might in the least favor South Africa. But I pointed out to him that every South African black renegade who showed up in America automatically got the red carpet treatment: pages in the daily newspapers with complete photo layouts, dinners in his honor, and television interviews galore.

The government of South Africa was receiving the cold shoulder from not only the U.S. press but from every city, state and federal official in the country. I was, perhaps, the only American journalist who was going to try to change this. I planned to do all I could for South Africa.

At this point, the government of South Africa was anxious to have me visit that country and write a series of articles on the problems there. But then, I was asked if I had written any books. I said that I had written numerous books on a variety of subjects and that next month another book of mine about the Mideast, called Pearl Harbor II, would be published in London. Mr. Gerber said he would be interested in reading it, so I told him that I would send his name and address in for a complimentary press copy of the VIP edition of it.

He told me that I would be hearing from him soon about going to South Africa.

Then guess what happened? My book was published. The South African Consulate and the Ambassador received copies of it. Now to understand what happened next, you have to know that Pearl Harbor II reveals all the sordid details of the vast number of criminal acts committed by the Israelis, including the planned destruction of the American naval ship, the U.S.S. Liberty. It tells the truth about the Zionists and their unholy international plans in no uncertain terms.

Well, from that fateful day early in 1980, when South African officials read my latest book, until now, I have never heard one single word from any South African official anywhere. I have had no contact at all with them. The only reason, of course, was because my book revealed the truth about Israel, supposedly the best and perhaps the only "friend" the Republic of South Africa had at that time.

I was shocked beyond belief when I wrote to South African officials in the U.S. and never received any replies whatsoever. Also, Ambassador Sole and the people in the Chicago Consulate of South Africa refused to accept my phone calls. It really surprised me greatly that supposedly adult, thinking persons, such as these South African officials, could act like children. It was the type of temper-tantrum politics one might associate with Israel, but not with the representatives of a very courageous nation such as South Africa.

Now please be kind enough to recall how badly these same South African officials were being treated by the U.S. news media and U.S. officials. Well, isn't that exactly the same treatment I received from them? And I was one of the very few friends South Africa had in the United States.

This is 1984 but the extremely brash and rude treatment accorded me years ago by South Africa remains fresh in my mind. However, what I feel and what happened to me are not important. What is important is the imminent downfall of South Africa, which is destined to become a second Rhodesia, run by a few black and white thugs. If you don't believe me, ask the few remaining whites in what used to be Rhodesia about how many white women have been raped repeatedly by rampaging blacks there. And, just think, you South African whites, you now have this to look forward to in the very near future, if you don't leave your homeland quickly.

I am not trying to tell you that Israel is totally responsible for the downfall of South Africa. But, what is unknown to most of you South Africans, is that the unflagging devotion of your government to Israel and to the evils of international Zionism helped to destroy your hopes for the future without your even realizing what was happening.

And when South African officials, including an ambassador who should have known better, boycotted a writer friendly to South Africa because he was not a lover of Zionism, then you were giving out the same treatment which South Africa was receiving from most of the world. If any nation ever needed friends, it was South Africa.

And do you people really believe that by some miracle Israel is going to rescue South Africa? If so, you don't know the Zionists as I do. They will laugh as you go down the drain. But an old rejected former friend of South Africa like myself will not be laughing. □

THE "HOLOCAUST" – FACT OR FICTION?
Were six million Jews really gassed—or has a colossal hoax been perpetrated on the world?

Professor Arthur Butz has carefully investigated the alleged extermination of 6,000,000 Jews during World War II and has written a book which thoroughly documents his startling findings. His book strips away the cover of fraud and deceit from this emotion-charged topic and lays bare the full and complete truth.

Letters to the Editor

Dear Mr. Dietz: 22 March 1984

This is in reply to the letter by M.B. of California, printed in Liberty Bell No. 7 of March 84.

Creation or evolution, ultimately it is all speculation and assumption.

Modern science and research have tried to give the question of how we got to be some reasonable and understandable answer. But, to tie it all in with our present day humans, is still speculation and assumption. It goes too far back into the past. We find bits and pieces and we try to fit them together to suit a theory. After all the fitting together has been done, we still have to speculate and theorize. On the other hand, if there is such a thing as a creator or godship, he seems not to have any control over things or else his reasoning is nonexistent or totally outside the range of our understanding. Even within my own lifetime, what happened on this earth during the last 50 years seems to me to be so stupid, so unreasonable and so anti-human that I have no desire to pray to the thing that controlled and arranged it all. And if the godship does not control or arrange it, then it makes no difference one way or the other, or whether the thing exists or not. I cannot help but feel that all this is rather childish.

Let nature stand on its own. Love its beauty and learn from it. Love your family and work to bring out the best in your people. There is enough depth in that to satisfy any spiritual need.

It was not our doing that we are here. But we are here just the same. I, myself, see beauty in the theory that we are all alone. That we are responsible for everything ourselves. No shifting of responsibility or blame onto a godship. Intelligent people, doing what they feel must be done, will also be able to carry the responsibility for it.

Thank you,
J.A., New York State

Gentlemen: 23 March 1984

Please send me another 100 copies of "Facing Middle East Realities."

I already mailed copies of this leaflet to the editors of University newspapers in over 30 California State Universities, and intend to mail a copy to every one of the State's Junior Colleges. Have already sent a copy to the History Department in over thirty-five.

In addition to this, I have mailed copies to University Editors in almost every state of the Union. Not many copies, but a few in the more densely settled states. Also, I have already prepared letters to send to over twenty-five universities in the State of New York.

I believe that this pamphlet summarizes the history of events in Palestine for the past forty years in a very thorough fashion. If you could interest some organizations in an effort to cover their states in the above fashion, and possibly another state or so, we might reach a few well-educated people and have some effect on public opinion at small cost. It would be far more effective than an organization such as the KLAN wasting money burning a few crosses or getting information into the hands of semi-literate people who can or do make no use of it.

Sincerely,
O. B., California

Dear Landsmann: 20 March 1984

I got your appeal today and I am enclosing a contribution. It is interesting to read your comments on how expenses have increased in the last year or two. I have heard the same thing from many sources and, based on my own experience, I figure the actual rate of inflation was 10-12% last year. This year, they say, the inflation rate will be two to three times that of last year. To me, that means 25-30% inflation for 1984. This will cause a final rise in land and house prices, a spectacular increase in gold and silver, and then a catastrophic collapse in 85-86 as the U.S. plunges into a depression complete with thousands of bank failures and general bankruptcy. Long ago I realized that the U.S. could never go to Weimar-style hyperinflation. There is too much American money and debt held outside the U.S. Any attempt at hyperinflation would cause a panic "run" on the dollar as foreigners rushed to cash in their U.S. assets. This run would quickly bankrupt the U.S. and bring on general bankruptcy. We have already had a taste of this in 1984 as the dollar has fallen 10% and the stock market suffered a mini-run as the more perceptive foreigners sold their U.S, shares.

What has all this to do with you? Well, most white Americans are suffering from the economic collapse the Jews have caused. The more intelligent of these are your readers. Alas, they have no money. Those who do have money are either foolishly complacent or active collaborators of the Yids. The rest are taxed by the Jews and their money used against them. The great financial collapse will completely wipe out the white upper classes and do more to cause a revolt against Jewish rule than any amount of argument.

When your appeal arrived in August, I was broke. What money I had, I used to accelerate purchase of your excellent books, hoping that would help both of us. I am now on unemployment, but my investments are doing much better. I am short of cash but I can't "let George do it" all alone. All I can do now is to enclose a token contribution. In a few more weeks I will have more cash coming in. At that time I will send you an order for all the books of yours that I don't have yet, which should add several hundred dollars to your cash flow. After that, it will depend on events. I wish I could do more.

Sincerely,
R.S., New York State

Dear George: 24 March 1984

Thanks for the copies of Liberty Bell. It was good to hear from you.

You may recall that I have been out of the country most of the past six years and spent two of them in Africa. I went into Moscow twice, Poland a number of times, and Germany many times. I guess you know the mayor of Berlin is a damn Jew and the people there want the Americans to stay. My position was that all foreign governments should get out of Germany but they won't buy that. They are brainwashed almost as bad as here in America.

Your "Info-International Network" is the best thing I have seen since icecream and popcorn. I tried to do the same thing about twelve years ago but could not get the super-dumb-ass-patriots together on the project. Somebody got in my way.

. . . George, you are on the right path. The key to all world problems is waking up the American people. Europe is too far gone; so what is left but the American people who must single out the Jew and burn him to the stake by telling it like it is.

As soon as I can get an Apple //e I will come on line in your program.

The F.C.C. refused to renew my ham radio station license because of my fighting the Jew on an international scale.

Sincerely,
H.T., Texas

Dear George: 20 March 1984

I received your latest issues of Liberty Bell and I am very excited about the computer communications network you have established. . .

I noticed your list of users in the bulletin board description. It seems that it would be better to protect the identity of those users who so wished. [That is a simple matter: just let me know what name you wish to be known under and the last four digits of your (or any) phone number. Any info contained in the Network records (except the Password) can be changed to protect the identity of the user, and the "Member Listing," when accessed by anyone, can be made to display Last Name, First Name, Area Code and Computer Type only, once the City/State/Zip info has been deleted from the records upon your request. No need to reveal your identity to the preying eyes of the A.D.L., J.D.L. or other Jewish hoodlum organizations, right? Right! —Editor.]

I have a 50-50 chance of getting a job, so I may purchase a computer and log on to your system this year.

Yours truly,
D.H., Michigan

Dear Sir, 20 March 1984

I am grateful for the information you sent me concerning the revisionist theory surrounding the "Holocaust," the greatest myth of the 20th century. It is a shame that most Americans are unaware that this "tragedy" was nothing more than a cleverly conceived, brilliantly executed hoax. The more I learn, the more frightening it is to realize just how innocently gullible our society really is. It is somewhat comforting to know that there are still concerned, patriotic Americans such as yourselves who are devoted to the ideal of truth. While your views are not accepted by most of society, I feel a personal sense of responsibility to discover the truth, so others will not continue believing in exaggerated fabrications.

In keeping with this commitment, I began enlightening friends in my home. Unfortunately, many people are unwilling to open their eyes and acknowledge the truth which appears as clear as daylight. It is my hope, that by keeping on hand a ready supply of Holocaust-Revisionist material, I can somehow help others to see the light of truth. Cohesive, documented publications have more of an impact than verbal arguments, and I am optimistic that by distributing these materials, I will help others, in whose shoes I once was.

Sincerely yours,
M.B., New York City

Dear Landsmann: 23 March 84

. . . I wish I could send you some more money. It gripes me to think of the last vestiges of America's free press perishing in poverty while the enemies of humanity wallow in stolen money. Our money. I think of this especially around income tax time when I try to recover some of the money stolen from me and held interest-free for over a year. It is not just the amount of the tax, and the knowledge that our colored and Jewish racial enemies pay very little of it, but the uses to which the money is put. I just read that Israel's bag-man is on the way to Washington for another pound of flesh. . .

Dear Sir: 24 March 1984

Without a doubt, Mr. Masters [see Letter-to-the-Editor by the Rev. T.H. Masters in the February issue of LB, page 57.—Ed.] is one of the most misinformed persons around. He apparently can read the Bible but obviously does not understand the text. I was one of a group who for some 20-25 years publically offered a several thousand dollar reward to ANYONE who could show us in the King James version where the Jews are "God's Chosen," with the provisions that the term Israelite and Hebrew would not be accepted as being synonymous with Jew, for to do so shows an abysmal and distressing ignorance of both religious and secular history. No one ever tried to claim the reward since the facts are just plainly not in the King James version and never were. Mr. Masters should read the Talmud or

"The Bible in the Hands of Its Creators" by Gibberoy and become informed before he makes any more sad attempts to educate the rest of us.

Then he states that the 5-6 million Holocaust did take place. And that in the face of such overwhelming evidence to the contrary. How the public, which is at times most discerning, could ever swallow the Holocaust lie is most disturbing. A child should be able to see through the ridiculous claims which are so absolutely impossible as to be a joke. Even the old World Almanac and the Jewish Encyclopaedia make a lie out of the silly claims. He had a daughter and son-in-law in Germany for two years. I have relatives there for 11 years, and am personally acquainted with dozens of people who lived there all through and prior to the war, and I have been there a good deal. I have never, repeat NEVER, talked to a German who ever heard of the so-called Holocaust until well after the war. That such a Holocaust could take place and be hidden from the people is absolutely ludicrous.

Liberty Bell has many publications, more are available from England; Prof. Butz has an excellent book, and the Institute for Historical Review has even more, all of which are available to any THINKING person, but, unfortunately, so many are in the rut of "My mind is made up—don't confuse me with facts."

Thank you,
K.H., Arkansas

Dear Mr. Dietz: 25 March 1984

Having just read letter to the editor, as it came from M.B. of California on page 1 of the March issue of Liberty Bell, I thought it high time that I respond with my own opinion.

First, in order to recapitulate on that letter, it can be summarized as follows: a) the Jews are atheists, or devil worshippers; b) that some National Socialists adopt an almost atheistic position such as Dr. Oliver's because of a statement of his in a recent article in Liberty Bell; c) that Jews (the ADL) are most concerned about the Identity Christian movement and not National Socialists in general; d) that it is atheism and evolution which are chiefly responsible for race mixing because it teaches that all mankind are offspring of apes.

As I begin my reply, it is necessary to set the stage for my remarks. It is seldom possible to be convincing if one argues from a position not defended by the proper forgoing presumptions and prerequisite assumed facts. One man can defend a castle, for a time, unless the gates are open and the draw bridge let down.

The social milieu of American National Socialism and German National Socialism are divergent in several respects. Let's take American National Socialism first. It has been a late comer to American racist thinking. It was preceded by Southern racism dating from the Civil War period and which was based on biblical notions of chosen people and cursed and dispersed races of people who incurred the wrath or displeasure of Jehova. I grant that the subtle and sophisticated approach taken by Anglo-Saxon theologians of the Slave States bequeathed to Dixie an aura of sanctity, an aristocratic ideal, an effusion of pride, and a feeling of class. But, the south has never been known for tenacity in elucidating facts, or of searching for hitherto alien principles. This mind-set of the southern racists has won for them the descriptive term "prejudiced." It is unfortunately true that in many cases they have earned this pejorative term by their deeds and their concertedness. Some of the responsibility for these attitudes stems from the independence and isolationism attendant to plantation life and geographical exclusiveness and contentment.

There are other racist trends in the United States which are much less dominant. The anti-Oriental persecution in California, the anti-American-Indian attitude of Anglo-Saxons and Irish, and the inter-ethnic jealousies and rivalry which attended the settlements of this nation's major cities. The difference between the former southern type and the latter is the type of reasoning that was used for the particular racism in point. Southern racism was based on the Bible, just as northern emancipation was based on the Bible. As evidence of this fact, we note the schisms in the major church denominations of the northern and southern Baptists, Presbyterians, and Methodists.

By contrast, German National Socialism was preceded by much different conditions. Racism in Germany was always anti-Jewish. But, the parameters of thought for almost 1500 years were determined by Papal canon law or the teaching of the Church on the status of Jewry. People who know this subject are aware of the paradox this proposes. Anti-Semitism is perpetuated, but the reaction against Jews is curtailed and limited. The Roman Church taught, and still does, that Jewry is unrighteous before God, but also that the continuance and perseverance of Jewry is evidence of their chosen status, and therefore the existence of Jews argues for the veracity and authority of both, the Bible and the Pope.

However, it is German scholasticism which came into play in the Post-Lutheran period which led to a double gambit. On the one hand, the philosophers questioned theories of knowledge and developed methods for testing knowledge. On the other hand, the theologians entered the arena of free and open inquiry. These two sides spelled out the eventual weakening of Christianity. They attacked the superstition in its grossest aspects, and provided alternate explorations and extra-biblical opinions to go unchecked. In the beginning, heresies lost their repugnance. In the end, the scriptures were criticized, examined, compared, analysed by literary and historical criticism, and subjected to a rigorous, systematic study of the original languages against a whole series of scriptural variants which were discovered by archaeologists. The old faith of Augustine, Thomas Aquinas, and Luther and Calvin was gone from the German seats of higher learning. From Luther came Lessing, Herder, then Kant and Hegel, Schopenhauer and Nietzsche. Staggering consequences came in the wake of these pioneers and builders of human understanding. The Bible was regarded as a piece of ancient Jewish literature. It did not any longer summon belief and awe as it did centuries before.

Into this volatile vortex of competing ideas and philosophers came the biological determinists and the historical determinists of Darwin and Marx. Marx emphasized the historio-economic forces and Darwin the genetic determinants. But, no one until Adolf Hitler had openly announced a political philosophy embodying a total truth or a synthesis of the truths of several sciences.

It is here that I wish to express the traditional and subcultural religious background which gave birth to Hitler's ideas. His experience in the World War and his early elementary education made Adolf patriotic. His stay in Vienna made him understand Jews and Communism. While there, he learned of Richard Wagner and through him got a deep impression of his own racial unconsciousness as well as a glimpse of his racial past. But it was in Munich, where he met Dietrich Eckart, a person of prominence in the Thule Society. Herr Eckart had a great influence on Hitler but, more significant than Dietrich Eckart was the Thule Society. The Thule group was typical of several racial cults or heretical societies which studied ancient Aryan prehistory and related themes, with the idea in mind of forging a greater Germany through coperation and dissemination of racial and cultural ideas. Chief of these ideas were the legendary and mythical origins of Aryan mankind. The Thule Society rejected the biblical book of Genesis as valueless for Aryans since Aryans did not come from Adam and Eve, or Noah. The Genesis legends, according to them, were only a poorly written series of borrowed oriental tales, and a falsified record of Hebrew origins. What then is Thule? It was one of the residential areas on the earth where the Aryan family lived before they migrated to Asgard in the Caucasus. Opinions varied as to whether Thule was Greenland or some other land mass in the far north. In a much earlier age it was thought that the axis of the earth was tilted differently than today due to astronomical and geographical cataclysms. This meant that the polar regions now frozen were then temperate regions suitable for human life.

Thule was also a temporary residence, because when the earth's axis tilted, the Thulians traveled to Atlantis, the legendary continent in the Atlantic Ocean which sank with the melting of the glacial ice during the last ice age. This was about 11,000 years ago.

Otto Heinrich Muck, a rocket scientist who worked under Wernher von Braun, wrote a book entitled "The Secret of Atlantis." He shows that astronomical occurrences were responsible for the break up and destruction of Atlantis. A meteorite of enormous size struck this area, and other space debris pitted a large section of ground near Charleston, South Carolina.

Now very little actual information is accesible to the average person on this subject. But, Alfred Rosenberg, in his book "Myth of the 20th Century," does treat the subject of Atlantis as though it did in fact exist, and as though Plato's account of Atlantis indeed had a kernel of truth behind it.

Now I cannot vouch for these as facts. But, what is important is that societies such as "Vril," "Germanen Orden," and "Thule" proliferated in Germany and provided for a non-Christian or anti-Christian Weltanschauung. This Weltanschauung broke up the fallow ground of German socio-political life and enabled Hitler to be a welcome leader of his people.

Today, if we had in America "Odinists" instead of "Identity Christians," we would stand a much better chance of wresting our destiny from the hands of the Jews.

KEEP THE LIBERTY BELL RINGING!

Please remember: Our fight is Your fight! Donate whatever you can spare on a regular—monthly or quarterly—basis. Whether it is $2., $5., $20., or $100. or more, rest assured it is needed here and will be used in our common struggle. If you are a businessman, postage stamps in any denomination, are a legitimate business expense—and we need and use many of these here every month, and will be gratefully accepted as donations.

Your donations will help us spread the Message of Liberty and White Survival throughout the land, by making available additional copies of our printed material to fellow Whites who do not yet know what is in store for them.

Order our pamphlets, booklets, stickers, and—most importantly—our reprints which are ideally suited for mass distribution at reasonable cost. Order extra copies of Liberty Bell for distribution to your circle of friends, neighbors and relatives, urging them to subscribe to our unique publication. Our bulk prices are shown on the inside front cover of every issue of Liberty Bell.

Pass along your copy of Liberty Bell, and copies of reprints you obtained from us, to friends and acquaintances who may be on our 'wave length,' and urge them to contact us for more of the same.

Carry on the fight to free our White people from the shackles of alien domination, even if you can only join our ranks in spirit. You can provide for this by bequest. The following are suggested forms of bequests which you may include in your Last Will and Testament:

1. I bequeath to Mr. George P. Dietz, as Trustee for Liberty Bell Publications, P.O. Box 21, Reedy WV 25270 USA, the sum of $ . . . . . for general purposes.

2. I bequeath to Mr. George P. Dietz, as Trustee for Liberty Bell Publications, P.O. Box 21, Reedy WV 25270 USA, the following described property . . . . . for general purposes.

SOME QUOTABLE QUOTES FROM AMERICA'S DECLINE

FREEDOM OF SPEECH–FREEDOM OF THOUGHT
FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION

The editor-publisher of Liberty Bell does not necessarily agree with each and every article in this magazine, nor does he subscribe to all conclusions arrived at by various writers; however, he does endeavor to permit the exposure of ideas suppressed by the controlled news media of this country.

It is, therefore, in the best tradition of America and of free men everywhere that Liberty Bell strives to give free reign to ideas, for ultimately it is ideas which rule the world and determine both the content and structure of culture.

We believe that we can and will change our society for the better. We declare our long-held view that no institution or government created by men, for men, is inviolable, incorruptible, and not subject to evolution, change or replacement by the will of the people.

To this we dedicate our lives and our work. No effort will be spared and no idea will be allowed to go unexpressed if we think it will benefit the Thinking People, not only of America, but the entire world.

SHOULD WE USE THE WORD "ARYAN"?

by
Charles E. Weber, Ph.D.

Recently I had an argument with a young editor about a word which had occurred in a text that I was trying to translate as accurately as inherent differences in German sentence structure and vocabulary would permit. The word was Aryan, used as an adjective in connection with nations. The translation was being prepared for a scholarly journal with revisionistic objectives. The young editore wanted to change the word to Western. I protested that this change would constitute a falsification of the meaning of the original text. I also argued that such a change would be an accomodating euphemism and a concession to our enemies, who would like to denigrate this word out of our vocabulary for well-calculated reasons of their own.

Indeed, this venerable word has been denigrated by the enemies of the Aryan nations to such an extent that most Aryans in Europe and the United States are hesitant to use it, let alone proudly to apply it to themselves. By contrast, does anyone dispute the right of a minority race to determine how it will designate itself?

Nearly all of the major languages of Europe are related to each other, with the notable exceptions of Finnish, Estonian and Hungarian. Thus, for example, the Russian word tri is quite similar to its English cognate, three. As another example, the ancient Indian word raja is related to the Latin word rex (possessive form: regis), both words meaning "king." The ancient Germanic form of this word is rik, meaning "kingdom." It appears in modern German as Reich, which has assumed a somewhat different meaning. (At this point we must be careful to differentiate between cognates, such as the two examples given above, and loanwords, such as the English word paternal, which has been taken into English from Latin. Cognates are words which have a common origin.) Indo-European languages contain many obvious cognates, especially those words which refer to parts of the body and family relationships, in addition to pronouns and numbers. These cognates allow us to reconstruct to some extent the language which was spoken by the Indo-Eu ropeans before the invention of writing and from which the various later Indo-European languages evolved. By reconstructing the original Indo-European language, we can gain some idea of the cultural level of its speakers. By examining the cognates which designate plants and animals we even have obtained at least a vague indication of the place where the Indo-Europeans originally lived (Urheimat), which is thought to be around the area of Lithuania.

We refer to the large group of related European languages as Indo-European or Indo-Germanic. These languages were spoken even in ancient times as far to the northwest as Scandinavia and as far to the southeast as Persia and India, where they were the languages of the dominant elite, who imposed them on a native population. They have also been designated as the Aryan languages. Although the Aryan languages were originally spoken only by Caucasians, they are now spoken by millions and millions of South American Indians and African Negroes. Some members of the Caucasian race, such as Semites and Finns, speak (or spoke) languages which are in no way related to the Indo-European languages. This fact is strong evidence that racial differences in mankind are so ancient that they evolved even before complicated linguistic expression evolved in man. Arabic and Hebrew are closely related and have readily recognizable cognates in their vocabularies. The early languages of the major racial divisions of mankind are completely unrelated and there are unrelated languages even within these major racial divisions.

The root or basic syllable contained in the word Aryan appears in a number of Indo-European languages. It has cognates in such geographically diverse languages as ancient Persian and Old Irish. In fact, there seems little doubt that the names of the countries, Iran and Ireland (Eire), are cognates. In ancient times the roots in these words were used in the sense "noble" or "nobleman." A Greek cognate might be the word áristos, meaning "the best man," which furnishes the loanword aristocrat in English. The root appears in ancient Germanic masculine names. A Latin cognate might be oriens, of which the meaning is only distantly related. (The orient is the place where the sun rises, thus suggesting a semantic relation to the idea of "nobleman," who occupies a "risen" position.) The Persian form of the word was taken over into Greek as a loanword as early as the time of the Greek historian Herodotus, who died in 425 B.C.

In modern times, a French translator of ancient Persian religious literature, Anquetil du Perron, again introduced the Persian word to Europe in 1763. It was subsequently applied as a designation of all the Indo-European languages during the nineteenth century. Count Joseph Arthur Gobineau, the author of the famous and influential four-volume work, Essai sur l'inégalité des races humaines; (1853-55), further popularized the word, extending its meaning to a racial designation. The composer Richard Wagner also used the word in 1881 as a racial designation, particularly to differentiate Aryans from Jews as non-Aryans. The term Aryan was used commonly in Germany during the National-Socialist period (1933-1945). As a result of the overreaction and propaganda against National-Socialist practices, the status of the word has been unjustifiably jeopardized since then. Nevertheless, the word Aryan was used even by the New York Times of 22 April 1984 in an article on Sri Lanka (Ceylon).

In spite of its various applications in modern times, the word Aryan as a designation of non-Semitic members of the Caucasian race has no other convenient equivalent. Aryans should use this word as a designation of themselves without any apologies. They should insist on using it when giving information to gatherers of census data, for example. The colors white, black, etc., as designations of the Caucasian, Negro and other races are commonly used but have the decided disadvantage of implying that differences in these races are only a matter of skin color, a dangerous fallacy propagated by those who wish to promote discord in the Aryan nations. We are thus left with the word Aryan as a useful, convenient and precise racial designation. □

Election year again—and all the usual ballyhoo about "new faces," a "change," etc. The entire range of puppets is trotted out onto the stage by the manipulators, once again duping the Average Joe into thinking he has a choice, a voice, an opportunity to make things better. There are a few of the "dumb masses" who have finally gotten wise to the old shell game conducted by the Tweedle-Dee Republicans and the Tweedle-Dum Democrats, aided and abetted by their media masters; these few, then, seek to change things and "right the ship of state" through the formation of that always ill-fated third party. They make an effort—and for that we admire them, despite their naiveté—by offering the "majority" a palatable platform, appealing to patriotism, nationalism, and though veiled, sometimes even racial instincts. Much efforts is expended, much money spent, much optimism generated, in the end only to meet with pre-destined failure and further disillusionment and disappointment.

We don't deride the effort, or mean to point the finger of pity, indeed, were there a chance for success, we would throw everything we could behind the effort to dislodge the oppressors. It's just that we, having passed through that stage of maturity, realize that here is a group going through the same growth period. Whether or not they will learn from their failure is conjectural; at best, a few will. And therein lies success out of failure. A few more wake-up—and we grow.

We'd like to save those third-party folks the effort by telling them that they can't win against a stacked deck; that history proves a despotic regime will not relinquish power through any so-called "legal" means; that their efforts are doomed to suffer either the silent treatment or that if they were able to generate enough popular backing to pose even a slight threat, assassination would follow. We'd like to tell our third-party

THE REST OF DONALD DAY

by
Paul Knutson

Donald Day, who had been for many years the foreign correspondent of the Chicago Tribune in northern Europe, wrote a record of his observations, Onward, Christian Soldiers, in 1942. His English text was first published as a book in 1982. It was printed by William Morrison and appeared under the imprint of the Noontide Press of Torrance, California. As Professor Oliver pointed out in his review of that book in Liberty Bell for January, 1983, the text had been copied, with some omissions and minor changes, from an anonymously issued mimeographed transcription of a defective carbon copy of the author's manuscript, which had been brought to the United States in some way, despite the vigilance of Franklin Roosevelt's surreptitious thought-police.

That was not the first publication of Day's book. A Swedish translation, Framåt Kristi stridsmän, was published by Europa Edition in Stockholm in 1944. (That paper cover, printed in red, green, and black, is reproduced in black-and-white on the following page.)

Copies of this book still survive in Sweden and are even found in some public libraries. There may still be a copy in the Library of Congress, where, however, it was catalogued and buried among the very numerous books of a different Donald Day, a very prolific writer who midwifed the autobiography of Will Rogers and produced book after book on such various subjects as American humorists, the folk-lore of the Southwest, the tourist-attractions of Texas, and probably anything for which he saw a market, including a mendacious screed entitled Franklin D. Roosevelt's Own Story. By a supreme irony, the Library concealed Framåt Kristi stridsmän in its catalogue by placing it between the other Day's Evolution of Love and his propaganda piece for the unspeakably vile monster whose millions of victims included one of the last honest journalists.

The Swedish translation contains some long and important passages that do not appear in the book published in California and are not found in the mimeographed copy. By translating these back into English, I can restore Donald Day's meaning, but, of course, I cannot hope to reproduce exactly the words and style of his original manuscript. I can also restore from the Swedish the deficiencies of the mimeographed transcript.

It seems impossible to determine now whether the parts of Day's work that are preserved only in the Swedish were deleted by him to shorten his text when he sent a typewritten copy to the United States or were added by him before he turned his manuscript over to the Swedish translator at about the same time. At all events, the Swedish now alone provides us with some significant parts of Day's book and many Americans will want to have Day's work complete and entire.

For the convenience of the reader, I have, by arrangement with the publisher of Liberty Bell, included corrections of the printed English text where it departs, through negligence or misunderstanding, from the mimeographed text from which it was copied. I have passed over obvious typographical errors in the printed book, and omitted small and relatively unimportant corrections. For example, near the end of p. 44 of the printed book, the sentence should read, "All reported that the officials of the Cheka, later known as the GPU and NKVD, were Jews."

Day did not use footnotes, so the reader will understand that all the footnotes on the following pages are my own explanations of the text.

The supplements below are arranged in the order of pages of the printed book, as shown by the note in the small type that precedes each section.

The three sources are discriminated typographically thus:

Italics show what is copied from the printed text to give continuity.

Ordinary Roman type is used for what is in the mimeographed copy but was omitted from the printed version. This, of course, is precisely what Day wrote in English.

What I have translated back from the Swedish appears in this style of type. These passages, as I have said, convey Day's meaning without necessarily restoring exactly the words he used in his English original, from which the Swedish version was made

* * * * *

At the bottom of p. 2 read:

On a number of occasions, through denunciations and provocations, these forces attempted to have me either recalled or discharged. Although I had made applications over a period of years for a Soviet visa, I had never been granted permission to visit Russia. In 1939 the Polish government annulled my visa e.q.s.

The foregoing appears in Chapter I of both the mimeographed and printed texts, but in the Swedish version that chapter is relegated to the end of the book, where it is followed only by the "Epilogue." The Swedish begins with what is Chapter III in the mimeographed text, " Permit Me to Introduce Myself," and was entirely omitted from the printed book. It is here copied from the mimeographed text; the Swedish version omits the stories, intended for an American audience, which follow the paragraph that ends "use our eyes to shape our destiny."

PERMIT ME TO INTRODUCE MYSELF

My boyhood was spent in New York City, San Francisco,

Cleveland, Tennessee, and Chicago. So I had a wide view of America in my youth. My forebearers, on both sides of the family, have been in America for more than 300 years. On my father's side they were English and Scotch-Irish. On my mother's side they were Dutch, French-Huguenot and English. As for distinguished ancestors, I think we all have a few if we go back far enough. Among mine is General Sam Houston, who fought Mexico and captured Texas, New Mexico and Arizona for the United States, and John Sevier, an enterprising pioneer who organized the state of Franklin. This comprised the territory of Eastern Tennessee and Kentucky and when he charged toll on wagon trains proceeding through his territory he came into conflict with the United States government. An expedition was sent against him and his forces were defeated. He was arrested and imprisoned in Atlanta, Georgia. His troops rescued him from prison, but the state of Franklin disappeared.

John Day was the first pioneer to settle in Eastern Tennessee. It is a mountainous, heavily forested country and the original inhabitants were the Cherokee Indian tribe. For many years the head of the Day family acted for the Indians in their relations with the American government. My grandfather, Dr. Sam Houston Day, was the doctor for the tribe. They paid him with buckskin bags filled with silver ore and by special arrangement he sent these to the mint in Washington, where they were coined into silver dollars for him. The Indians never divulged the secret of their mine. This outcropping of valuable silver ore has never been discovered and is hidden in the forest covering the Great Smoky mountains of the border of Tennessee and North Carolina. We often hunted that fabulous silver mine on our hunting and fishing trips; but, aside from a large ledge of mica located forty miles from the nearest railroad, we never discovered any mineral wealth. Toward the end of the last century, the American government rounded up the Indians and settled them in Indian territory, now Oklahoma. Oil was discovered under these lands so the Indians became rich. Contact with white people did not civilize them. Inter-marriages with white people produced a very unsatisfactory type of human being. So early Americans drew a strong color line and today the Indians, through intermarriage with Negroes, have degenerated.

Cleveland, Tennessee, was a typical small Southern town with about 14,000 inhabitants. My second cousin, Columbus Mee, was mayor of the town for about thirty years. He was tall and thin and chewed a plug of tobacco every day. His only other vice was drinking coffee. In this respect he had an affinity with the Finns. On our fishing trips we would always put a trotline with one or two hundred hooks which zig-zagged back and forth across the creek or river for a few hundred meters. This line would have to be tended several times during the night. Besides fish we caught snakes, snapping turtles, eels and frogs. Columbus would keep the coffee pot on the fire all night and after some twenty cups of coffee he would become greatly exhilarated. We generally had a tub of moonshine whisky keeping cold in the nearby spring; but I cannot remember anyone getting drunk on these fishing trips. Boys and young men did not drink because it was considered disgraceful. It was only years later that Prohibition changed the drinking habits of the Americans and turned drinking from a vice into a sport; and entire families drank to excess.

Clum was fond of snake stories; and in this corner of Tennessee there are plenty of snakes and a variety of poisonous ones. One night we were fishing by an old mill. We had put out our trotline and were still-fishing from a rocky bank which descended steeply into deep water. In the evening I killed a big water-moccasin, which is very poisonous, and tied a string around its neck and sank it in the water below the rocks on which we were perched. Some hours later, after Clum had drunk his fourteenth cup of coffee and was regaling us with some thrilling snake stories, I began to pull the line and the big snake came sliding out of the water right into the middle of our group. Clum and the others let out a yell and two of them jumped into the creek. I let the snake slide back into the water and threw the string after it and I didn't reveal the joke till we returned to town and the other fishermen had told our friends of the thrilling encounter.

Tennessee was one of the first Southern states to adopt Prohibition, so the mountaineers found ready market for their moonshine whisky. In those pre-Prohibition days a gallon jug cost a dollar. Properly prepared it was a good drink, tasting remarkably like old cherry brandy, which is one of the local delicacies found in East Prussia.

The Southern states in America had adopted Prohibition partly as a measure to protect their womanhood. In saloons and dives operated by the renegade white element, mulattos and Jews, the Negroes would become drunk on rot-gut whisky served from bottles embellished with a label on which was printed the picture of a naked white woman. This combination of alcohol and pornography would sometimes so excite the Negro that he would attack a white woman. If caught, he was lynched. But Prohibition failed to prevent lynchings as it failed to eradicate the evils of drink in other sections of society. It helped to undermine respect for the law and gave the criminal element the opportunity to become millionaires. Instead of a national blessing, it became a national disgrace. Finland also adopted a prohibition law and passed through a similar experience. She repealed this law before the United States repealed her law.

The town of Cleveland erected a monument to my grandfather, who was surgeon of Wheeler's Cavalry regiment, the only Confederate force which opposed Sherman's march to the sea through the state of Georgia during the Civil War. Those who have read Gone with the Wind know about the misery and suffering caused by that campaign and the war in this section of the United States. My mother's father was a lieutenant in a New York regiment, which fought on the Northern side.

My father loved horses. He was what they call in America a race-horse man. Sometimes he was well-to-do. Sometimes he was broke. He acted as a Sports Editor for a number of large American newspapers and on two occasions published his own newspaper. Every time he managed to get some money together he either bought a string of racehorses or built a race track. He and his friends built the race track at Mineral Springs, Indiana, and later one at Miami, Florida. He lived during a period of tremendous economic expansion in America, but he was not interested in business or industry. The characteristic I most admired in my father was his contempt for money. Whether he had much money in the bank, or nothing at all, no one could tell. I recall on two occasions where overnight he became a poor man with heavy debts. But he was never shaken by a reverse in fortune and worked hard for years to pay off his debtors. He died very rich in friends. He left us a proud memory and if he left us an inheritance, it was to despise corruption, dishonesty and graft, which were things he had fought all his life, for he loved horse racing and tried to keep it a clean sport. He was acknowledged as one of the leading authorities on horse breeding and racing in America.

My father did not want me to become a newspaperman. For many generations there had always been a doctor in the family and he wanted one in his. My brothers and I had no interest in medicine. We all became newspapermen. He also tried to persuade me to to become a lawyer. But the only branch of law I knew anything about in America was criminal law and I thought that criminal lawyers were not much better than the criminals themselves, so I refused. If he did not want me to become a newspaperman, all right, as a joke I suggested I become a policeman. He was horrified. "Why?", he asked. I told him with my education, I was certain to become a captain in the Chicago police department within twenty years and every police captain I knew owned an expensive automobile, a large apartment house and had also acquired an orange grove in Florida, a peach orchard in Georgia and an apple orchard in Michigan. My father said he would rather brain me than see me join the police department, so I became a reporter at the age of eighteen.

Yes, it is shameful to admit, but the police departments of the majority of large American cities are honeycombed with corruption. Criminals prey upon society, but the criminal lawyers and police frequently prey upon the criminals. Crime in the United States has become an industry. It is one of America's largest and most pressing problems. It is not even approaching solution. Freedom from corruption, Freedom from crime. These are two Freedoms sadly needed in the United States. Until they are achieved it is pure insanity for anyone to believe in the practicability of the Four Freedoms spawned by a cigar and a cigarette in a cesspool of mental depravity.

In those years, 1913-17, there were plenty of thrills in a reporter's job. We covered murder cases and sometimes it was not the police who tracked down and arrested the murderer, but the reporter. In this period a murder was still something so unusual that it was "a big story," one that would occupy columns of space in the newspapers, often for a week or more. The police, municipal officials and other authorities treated the press with respect and consideration because they still felt a responsibility to the electorate. In such cities as New York, Philadelphia and others where a political machine controlled the elections, public officials did not have this feeling of responsibility and the press did not receive the privileged treatment we had in Chicago.

Near Joliet early one spring a woman was found murdered and raped. The murderer was not caught. The next spring the same thing occurred. The third year there was another murder and, together with several other reporters, I was sent to cover the story. We made our headquarters in a small boarding house. From there we telephoned the daily developments to our newspapers. It was a small town and had few policemen. The sheriff of the county was the most important official and our relations with him were not very pleasant. Three women had been raped and clubbed to death in his town within three years and the murderer was still at large. It reflected upon his ability as a police official.

We newspapermen decided to form a little police department of our own. Our metal reporter badges did not look very much like the imposing star of a detective, but they did look official. We began to search for suspects and make "arrests." Like the police we thought the murders had been committed by a degenerate. We went about town and talked with many people and whenever we heard of someone with suspicious morals we "arrested" him and brought him to our boarding house for an examination. We did not mention names in our stories but these cross-examinations provided us with material to write about.

One day I heard of a farmhand who seldom came to town and who was regarded as "peculiar" by the people who knew him. I told my colleagues of my discovery but not one of them was willing to share the expense of a horse and buggy. There were few automobiles and still fewer paved roads at that time in Illinois. The suspect worked on a farm twelve miles out in the country. Finally I persuaded a friend who represented an afternoon newspaper to make the trip with me. We arrived on the farm at noon and found the man working in a field. We approached, flashed our reporter badges, told him he was under arrest and that he had to return with us to town. He seemed stunned, and on the way back to town he broke down and confessed he had committed all three murders. We immediately handcuffed him to the buggy, tied up the horse and went a short distance away to hold a conference. My colleague insisted we get back to town as quickly as possible so he could telephone the story to his afternoon paper. I said I had just as much claim to the story as he did, and since we all had an agreement not to "scoop" each other if we should happen to find the murderer, we had to agree on some way to divide the story between the afternoon and the morning newspapers. I suggested the afternoon newspapermen should send in a story about the murderer being arrested and publish his confession of the last murder while the morning newspapers could "follow up" the story with his confession about committing all three murders.

This was agreed upon, and we turned to our buggy for a wild drive back to town.

The parlor of the boarding house was a busy place that afternoon and evening. Every Chicago newspaper wanted columns of material, and photographers were rushed down to take the prisoner's picture.

Later that evening two of the local policemen called on us and asked if it was true that we had captured the murderer. We had been expecting this and our prisoner had been handcuffed to a bed upstairs. We had provided him with a good supper and plenty of coffee. He had a most remarkable memory and told us in great detail how he had planned and committed the three murders and a number of other crimes. We wished to keep him for ourselves as long as possible, so we informed the police they had only heard a rumor and we knew nothing about the story. It was only a short time later that the sheriff arrived with reinforcements and boiling mad. He said if we did not surrender our prisoner immediately he would put us all in jail, so we reluctantly turned over one of the most interesting and informative criminals we had ever talked with. We had all agreed to keep the details of the "arrest", how the "arrest" had been made, a secret and to use it as a "follow-up" story the next day. We knew it was going to be difficult to get any further information from the sheriff until we had appeased his dignity. It turned out we had only scratched the surface. The prisoner confessed to more and more crimes and for a week newspaper readers were thrilled with criminal exploits, some of which were several years old.

My colleagues and I felt certain our prisoner had really committed the "club murders," but when he continued his confessions which became more and more startling with each examination, we became suspicious. The man had a remarkable memory, but when we visited the farmer and questioned him it became evident he could not have been author of all those crimes. Like some other criminals, the prisoner loved notoriety and relished reading stories about himself in the newspapers. I saw the execution, and he was smiling when they placed the black mask over his face. The drop of the trap broke his neck. We could hear the bone snap. After the usual contortions of a hanged man, he was pronounced dead and another sensational story ended.

The sensationalism of the American press deserves an explanation to European readers. Chicago and other American cities were growing rapidly, but they were growing un-American. Hundreds of thousands of immigrants were settling in compact colonies. Their religious leaders founded churches. Then foreign language newspapers appeared. Theaters, choirs, sport and social organizations followed. With every year the foreign language press increased their circulation, and the alien social and cultural organizations in American cities became more powerful.

Competition between the American newspapers became more and more bitter. Thirty years ago Chicago had six morning and five evening papers published in the American language. Today there are two morning and three evening papers. This decrease further shows how the character of the population had changed. Hundreds of thousands of Poles, Lithuanians, Czechs, Slovaks, Jews, Greeks, Italians and other nationalities settled in Chicago. There also arrived an influx of Negroes from the Southern states. All of this alien element was cheap labor. They dragged down the American standard of living. All of these languages and racial groups have their own papers. As these grew in circulation, the circulation and influence of some of the American newspapers decreased. They became bankrupt and died. For some years now the Chicago city council has had its minority groups just like the little parliaments.

What happened in Chicago happened in other great industrial cities. The American press not only competed with each other for American readers, but they also tried to compete with the foreign language press for readers among the descendants of the immigrant families who learned English in their schools, but who did not regard it as their mother tongue.

This influx of foreigners helped to destroy many Chicago newspapers. They were published in the center of the city which sprawls for 26 miles (forty kilometers) along the shore of Lake Michigan. Just outside the central commercial and industrial area which comprises the center of the city the foreigners settled in great groups. These immigrant neighborhoods, slums and ghettos, kept on expanding and the American residents were forced to move farther into the suburbs, away from the foreigners.

American newspapers had to face the problem of transporting their editions many miles before they could be delivered to the subscribers. Each newspaper was obliged to maintain many horses and wagons, later entire fleets of autotrucks, for distributing their papers. When the Second World War broke out it found Chicago with only three afternoon and one morning newspaper, The Chicago Tribune. And because of its America First policy, The Tribune has been, for many years, under constant attack by the un-American minority groups.

In many American cities, particularly those west of the Mississippi River, the bitter fight for survival between the American and the foreign language areas is still proceeding. In their effort to keep readers and attract others, the American newspapers began to provide more and more entertainment and less and less information. The larger size of the American newspaper is due to the enormous amount of advertising rather than news. In fact, in every American newspaper office the amount of advertising available determines the amount of news published.

While it is true that American newspapers spend large sums to obtain authentic reports on news developments, still the value of these reports to the readers is reduced by the large amount of frivolous and unimportant material published which competes for the attention of the average reader. This includes bridge problems, crossword puzzles, comic strips. etc., which are daily features in the newspapers.

The life of a morning newspaper in America is short, seldom more than an hour and a half. It is read at the breakfast table, on the way to work and then discarded. In the evening another paper, more sensational and trivial, provides entertainment rather than information.

It is for these reasons that the average newspaper reader profits little by the news, facts, discussion and reports of serious developments which should claim attention. This will help to explain why the degenerate reading habits of Americans and their apathy to matters outside their own narrow sphere of interests has enabled President Roosevelt and his Jewish counsellors to drive the United States into an imperialistic war, when the average American citizen has never dreamed of the possibility of the United States becoming a dominating world power, protecting the policy of exploitation of international money powers who, all unknown to the average American, have abandoned Europe and made their headquarters in the United States.

The average American has faith in the President of the United States. When the President gives his solemn pledge that he will not involve the country in war, that he will not send American boys to fight overseas, his word is respected and believed. It should also not be forgotten that Franklin Roosevelt is the first president of the United States who has enjoyed the privilege of talking intimately to the people of America over the radio. In some countries the radio has proved a blessing. In others, a curse. When the American people heard the President make promises, not once, but many times, there seemed all the more reason for them to believe their elected chief of state.

The radio developed in the United States overnight. In the great majority of countries this new avenue of human communication was placed under government control. One motive for this action was that the government leaders thought it better for radio to serve national interests and thus serve the people rather than permit private interests to use it to exploit the inhabitants. But Americans have made a fetish of private initiative and enterprise. Government control of the radio was opposed (by private capital) because it was alleged to be just as dangerous to individual liberties as government control of the press. So the radio was left for private exploitation. No one in America could foresee that the three great radio networks which developed would come under the control of a national minority group whose aim was to control the government and destiny of the United States. The Jewish monopoly over the American radio has become an even greater threat to America than if this industry had developed as a government monopoly. There are a number of radio stations in America which have independent programs, but their warnings have been lost on the kosher waveband. The American people have been deluded and betrayed in much the same manner as the Russian people were deluded and betrayed. What fate has in store for us largely depends upon whether we continue to use our ears or again use our eyes to shape our destiny.

For centuries mankind obtained knowledge and information through the written and printed word. What comes to us through our eyes is registered in the conscious part of our brain and is there considered and either accepted or rejected. The power of the orators was limited. Today the loudspeaker and radio have magnified the power of the spoken word. What comes to us through our ears enters the subconscious part of our brain and acts upon our emotions. Since the advent of radio, the Americans have been relying more upon their ears than their eyes in acquiring information. They seem to have adopted the Finnish (or perhaps it is Swedish) proverb: "Let the horse think. He has a bigger head."

Among many interesting adventures I had as a young reporter there is one that deserves to be inserted in this chronicle. It concerns two aged men, both honored in Chicago as staid and respected citizens, both husbands with a long record of happy married life, both fathers of large families—unusually large families, for one had eleven children and the other eight. One was deputy superintendant of police for many years and later became chief of the police force. The other was a candy manufacturer, a millionaire.

The manufacturer loved to play practical jokes. Now among many Americans of his generation, as well as those of previous and the subsequent generation, was a popular superstition, no, it was more than that, it was almost an idée fixe. These Americans believed that women of the yellow race are, in a certain respect, uniquely different from women of other races. In fact, they credit the creator, in his task of fabricating mankind, with a touch of originality in finishing off his yellow-skinned female by providing her with an unusual attraction. That acme of male desire which in other women is found as a vertical establishment he is supposed to have installed in the women of the Yellow race in a horizontal position. This heterodox variation is the subject of widespread doubt and debate. But many Americans believe implicitly in this phenomenon. Some have utilized journeys to the Far East to make investigations. Their discoveries were disbelieved.

The manufacturer decided to play a joke on his friends. He journeyed to Japan and China and there commissioned artists of note to paint and contrive for him a number of pictures showing, most clearly and attractively, that this was not merely a rumor but a definite and positive physiological fact.

After an absence of some months he returned to Chicago with several cases of paintings, drawings and embroidered silk tapestries, some reputedly of great age, revealing with verve that the saffron hued beauties of Asia are of lateral genre and so are different from their sisters whose skins are tinted otherwise.

The Chicago customs authorities confiscated the entire collection before the manufacturer could show them to his doubting and believing friends. He was indicted by the federal grand jury which spent much time examining the thrilling evidence. I can only recall one of the exhibits. It was a large silk-embroidered tapestry showing a Japanese lady reclining on many cushions in an expectant position, welcoming her lover back from battle. The impatient warrior was tossing his armour all over the place in his haste. And really, the god-darned thing was horizontal.

My friend, the chief of police, was a collector of just such works of art. In the course of many years he had gathered together a large number of such pictures. They were not open to public gaze. He kept them locked in a special safe in his office at police headquarters.

I mentioned to him the unparalelled collection which had been gathered in Asia by the candy manufacturer. His acquisitive collector's heart burned with desire. He immediately telephoned to the chief of the Bureau of Investigation of the Department of Justice in the Federal Building and asked him to turn over the collection after the trial. He was met with a blunt refusal. He pleaded and mentioned he had a large collection of similar objects of art and, even though it was the duty of authorities to protect the public from such displays still, he contended, such things should not be destroyed.

His rival law enforcer was more puritan minded. He insisted on destruction of the collection after the trial and threatened to send his federal agents to the city hall and raid the office of the chief of police and seize his collection. The chief invited him to try, that he would run the federal law enforcers out of town. The conversation became heated. It ended with an outburst of profanity from both sides.

I consoled the chief of police. I had never liked that federal justice agent because of his habit to give stories to a rival paper. I suggested the chief send out a detective squad and round up a couple of competent safe-crackers and send them over to the press room of the federal building on Saturday afternoon after the courts and offices had been closed. This was done and the antiquated safe in the Bureau of Investigation was opened with little trouble and the tabooed collection of the candy manufacturer was removed. No other valuables were taken.

The chief was delighted. The chief of the Bureau was enraged. The manufacturer was disconsolate. He had engaged expensive legal talent to help him fight his case. He had announced his intention to fight his indictment up to the Supreme Court if necessary to prove that art was art, no matter what portion of a woman's anatomy is portrayed. If the artists of the West, both old and new, have devoted much time, paint and canvas to depicting the largest and roundest portion of a woman's being, why shouldn't the artists of the East paint something else?

The manufacturer demanded the evidence be found. The story of the vanished collection was known to but a few and had not been made public. It could not be recovered without a war breaking out between the loyal laughing police department and the hirelings of the Bureau who were greatly outnumbered. After all, the G-Men had to depend upon the future assistance of the police department to efficiently perform their routine duties of combatting dope peddlers, white-slavers and counterfeiters, the three classes of criminals which the federal authorities are supposed to eradicate.

I called on the candy manufacturer and assured him his collection was intact and "had not been destroyed by mistake" as he had been informed. It was his turn to be delighted. I said it might be possible for him to view these creations again providing he would promise not to cause any trouble to their new owner. He agreed so I introduced him to the chief of police. Both these men were over seventy. It appeared both had been making the same sort of collections for years and had never met any collector with similar interests. They arranged meetings and traded pictures as small boys trade stamps. In this manner the manufacturer regained some of his Asiatic works of art.

Later the chief and the manufacturer arranged a dinner for their close friends. These doubters of the remarkable physical difference between the yellow women of Eastern latitudes and those of longitudes were convinced.

And the manufacturer had his joke after all.

Thirty years ago, jazz had not yet entered polite society. It was a new form of music born in the back rooms of Negro saloons in the slums of New Orleans, Memphis, St. Louis and Chicago. The original jazz players were all Negroes and were natural born musicians. The orchestras were small. They were comprised of a piano, a bass and snare drum, a cornet, a trombone and a banjo. The saxophone was unknown. A few of these little assemblies had a Negro artist who played a horn constructed from an elephant tusk.

These orchestras played without music. At their rehearsals the piano player would play a popular song once or twice to give the lead and they would play it together, each musician giving his variations. In musical slang, each of these performances was "a jam session," which serious musicians would undoubtedly term a form of musical masturbation.

This primitive form of music, born in dives, and brothels and saloons, in Chicago was discovered by newspaper reporters whose search for news made them acquainted with these places. Late one night during a poker game in the Chicago Press Club the manager of the New Stratford Hotel was complaining that his hotel would soon be bankrupt if he could not discover some new attraction to entice patrons. This hotel was one of the oldest in the city. Its clientele had abandoned it in favor of the new Blackstone Hotel, where the professional dancers Vernon Castle and Irene Dunn were making a tremendous hit with their new form of ballroom dancing: dream waltz and hesitation waltz.

Another reporter and myself told the New Stratford manager to come with us and we would show him a new sensation. We brought him down to the red-light district and showed him these bands. He was delighted and immediately engaged one of them and brought them to his hotel in taxicabs where he sent the regular orchestra home and ordered the Negroes to play. He also engaged several Negro couples to dance the one-step and its variations, for the foxtrot had not yet been invented.

This music was an immediate success and after a few dances some of the guests appeared on the floor to imitate the gyrations of the Negroes. The other reporter and I looked at each other and without saying a word we dashed back to our city-rooms and wrote a story on how the black-and-tan society of the Negro district was teaching the society of the "gold coast" to dance. Our stories appeared on the first page of our papers.

Early the next morning the manager telephoned. He was furious. He claimed we had inveigled him into engaging the Negroes just in order to "obtain a story" and, claiming we had ruined his hotel, he said he was going to sue us both for damages in civil court. That we were going to obtain a story from this exploit never entered my head, and I told him I would come down to his hotel immediately. I arrived at his office an hour later and he met me with profuse apologies. It turned out that our stories had been the best advertisement his hotel had received in many years and when he had arrived at his office he had discovered every table in his restaurant had been reserved for a fortnight in advance. He wished our assistance in aiding him to contact the members of the two orchestras and sign a contract with them to play in his hotel for six months. It developed my colleague and I had helped him to make his fortune. He presented us with a gold fountain pen and the privilege to eat as often as we pleased at his hotel free of charge.

A few weeks later another popular restaurant in Chicago, the College Inn, engaged a jazz orchestra and this new type of music quickly developed into a regular industry. I know that New Orleans claims to be the home of jazz. But the real home of Jazz was the Negro saloon. This lowly birthplace is not mentioned as a detraction. Jazz is a great and widely popular contribution which the Negro has made to the White Man's civilization. It is music in its adolescent form. Its exuberance and vulgarity intensify its appeal.

Near the middle of p. 12 read:

American imperialism is something new, even for Americans. The two chief aims of the Roosevelt Trust are: 1. To reimpose the gold standard on world economy.* 2. To restore equality for the Jews in Europe. But 'equality' is hardly the proper word to use. What is really intended is the domination of Jews over Europe.

A few weeks before I became the first American political refugee in Sweden, one of my colleagues gave me some unsolicited advice. He suggested I should return to America and begin to pull strings to obtain an appointment as American Commissar to the Baltic States when America had won the war. He said that the American government would be glad to be represented by a Nordic American experienced in East European affairs, as I am, and that I should not anticipate any difficulties in that desirable position, inasmuch as I would have with me a little Morgenthau as coadjutor. I replied that I had no wish to be an executive for a Jew and that I hoped that some day the Americans would gain control over their own government in Washington. Many people in Stockholm believed that the war would end in chaos throughout Europe and that Europe would be dominated by the Jews for many years. Since that time, that opinion has undergone some change. American Jews are now showing restraint, so that the Russian Jews may press their own demands.

Those Americans who recognized the imminent peril to their country, who warned their fellow citizens of the immigration of Jews and other alien elements, who lectured about American imperialism, were either frightened into silence or shut up in prison. Hypnotized by the Jew-controlled radio and press, the American people sat idly by while their sovereignty was being stolen from under their noses. The Americans have only now begun to suffer. And for that we have only ourselves to thank.

A singular characteristic of the internal life of the United States has been the disinclination of the older types of Americans to take an active part in the governing of their country. Between the American Civil War and the World War the United States passed through a period of tremendous economic expansion. e.g.s.

On p. 51 the conclusion of Chapter IV must be supplied:

The next morning I visited Minister Zarinsch, who confirmed the Archbishop's information. I asked and received his permission to report this incident to The Tribune.

I shall not claim that Dr. Bihlmans was acting in the Soviet government's interest when he invited me to Moscow as his guest, but in January 1934 I was asked to visit the Latvian Ministry of Foreign Affairs. Bihlmans had been appointed ambassador to Washington. I was shown a report that Bihlmans had written about one of my stories that had appeared in the Tribune on the 1st of January.

In that article I reported that the parliamentary form of government in Latvia had broken down in a jumbled muddle of party politics and corruption, and I predicted that Latvia would presumably be the next country of Europe to have a dictatorial form of government (a result that in fact happened on May 15th of that same year).

Bihlmans said that my article was offensive. But since the Tribune supported its correspondents and was the largest and most influential newspaper in America, he suggested that it would be easier to arrange my expulsion from Latvia through harassment. In his report he proposed three methods. First, the Latvian authorities could claim that I had driven my car in the country illegally and could levy so heavy a fine on me that I would be forced to leave. Second, the police could arrest me and accuse me of driving while intoxicated. Third, they could effect a search of my home to look for contraband.

The last suggestion was typical of Bihlmans' character. A few months earlier, shortly before his departure for America, I gave a dinner in his honor and also invited publishers and correspondents from the region. With the dinner I served wine that I had obtained from a foreign consul who had suddenly been transferred, and I told Bihlmans that for the first time in my life I had acquired a small wine cellar.*

When I asked the official of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs about the government's intentions, he laughed and said, "Bihlmans' memorandum merely shows that he is still working for the Bolsheviks, and you are welcome to stay in Latvia as long as you wish."

I would add that during these past twenty-two years I have written many articles that could be considered favorable or unfavorable about all the countries I visited for the Tribune. I never encountered the slightest difficulty with the new directors or other authorities in Latvia, Estonia, Finland, Sweden, Norway, East Prussia, or Danzig. But I had enormous problems with, and probably escaped by good luck the many traps laid by, the authorities in Soviet Russia, Poland, and Lithuania.

I shall explain this briefly. Those three countries were interested in exploiting the United States. They considered that every news bulletin that conflicted with their propaganda in the United States was detrimental to their interests. The Bolsheviks wanted to obtain recognition and credits. The Poles wanted to ship their Jews and other minorities to the United States as immigrants. They also wanted loans and credits, and they further made every effort to increase the money remittances of the 5,000,000 Poles living in America back to Poland. Lithuanian ambitions were precisely the same.

I have written very many articles and forwarded many cables in the course of these years which reflected credit upon Poland and Lithuania. But I also pitilessly exposed those governments when they attempted to exploit my country in favor of their own. It is strange how quickly a favorable article is forgotten and how long an unfavorable one is remembered. The Polish and Lithuanian press chiefs whom I have known seemed to believe that favorable articles were the only kind that should be written by a correspondent.

* The point here, of course, is that the Jew who had been made Latvian Ambassador to the United States suggested that the Latvian police could find the wine Day had obtained from the consul and, with Jewish ethics, pretend that he had obtained it from smugglers.

On p. 53, the beginning of Chapter V was omitted by the editor of the English book and must be supplied from the mimeographed copy as follows:

ALLIANCE WITH THE BEAR

Nobody but the members of the German community organization in the Baltic States knows how hard they worked to persuade the German Balts to abandon their homes and properties in the Baltic countries and to return to Germany and there accept recompense.* There was much intermarriage between the Balts, Latvians and Russians. In some families only one member repatriated. In others only one or two remained. There were divorces and marriages and many, very many, broken hearts. Some of the older people who repatriated died of homesickness.

One charming feature about the people of Riga was the way they cared for their dead. The cemeteries were all beautifully situated and were tended with love. On that great Lutheran Holiday, the Totenfest, everyone seemed to visit the cemeteries

* Day begins this chapter abruptly with the events that followed the "Non-Aggression Pact" that Hitler concluded with Stalin in August 1939 in an effort to avert the Second World War. The three Baltic states (Latvia, Estonia, and Lithuania) had to be conceded to the Jews' Soviet Empire as part of the price for that treaty, but Germany insisted that the Germans residing in those states be permitted to return to Germany, where they would be compensated for the property they had to abandon. Many German families had been established in those regions for generations, and a sentimental attachment to their ancestral homes and often ties they had formed with non-German families made them understandably reluctant to leave, and Day begins his chapter with the efforts made to persuade them to save their lives. The more fat-headed, their minds stuffed with Jewish swill about "social justice" and the idealism of the gentle-souled Communists, elected to remain. The Baltic countries were occupied in 1940, and the Jews led in their hordes of savage beasts, many of them Mongoloid, for one of the glorious butcheries that warm the hearts of all "Liberal intellectuals" with secret joy, as they see in the extermination of the more intelligent and honorable members of a nation the realization of what they really mean by "spreading democracy." Historians will long debate the wisdom of the "Non-Aggression Pact," which gained for Germany only a short respite from attack by the military serfs of international Jewry, which had declared war on Germany in 1933.

to pay a call upon relatives and friends loved and lost. Very many people refused to leave just because they could not bear the thought of leaving these graves untended. This attitude cannot be considered entirely morbid, for sorrow has been given to us to cleanse the soul. We all have or will experience it.

The repatriated came from all sections of the population. Some were government officials. Others held posts in the army and navy. Many had inherited business enterprises which had been in their families for generations. The repatriates felt themselves bound to the Baltic States by ties stretching back into the centuries.

Riga was a city very largely built by German Balts. To the visitors its architecture was just as German as Danzig and Koenigsberg. Among its citizens could be found rivalry, discontent and even hatred, but they all loved Riga. So did the foreigners who lived there, myself included. The city was not too large. I often declared I never wanted to work in Chicago or New York again. Those cities are so tremendous that one frequently lives two and three hours' ride, in auto, streetcar or subway, from one's place of business or one's friends. You feel yourself fortunate if you can meet your friends two or three times each year. In Riga you could see them frequently. There was the friendly, cozy atmosphere of a small town and just enough privacy to allow it to resemble a city.

The opera was probably the finest in Northern Europe, not excepting Stockholm. Its ballet was actually the best in Europe and nothing outside Russia could be compared to it. There were excellent theatres. During some seasons the Latvian, German and Russian theatres would all stage the same play. It was interesting to attend all of them and compare the different performances, all of which were good. The Russian theatre would stage Soviet plays and as all the actors had an intimate knowledge of Bolshevism and Soviet Life, they would give the performance an added satire and spice which made them noteworthy. The Jewish, Polish and Estonian theatres were also there, although less widely attended.

This competition in art and music made Riga culturally one of the most entertaining and interesting cities in Europe. Take, for instance, the ballet. Now Stockholm has a very fine ballet, but there they are all Swedes and the dancers are tall, slender, beautifully formed girls who look as though they might all have been poured out of the same mold. In Riga the ballet contained Latvians, German-Balts, Russians, Jews, Poles, Estonians, Caucasians, and among the dancers were also some English girls, daughters of families who had resided for some generations in Riga. The difference in nationality intensified the rivalry, with the result that its incomparable performances made the ballet the most popular form of entertainment in the city. When it performed, the opera was sold out. Riga's extraordinarily high artistic life and its cultivation must be credited to the Latvians. It has been a source of constant amazement to the occupation troops.

Germany was already acquainted with Riga's musical ability and genius. When Chaliapin was engaged to perform in three Russian operas in Berlin, the choir of the Latvian opera was invited to come there and sing. At first performance, the choir received more applause than Chaliapin did himself. The ego of the artist was mortified. He demanded the conductor should alter the remaining performances so as to minimize the part of the choir. The conductor refused and Chaliapin, enraged, cancelled his engagement. The choir returned to Riga in triumph. They had "sung down" one of the greatest of living singers, an unprecedented achievement. And they had done it unintentionally.

The opera was one of the most remarkable developments and results of Latvian independence. Its past, and its performances today,* constitute a plea for the preservation of Latvian culture which has already found an echo. I arrived as an impartial American correspondent and now I must come forth as their advocate. I can truthfully report they are an essentially Nordic nation with Nordic traditions and the Nordic way of life. The Latvian blood is sound and has been enhanced rather than spoiled by the mixture of German, Swedish, Russian, French and other bloods which have flavored it in varying quantities during past centuries. Although Jewish Bolshevism with its policy of mongrelizing entire populations by the extermination of the upper classes has caused a terrible scar on the Latvian nation by liquidating the greater part of the upper class, the remainder of the population is sound and the good blood strains, which exist in all nations, remain.

* Day is writing in 1942, when the Baltic states had been reclaimed for civilization by the German Army. His observation of the Jewish technique of destroying nations through mongrelization is extremely important. Since it is not yet feasible to stage large-scale massacres in the United States, mongrelization is promoted by agitation for "equality" and "civil rights" and by "education" to encourage miscegenation.

On p. 99 a section of Day's text and chart was omitted, thus making mysterious the reference to Dr. von Alfthan in the paragraph following the lacuna. Read:

A realization seems to be growing that their future existence depends upon the governments' ability to combat corruption and give their people an honest and efficient administration.

Baron Dr. Bortil von Alfthan, a Finn, an efficiency engineer and for many years my colleague and correspondent of The Chicago Tribune in Finland, has compiled an interesting chart.* He calls it an analysis of the social structure during different ages. I am including it here because it is thought-provoking and seems to give a concise and clear picture of an important phase of the evolution now taking place all over the world. [See next page.]

Dr. von Alfthan's comment upon this chart is as follows:

"When hand work became insufficient to feed the growing masses directly from the earth, machines were invented and the technical age began. Industry requires great capital, and the capitalists became the ruling class whilst warriors were reduced from a class dominating society to a class serving society.

"When industry developed rationalized mass production, the balance between production and consumption was more and more upset, as evidenced by ever increasing unemployment whilst simultaneously grain was burnt and coffee thrown into the seas. New methods of balancing economic life had to be invented. The leaders of this process will rise to the nobility position whilst the money nobility will be reduced to a class serving society instead of dominating it.

"In both cases the new leading class is formed out of the best elements of all three layers of society of the vanishing age, whilst the reactionary members of the former ruling class are pressed downwards.

"The alleged automatic self-adjustment of conditions by the commodity prices under the law of supply and demand in a free market worked satisfactorily during the period of rising capitalism, but now has been outrun by technical development.

* The chart in the mimeographed copies has been corrected from the Swedish. The arrows in the columns opposite the social pyramid show the social mobility by which a class in one era is formed from members of classes in the preceding era. Dr. von Alfthan's analysis invites comparison with James Burnham's famous and phenomenally successful book, The Managerial Revolution. Burnham's description of what was happening in contemporary society is independent of his opinion of its desirability and probable consequences, which subsequently changed drastically. Dr. von Alfthan's era of "Reformism" is, of course, represented by both Fascism and Communism, but was most completely realized in German National Socialism.

"The invention of machines is now being supplemented by the invention of new methods of organization, so as to restore the balance."

Many clear thinking economists foresaw the present world convulsion years ago and published warnings against it. e.g.s.

On p. 126 a substantial and significant passage in Day's book was omitted in the printed book. Read:

I made no attempt to use the columns of The Tribune to defend myself. The Tribune did that for me in the editorial columns.

I only knew of one correspondent representing American newspapers in Moscow whom I respect and whom I am proud to call a real colleague. He is Junius Wood, who represented the Chicago Daily News. He is now retired and living in Holland, Michigan. Junius was a real newspaperman. He came out to Riga occasionally for a breath of fresh air and to replenish his stock of coffee and I was always glad to have him as our guest.

After he had lived in Hotel Polshoye Moskovskaija for a number of years, the management decided they would install a wash basin with hot and cold running water in Junius' room. Several committees called examining the premises. Extensive plans were made. Repeated meetings and conferences were held. At last the workers appeared to begin the undertaking and holes were broken in the floor. The unsheathed hot and cold water pipes were brought side by side up to the basin so that while the hot water was hot the cold water was luke warm through contact with the hot water pipe.

While this convulsive endeavor at progress was being completed, Junius one morning missed his razor, of the straight-bladed variety. He took up his telephone and called up Commissar Jagoda, then chief of the G.P.U. When he got the commissar on the phone, Junius explained his razor had disappeared.

"But what has the G.P.U. to do with that?" asked Jagoda indignantly. "Well," returned Junius, "Your agents have been searching my room and belongings for a number of years, and besides most of the employees of the hotel work for your G.P.U., so I want my razor back."

DR. VON ALFTHAN'S CHART

AGE OF	FEUDALISM	CAPITALISM	REFORMISM
Main source of wealth	Landowning	Industrial production	Balance between production and consumption
Most important social task encouraged by privileged social standing	To conquer and defend lands	To accumulate and direct the use of capital	To coördinate the branches of the national economic life
NOBILITY = MIDDLE CLASS = COMMONS =	KNIGHTS = BOURGEOIS = MASSES	FINANCIERS = DEFENSE FORCES = CITIZENS	ORGANIZERS = ENTERPRISERS = NATION

Jagoda began to get excited and attempted to order Junius to complain to the ordinary police.

Junius refused. "I've heard a lot about the G.P.U. and what a wonderful organization it is," he said. "Now you have the chance to prove that you are not just a cheap second-class detective agency. If you can find my razor, then I will agree that the G.P.U. is a real secret service. I hold you personally responsible for the return of my razor and I want it back."

A short time later, some leather-clad G.P.U. men entered the room. They made a thorough search. They also arrested and searched the workers who had installed the wash basin. But they did not find the razor. The plumber's union held an indignation meeting, where protest speeches were made that an American correspondent should accuse some of their membership of complicity in the disappearance of his razor. The dignity and honor of the Soviet worker had been impugned. Junius refused to apologize and continued to demand the G.P.U. find his razor. But he gave them an impossible task. The incident ended with the plumber's union sending a delegation to hand Junius a check to enable him to purchase a new razor and to apologize for the presence of some of their members in his room approximating the time his razor disappeared.

Junius finally left Moscow because the hotel persisted in increasing the price of his room until he was paying some twelve dollars a day. This irritated his editor who transferred him to Berlin.

Another type of newspaperman was Eugene Lyons, one-time correspondent of the United Press in Moscow. In 1935 The Tribune published the following editorial about Lyons under the headline:

NEWS FROM MOSCOW.

> Occasionally readers inquire why The Tribune refuses to send a correspondent to Moscow. The reason is that an objective reporter cannot remain there. If any further evidence is required in support of this position, it is provided in this month's issue of Harper's Magazine, in an article entitled "To Tell or Not to Tell" by Eugene Lyons.
>
> Mr. Lyons represented the United Press, an American news agency, in Moscow. He went there, he said, a firm sympathizer with the revolution. He deliberately set himself the task of presenting Russia to his American readers in as favorable light as he could. He played up the items which reflected credit upon the Bolsheviks. He glossed over the news which was unfavorable. His home office encouraged him in this practice, he says, in the expectation of being rewarded with the inside track on news. In this hope they were not disappointed. Because he had been the best of the good boys, Mr. Lyons was given a first exclusive interview with Stalin. Life was made extremely comfortable for him.
>
> Mr. Lyons now concedes that Communism as practiced in Russia is brutal oppression supported by torture, murder, starvation. He laments that so-called liberals in America are not alive to the truth. The fact that their simple faith in Bolshevik goodness was supported by his deliberate distortion of the news seems to cause him no pangs of conscience.
>
> This is not to say that Mr. Lyons has no conscience. It is merely a bit slow in its operation. He went to Russia in 1932. After five or six years there he made the momentous decision to tell the truth. Now the gates of Russia are closed to him. He can't go back any more, he says, because the commissars won't permit that kind of reporting.
> Until this attitude changes there will be no resident Tribune reporter in Russia.

Of course, Lyons is a Jew. And like many Jews, he tells the truth when it pays him well to do so. Other American correspondents in Moscow reported that when Lyons arrived he was a member of the American Communist Party in good standing and his employers knew of this political affiliation. Being the most unscrupulous and unprincipled of the American news agencies, the United Press naturally became the unofficial news agency of the Roosevelt Trust.

Duranty, Lyons, and Chamberlain (Christian Science Monitor) all made a special point of denouncing me and my reports of the great famine in the Ukraine in 1934, when some five million people died of starvation. e.q.s.

In the third paragraph on p. 141, the editor of the book, misunderstanding a one-word lacuna in the mimeographed copy, rewrote a sentence to make nonsense. Correct your copy to read:

He foiled two plots to overthrow his dictatorship. He had used the pampered officers of the air force to stage his putsch by promising them some new airplanes. His enemies, a few years later, attempted to use the same tactics. I happened to be in Kaunas on one of these occasions, e.q.s.

Chapter V,, pp. 197-199, needs to be so largely supplemented from the Swedish that it will be more perspicuous to print the entire chapter here.

ENGLAND

In the winter of 1927, John Steele, chief of the Tribune's London bureau, asked me to accompany him to the foreign office as one of the officials there had expressed the desire to meet me. I recognized the flattery and wondered what I had done to merit such attentions.

We were received by Sir George Clark, a typical tall, lean Englishman, whose growth had not been stunted by lack of food in his youth. Sir George conversed with Steele about various matters and I patiently waited. As he seemed to have no questions for me, I became the questioner. I asked whether the British government would not someday contemplate a more active participation in Baltic affairs, since the governments of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania, and, so far as I knew, also those of Finland and Sweden, would like nothing more than to have Great Britain declare the Baltic a neutral sea.

Sir George was almost brusque in his reply: "Those small countries have no permanence. They are here today and gone tomorrow. There can be no question of Great Britain's guaranteeing the status quo in the Baltic and it is not in her interest to do so."

I replied that the Baltic states would hear that with deep regret, since they all based their hopes on Great Britain, which they encouraged in every possible way through their foreign trade.

I then asked about England's policy toward the Soviet government, and mentioned a series of articles by a member of the Communist International that had appeared in Moscow's Izvestia. Those articles described in detail the plans by which Sun Yat Sen intended to begin a new campaign against British interests in China with support from the Communist International. I had found them sufficiently significant to have them translated and sent to my newspaper.

Sir George said that he knew of the articles in question, but that the British government did not attach much importance to the Communist International or the plans of the Soviet government. "Mr. Day, you are too close to Moscow in Riga to obtain a proper perspective," he said. "The English government's primary aim in China is to do business. The primary concern of the Chinese is also to do business. Neither Sun Yat Sen nor the Communist International will be able to hinder us from doing business with each other. The Communist International's operations are of very little interest to us. Viewed from London these matters look different from what they do from Riga."

Thus ended my conversation with Sir George Clark and I never learned why he wished to meet me. As we were leaving the Foreign Office, I asked John Steele whether Sir George was considered to be a capable diplomat. Steele assured me that he was one of the best and had a brilliant career ahead.

I replied that I had been brought up with a great respect for England, since my father always loved and admired England above all countries with the exception of our own. From what I had heard about England, I had formed the opinion that British diplomacy was so far-sighted and complex that many things which seemed contradictory and confusing in the policies of the moment, would turn out, years in the future, in accordance with the British governments's designs.

I added that I was grateful for our visit, since it had totally shattered that illusion.* It had shown me that the principal objective of British policies was profit, and, more specifically, instant profit. I advised John to watch developments in China and to remember the Communist International's program and predictions. And Sun Yat Sen, before he died a few years later, did succeed in thwarting a large part of the commercial relations Sir George had so confidently anticipated.

* We have every reason to believe that Day was right in identifying the monumental stupidity exhibited by Sir George Clark as representing the views of his superiors in the government of Stanley Baldwin, whom many believe to have been no more than a blockhead when he engineered the abdication of King Edward VIII, who, whatever his capacities, would have been an obstacle to the Jews' plans for a crusade against Germany and the race that Germany represented. Some Englishmen claim to know indications that Edward's infatuation with the American divorcée was merely a pretext for an abdication to which he consented when he saw that the British ruling class was so corrupted that a suicidal war against Germany could not be averted. Others, seemingly as well informed, believe Edward was not much more intelligent than Baldwin.

The respect for the British government which I lost on this journey to London was never regained. I still love England when I look at my bookcase, but when I contemplate her government I have a quite different feeling. In 1934, when I visited my headquarters back home, I was offered a position in the London bureau. That appointment would have brought higher wages and opportunities to travel home more often. I declined.

My visit to the Foreign Office may seem but a trivial incident. It is a succession or culmination of such incidents that influence one's opinions. My conversation with Sir George revealed at least that English diplomacy was not so competent as I had thought.

I was disappointed, but not so bitterly as were the Reiter Choir during their visit to England. They were among the best choral singers in northern Europe, because the Latvians, like most people, love to sing. Theodore Reiter accepted an invitation to take his choir to Wales, where there is an ancient tradition of choral music. Most of the Latvian singers could speak English. Many had studied at the English Institute in Riga. They had that profound respect and very warm admiration for England that is so clearly evident in all the Baltic countries.

I spoke with members of the choir when they returned. They were deeply shocked by what they had observed in Cardiff and other cities in Wales. The inhabitants' frightful poverty and the general misery in that coal district, where the coal mining and processing works were shut down while England was buying cheap coal from Poland, caused the Latvian singers to lose respect for England. Upon their return to Riga, many of the same group felt that a revolution in Britain was inevitable. They were deeply shaken to find in Britain a grinding poverty that had no counterpart in the Baltic lands. Reiter's choir had travelled through many countries in Europe and given concerts in most of the European capitals. They were thus in a position to make comparisons. If small countries like Latvia were able to feed and shelter their people properly, they wondered why so much suffering and degradation should be found in the world's richest and most powerful nation.

Another aspect of life in the British ghettos that impressed the choir unfavorably was the prevalence of alcoholism among women of the working class. It was a common sight to find dozens of baby buggies standing outside the pubs, while the women sat inside, drinking gin and beer. Nothing like that could be seen in European countries. They could not find any excuse for such conduct, which they considered unpardonable. But the disappointment of this small group of Latvians was the exception.

One of the invisible factors that the English certainly counted on, when they wholly and unreservedly entered into the Jewish plan to marshal Europe for an attack on Germany, was the distinctly high prestige Englishmen enjoyed in Europe.

People did more than admire and respect England. Many really loved England. Like other love, this love is also blind to reason. And one of the most difficult things which the Germans have had to contend with was this love for John Bull, that fat old man whose round, chubby nose revealed he liked to acquire other people's property and keep it for himself.

The fat old man had plenty of money. He was popular because he liked to give other folks books and films that showed how high-minded and noble he had been in his youth, and how dignified, honest, and respectable he was in his old age. It did not matter that an examination of his earlier life revealed that he had been a robber and an arrant knave, and that in his later years he had become a pharisaical hypocrite. He was encompassed by the splendor and prestige of wealth. When he spoke, his voice commanded the attention of millions of adults, who listened with the same rapt attention with which children listen to fairy tales.

The fat old man lived on an island. He had many visitors who came to admire him. Now and then he would go travelling. He dared not misbehave at home, so when he wanted to cut loose from his inhibitions, he would take a short trip to Paris. There he could do whatsoever he wished, because he always had lots of money with him on his travels. He would also make longer journeys. These usually concerned his possessions in various parts of the world or were for the purpose of transacting business affairs that would make his home life more abundant.

In his youth, middle-age, and even until 1914, this man kept himself well informed. He paid handsomely for intelligence and maintained diplomats, agents, and journalists in foreign lands who kept him informed of what was happening in the world. As with most rich people, the primary objective of this man's life was to acquire more money and greater power. He also refused to leave any of his property to another person, whoever that might be. He owed America a large debt, but refused to turn over his islands or other possessions in the western hemisphere as payment of his debts from the [first] World War. He had, moreover, seized Germany's colonies, which were to be governed as mandated territories until it was time to return them, but that time never came. When Germany finally asked for their return, he said he could not return them because he had transferred those mandates to his dependents, mainly South Africa and Australia.

When he saw that Germany was rapidly becoming so powerful that she would be in a position to repeat her demands with such strength behind her words that he would be forced to listen, he decided to take action. That was one of the main reasons for his decision to go to war all over again. Just as in the previous war, he was confident that everyone loved him so much they would be willing to serve his purposes in his new war. He accordingly made many generous promises and the war began precisely as he wanted it.

But it turned out that he had been badly misinformed. His diplomats, in their inimitable, arrogant, and self-serving fashion, blundered again and again. His foreign correspondents and agents, many of whom were Jews, sent him bedizened reports that turned out to be false and misleading.

The favorite publication of this old man was, and is, a humorous weekly called Punch. There is many a true word spoken in jest, as the following poem, published on page 198 in the 21 August 1940 issue of Punch exemplifies.

THE RETURN OF THE NATIVE
By A.P.H.

Our crude Victorian Papas
Were fond of giving loud hurrahs
For Nelson, Blake and Hood;
And, not content with such displays
They added then the horrid phrase
"The foreigner's no good,"

While quite unable to dismiss
The simple tale of Genesis
They never understood
Why Adam, first upon the earth,
Was not of honest British birth,
And therefore no damned good.

And when from their well-ordered home
They went to Paris or Rome
(as in those days one could),
Each morning reinforced and warmed
The mournful view already formed
"The foreigner's NO GOOD."

Such sentiments of course amaze
In these humane, enlightened days
Of general brotherhood;
But really, when one looks about,
There does intrude a tiny doubt
"Are foreigners much good?"

At all events, the nation's tone
Is brighter now that we're alone,
And have not left the wood,
Than when our friends were quite a queue,
Perhaps we still accept the view —
"The foreigner's no good."

In English usage, the word 'native' *(inföding) has a

* In the text, the word 'native' is in English and is followed by the Swedish definition, which should have reminded Day that infödingsrätt is the normal Swedish term for 'the rights of citizens,' i.e., of persons who are born in the nation of which they are members, a nation, properly speaking, being composed of persons who are united by belonging to the same race, subrace, and ethnic group and so presumably have a common descent from remote ancestors. The incomprehension that Day shows here is amazing and goes far beyond the obvious fact that in neither Britain nor the United States do expressions such as "to speak French like a native" carry a pejorative connotation. In the title of the English verses, he has not only missed the allusion to Hardy's well-known novel, but failed to see that the 'native' meant is precisely the Englishman who is said to be reverting to his inborn prejudice against foreigners.

Day's polemic against Britain is unfair, but understandable. He wrote derogatory meaning and is applied to all creatures that are not English. In Stockholm I was recently astonished to read in an English-Swedish grammar published in London that a little study of the book would enable an English tourist in Sweden "to converse with and make himself understood by the natives." This distinction places the Swedes in a category beneath Englishmen. The Englishman is more than conceited, he is stupid, and takes the liberty of looking down upon a Swede, although the Swede has a far higher standard of living than the English, has an equally proud and perhaps more honorable history, and equally high or higher level of culture.

This attitude, which as I can attest from my own experience, is very widespread, has prevented the Englishman from gaining a proper understanding of other nations. In general, he was glad to leave others in peace so long as they did not own something he wanted, or so long as his own interests were not affected. But when they were, at that very moment one could not but pity the natives, whether they were the wild mountain tribes on the frontiers of India, who were the first human beings to be subjected to death and destruction by high-explosive bombs from British planes during the years following the [first] World War, or the somewhat more civilized Poles, who were made to start a war with Germany by British promises, or the perhaps over-civilized Norwegian King, Haakon, who owed his declaration of war against Germany to promises of help from England. Promises emanating from Downing Street or the White House are not worth a bit more than those from the Kremlin.

The English often hit upon clever propaganda. One of their ideals that sounds good is contained in the expression, "Live and let live." That ideal can be translated as "Live, but let me live better than you, my good man."

The chapter ends here. Everything that appears in the printed book on p. 199 after the verses, "The Return of the Native," is obviously out of place, probably because a page or two of the carbon copy was displaced when the mimeographed text was transcribed. It appears with some expansion in the following chapter, which it seems best to print in its entirety. A large part of this chapter is preserved only in the Swedish, and where this overlaps the English text, there are quite a few points at which it is difficult to decide whether the Swedish translation is somewhat free or shows stylistic revisions made by Day himself. Where there is a choice, I have preferred to adhere to the printed English text in what follows.

under the stress of a strong and even justifiable emotion, excited by the terrible war that Britain had officially forced on the world and for which she, as a nation, must bear the gravaman of guilt. Although that war was, of course, contrived by the Jews and incited by the intrigues of a half-English traitor, Churchill, and the loathsome creature that then befouled the White House, the two conspirators had natives of both countries as conscious accomplices in their ghastly crime, and it was Great Britain that officially began the war by attacking Germany.

EUROPE

Europe will win. Yet again, she is winning the fight for her survival.* All have suffered and almost all have made sacrifices. And to Europe's credit it must be said that those who have not are few. Danger has welded Europe together. Even those great groups of people who were formerly united,† and who still persist, in some countries, to defend class rights and privileges are beginning to see that Europe cannot exist half slave and half free and that the moral, spiritual, cultural, and economic bankruptcy of one country will only lead to catastrophe for others.

A new conception of life is arising. In the future the nations of Europe are going, first of all, to think of themselves as Europeans with a common heritage of European culture. This culture is too great and rich for one nation to claim as its own. All have made their contributions, some large, some small. But Europe and its future belongs to the Europeans, not to outside forces. And the victory approaches that will provide a defense for their culture.

The outlook for the future is no longer obscured by the miasmas of Communism, Social Democratism, Liberalism, and the other -isms so assiduously cultivated and subsidized by Jewry in its battle for a living space which comprises the entire world—a battle that is desperate and imperils the whole world. The globe is being divided up all over again. Europe will belong to the Europeans: that is the most definite result of the war up to now. Asia will belong to the Asiatics, and America to the Americans. Whether the Nordic Americans will succeed in regaining and maintaining control of their heritage or will remain under a cultural and spiritual Jewish hegemony is a question the future will decide. Africa's destiny is now in flux. We do not know whether that side of the war will end in a compromise that may perhaps create a new battlefield for another war in the future. But Africa must belong to Europe, and finally shall.

* It must be remembered that Day wrote in 1942, when the great German victories seemed to assure a bright future for our race.

† The reference, of course, is to the European nobility, which transcended national boundaries and intermarried, as did royalty, from country to country, thus feeling a unity that separated them from the lower classes everywhere.

It is only natural that one race would become the leader in Europe. There is a conception that geographical conditions shape and mold men and nations. Geography and nature can do much, but if that were the case, the shape of men's heads should be just as uniform as the shape of their hands and feet. We are all more or less biological accidents, conceived and born in the same manner. But science tells us mankind is divided into many races. We don't all come from the same Adam.

And history shows us Northern Europe is the home of the Teutonic-Nordic race. The Oxford English Dictionary defines the terms thus:* "Teuton: A German; in extended ethnic sense, any member of the races of peoples speaking a Germanic, or Teutonic, language." And 'Teutonic,' as applied to language, is defined as "Of or pertaining to the group of languages allied to the German (including Gothic, Scandinavian, Low German, and English), forming one of the great branches of the Indo-European, Indo-Germanic, or Aryan family."

This is the race which founded and is responsible for what we call Western civilization. Branches of this race, the so-called Anglo-Saxons, have, in the space of one generation, come under the control of the Jewish race, which, with the revolution of 1917, gained control of the Slavic race in Russia. The Jews are now trying to destroy Western culture and to enslave the Nordic-Teutonic race.

That is the real and true war which is now being fought. It is not a war between countries, such as Germany, Finland, Italy, Russia, England, and the United States. These are merely family names. The real war is between the Jews and the Teutonic-Nordic race. The latter are beginning to realize what their fate would be, if the Jews should win this war.

* The Swedish is a condensation which I have expanded by quoting directly from the large Oxford Dictionary. To complete the definition, we may add, "Nordic: Of or pertaining to or characteristic of the people of Northern Europe or the type to which Deniker assigns them." The reference is to Joseph Deniker, the French anthropologist whose manual, Les races de l'Europe (Paris, 1908), provided, on the basis of extensive anthropometric research, the standard racial classification of Europeans that is generally accepted. Europeans (excluding, of course, Jews and other alien races that have infiltrated the Continent) are all Aryan, and Nordics are therefore a branch of the Aryan race as a whole.

German topography has molded the Germans into a race of keen observers. They have been surrounded by other people for hundreds of years. Every German can tell the difference between the French, Dutch, Lithuanian, Polish, Russian, Czech, Slovak, Hungarian, Croatian, Serbian, and Italian peoples. Some of the peoples are branches of the Nordic-Teutonic race; others are Slavs, and still others belong to the Mediterranean race. The Germans, through their close personal contact with these many peoples, stand in the best position to understand their several national ambitions, aspirations, and racial sensibilities. Even as did the vanguard of the Nordic-Teutonic race, many of these peoples repeatedly fought victorious battles for their existence. Their innate racial capacities produced leaders in times of peril. Today this peril is imminent.

Some old friends, among them Scandinavians and Germans, have confided to me their pessimistic belief that European culture will succumb in the present war. This apprehension has always surprised me when expressed by a mature and educated person.*

In viewing the United States, I am afraid Europeans are prone to judge my country by standards existing in their own. In doing that, they are making a mistake. If the United States had the same social structure as Germany, Finland, or Sweden, I would even then have my doubts about the outcome of the present war. If the United States has great strength, it also has great weaknesses.

The most noteworthy is this: America has no military class that can provide the people with military leaders. I know that not even during the course of the previous war was the United States able to produce military leaders who could bear comparison with any one of five hundred military men from Finland. It is just as impossible to turn out a competent officer in a few months of intensive training as it is to turn out a competent physician in the same period of time.

Another of America's great weaknesses is this: America lacks

* How pathetic Day's indefatigable optimism sounds today, when Aryans, throughout the world, cringe at the feet of their Jewish masters and acquiesce in the liquidation of their race, hoping only to cadge a few counterfeit dollars in the meantime!

a sufficiently large class of civil servants with the old and sound traditions of honor, loyalty, and competent diligence, such as exists in the three aforementioned countries and others. The American bureaucracy, born under the Roosevelt administration, is a corrupt and inefficient growth that follows the traditions of former days, when political appointees did everything they could to improve their material circumstances under the political regime which appointed them, because of the knowledge they would lose those lucrative posts under a new president.

America's third great weakness is this: The United States never dreamed of conquering and ruling the world* before the Roosevelt Trust established itself in the White House. Just how far the average American is attracted by this strange-tasting medicine of Roosevelt has yet to be revealed, because the average American is inarticulate. From everything I know about my country I can at least report that real Americans are not at all pleased to find themselves allies and supporters of Bolshevism, because these Americans are Christians.†

I can report with perfect truth that the average American does not like England any more than he likes Cuba. The average American, since the close of the First World War, has applauded the idea of never again interfering in a war in Europe. The average American knows that his country, before it suddenly found itself dragged into this war, was in a cultural,

* This may sound strange today, when few remember that in 1939-45 there was a current in American thought which expected that the United States, still a nation, would profit by the World War to establish a hegemony over the whole world and an Imperium Americanum modelled on the great Roman Empire.

† The reader should again remember that this was written in 1942, before the Christianity of the West had been almost entirely subverted and reclaimed by the Jews, becoming again an instrument of their purpose to make the entire globe what Canaan was in the tradition transmitted by their Bible.

 Remember that when this was written, Cuba was just an insignificant, but perpetually troublesome, island off the coast of Florida. It was not until 1959 that the aliens who have taken over control of the United States, with the coöperation of their Aryan hirelings and "Liberal" nitwits, installed a Communist dictatorship in Cuba. Many simple-minded persons still like to imagine that their rulers in Washington are "anti-Communist."

social, and economic mess, involved in the worst crisis in America's short history.

The average American has been indulgent toward political corruption. As a matter of fact, political corruption had come to be considered inseparable from politics, on both the local and national levels. The average American has always regarded the government as his servant, and now he has suddenly discovered it has become his boss. It is doubtful whether the government will become his servant again. Which will be the master depends on the American himself. He can either demand the same efficient service from government that he requires of his hospital, or he may become apathetic and submissive, like the slaves under the terror-regime that is inspired and directed by Jews. If another alternative should exist, the average American must find it. And with the knowledge I have of my countrymen, I anxiously await the day when Americans will regain control over the government of the United States.

In judging the pessimistic type of mentality, with which I now and then come into contact, I gain the impression that very many Europeans have the same idea of America that America has of Europe. Only the European's ideas are favorable, while American's ideas are unfavorable. Altogether too many people have viewed international developments and their guiding principles through Jewish eyeglasses.

However, the morale of Europe is higher than the morale of the United States. Just as the stone-steady Finns observe Russia through eyes that have the experience of hundreds of years behind them, so the other nations quietly observe the furious efforts of Europe's enemies to find the chink in her armor through which they can administer the death-blow. Those pessimists whom I have mentioned are few and far between. Some of them are just Liberals with a dynamic sentimentality and a static reason.

* * * * *

The greater part of this book consists in pages from my memory. It contains my experiences and impressions, which may perhaps be welcome, and my opinions, which may not be. I am fortunate in possessing many friends whose views do not coincide with my own. To them I make no apologies. If a man is to be judged by his enemies as well as by his friends, I can point with pride to quite a host of ill-wishers.

My career as a correspondent ended because I found myself unable to become a soothsayer. I have remained in Europe because I prefer to fight with all my power against the Bolsheviks and the Jews, rather than fight for them. It is a deep disappointment to me that the Finnish government did not accept my services as a volunteer. That compelled me to write this book. The fact that I am today a political refugee is not pleasant. Today, many of us are clinging to the past. But if we are to hold to any of our beliefs, then let us continue to think that stealing is dishonest and lying dishonorable, for that is what separates through the centuries the Christian from the Jew. It is we, who are fighting for Europe today, that have the right to sing,

ONWARD, CHRISTIAN SOLDIERS.

On p. 204, the Epilogue should begin

This book was written during the winter of 1942-43. I have been told that a paper shortage prevented publication.*

In the meantime, I have looked over it again. Persons who read the manuscript suggested I delete a portion of it. I decided not to. e.g.s.

* I.e., until 1944. The "paper shortage" was in Sweden, one of the leading paper-exporting countries of the world. Do your nostrils detect the characteristic stench of Jewry? In the Swedish text, the passage in the middle of the fourth paragraph on p. 204, "I only need mention Mr. Himmler . . . only appeared a few years ago," does not appear.

EDITORIAL NOTE

With the foregoing supplements, we have at last as accurate a text of Donald Day's Onward, Christian Soldiers as we are likely to have, barring the remote possibility that the manuscript Day gave to his Swedish translator may yet be discovered.

The Swedish translation is pedestrian, as indeed is Day's English style, but a comparison of the Swedish with the extant parts of the English assures me of the translator's general competence. In one passage, which we have only in the Swedish, in which Day reports his refusal to become a well-paid and dignified member of our Diplomatic Service with a "little Morgenthau" as an "adviser" to tell him what to do, the translator was evidently confused by the irony of some English phrase such as "executive for a Jew" and reversed Day's obvious meaning; this was corrected in the foregoing text.

The mimeographed version is evidently a transcription from Day's carbon copy, with only such errors as only the most expert typists can entirely avoid. There is, however, one very odd error in the mimeographed version corresponding to our printed page 4 above: it reads "the Great Rocky mountains of the border of Tennessee and North Carolina." That is geographically absurd, of course, and the Swedish (stora Rökiga Bergen) shows that Day wrote "Great Smoky mountains," as we have printed above. It is probably only a coincidence that the Swedish word for "Smoky" could have suggested, to a person who knew no Swedish, the error made by the typist in California who copied Day's carbon copy.

When Day relies on his recollection of what he was told years before, his memory is sometimes faulty, and we have naturally made no changes in what he wrote. He makes an obvious error on our page 4, where he says that the Cherokees were driven from their lands and moved to Indian Territory "toward the end of the last century." Actually, the expulsion of the Cherokee Nation by an American army took place in 1838. The Cherokees, by the way, were the most nearly civilized of all the Indian tribes in the territory that is now the United States and Canada, and it is true that their expulsion from the lands that had been guaranteed to them by treaty inflicted great hardships on them: they lost most of their property, including their negro slaves, and large numbers of them perished as they were quite brutally herded from the Appalachians almost half way across the continent to what is now the southern border of Arkansas. Ethnologists who have made intensive studies of the Indians of North America (e.g., Peter Farb) regard Sequoyah (Sequoia) as perhaps "the greatest intellect the Indians produced." He was the son of a Cherokee woman by an unidentified white trader, and, growing up with the mother's people, regarded himself as a Cherokee. He, however, was an exception to what Day says about half-breeds. Day may have been confused about the date of the expulsion because a few of the Cherokees succeeded in hiding from the perquisition in the wilds of the Great Smokies and were eventually given the small reservation they now occupy east of Bryson City in the toe of North Carolina. There was some agitation about them "near the end of the last century."

The circumstances in which Day's carbon copy was smuggled into the United States remain obscure. When the mimeographed transcription was made and first issued, it contained a prefatory page on which an anonymous writer said, "It is my understanding that this book was published in 1942, and then merely made an appearance at the book-sellers, when all copies were immediately withdrawn and destroyed without a single copy escaping the book-burners. I was also told that Mr. Day died shortly after this incident." The page was presumably withdrawn when its author learned that Day was still alive at that time and an exile in Helsinki, since the Jews who rule the United States would not permit him to return to his native land.

It is curious that the man who made the transcription, which did effectively preserve Day's work for the future, and who was evidently a resident of California, had heard a somewhat less plausible version of the rumor that was current in Washington in 1943. (See the review by Professor Oliver in Liberty Bell, January 1983, p. 27). It is quite possible that the source of both rumors was an effort by the apparatus of the great War Criminal in the White House to prevent the publication of the Swedish translation, which, as Day tells us in the last item in our supplements, was delayed in the press for two years by a "paper shortage" and it is noteworthy that the paper for it was finally obtained in Finland, not Sweden.* Until the book was finally published in 1944, the enemies of mankind could have imagined that their pressures on Sweden had effectively prevented Day's exposure of one phase of their activity from ever appearing in print. □

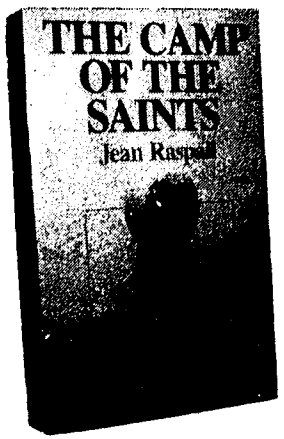
* Day's book was published by Europa Edition in Stockholm, which, however, had to have the printing done by Mercators Tryckeri in Helsinki. Although copies of the Swedish book have been preserved, Day's work would not now be generally known—and would be supposed lost by Americans who heard of it—if the anonymous gentleman in California had not issued his mimeographed transcription.

friends to pool their money and place their efforts behind a truly revolutionary movement. We'd like to do all those things, but you see—that's not the way Nature works. As with a child, the lesson must be learned through experience; hopefully, then, the experience will bring maturity and wisdom. As much as we'd like to save our friends that heartbreak of disappointment and disillusionment, we can't; they are conditioned to regard anyone of our persuasion as radical fools, etc., and our words are lost on them.

As mentioned, It's an ill wind that blows no good. A few will realize that the System can be fought and our people saved from extinction in only ONE way. Our numbers will grow as things get worse, and every day brings us closer to 1776. And it WILL come; it would come even sooner if our people would wake up to the con game worked by the Establishment in the form of the elephant and, appropriately, the jackass.

The voice of pessimism, you say? A natural reaction. Experience remains the best teacher—and Time proves the validity of a pronouncement such as the one we make. That's just the way it is; we welcome you with open arms at your journey's end!

Does the West have the will to survive?



That is the obvious question posed by Jean Raspail's terrifying novel of the swamping of the White world by an unlimited flood of non-White "refugees." But there is also a less obvious and even more fundamental question: Must Whites find their way to a new morality and a new spirituality in order to face the moral challenges of the present and overcome them? THE CAMP OF THE SAINTS is the most frightening book you will ever read. It is frightening because it it is utterly believable. The armada of refugee ships in Raspail's story is exactly like the one that dumped 150,000 Cubans from Fidel Castro's prisons and insane asylums on our shores in 1980 — except this time the armada is from India, with more than 70 times as large a population. And it is only the first armada of many. If any book will awaken White Americans to the danger they face from uncontrolled immigration, it is THE CAMP OF THE SAINTS. For your copy send $7.00 (which includes $1.00 for shipping) to: LIBERTY BELL PUBLICATIONS, Box 21, Reedy, WV 25270 USA Ord.# 3014

WHITE RACIAL NATIONALISM

by Major Donald Vincent Clerkin
Chairman, Euro-American Alliance

The Constitutional Republic is dead. America has been swept by Jewish Social Democracy, totally corrupt because it is an unnatural Idée-Fixe foisted upon our White race by Jewish socialist forces born of the French and Industrial Revolution. Jewish Social Democracy—the democracy of Roosevelt, Rockefeller, Mondale, Hart, and Reagan—was the only political movement insidiously similar enough to Constitutionalism to invade the body politic in the manner of a microbe. Once in the mainstream of American political and social life, Jewish Social Democracy unveiled its true face, the form of anti-White agitations and Zionist control. Like the Roman Republic, the American Republic died a slow death by strangulation, the rope about the neck, as it were, being the power of Money and Jewish Usury.

Hook the goyim on the desire for Money and material wealth, then restrict its supply, making the goyim beg for credit. That is how the Jews enslaved the Aryan in America. Television set the pace, while the goyim drooled over the baubles which were shown on the electronic toilet. From the time these goyim were children, the Jews have controlled their thought processes.

Not all of us, however, have been so gulled. We racial nationalists instinctively know the Jew for what he is. And though there aren't many true racial nationalists in America, and even fewer real leaders, still, the Jews fear us. They fear that our message will infect the souls of the Aryan people in America; they fear that we will destroy their power over the minds of our people. We mean to do just that. It is our duty!

Let's get one thing straight right off. A racial nationalist owes allegiance to his race, his historical culture, and to the future health and well-being of his racial nation. We do not march to the drum of the Jews, played by Uncle Sap/Shamska. Those goyim who do can send their sons off to die in the next Jew war; ours won't ever go again. The Jew-nited. Snakes Garbage Dump cares nothing for the Aryan; The Zionist Occupation Government will destroy the Aryan, if we stand by and let it happen.

In every state of the Union, Jewish agents are working legislatures, passing laws which they hope will stifle the Aryanist Movement. It serves to demonstrate our point that the Jews consider the racial nationalist the prime target of their attacks. None other than the confirmed racial nationalist can expect to be effective against the rotting influence of Jewish psychological pressure. After all, it does no good to call us racists—we glorify in it! Anti-Semites? We are anti-Jewish: every racial nationalist opposes professional Semitism of the Jew oppressor. What is there left to call us? Nazis? Why not! Fascists? Certainly! Just don't call us 'Judeo—Christians!' Don't put us in the same boat with the lilly-livered 'conservatives,' who have sold out the White race and the Aryan culture for the favors of the Jews. Conservatives are the great fools who think that Communism can be fought by supporting Communist/Zionist Israel. If that seems to be a contradiction, it may be that conservatives have grown accustomed to lying to themselves and the White race.

Will it do any good to continue living among these goyim? Can we get anywhere trying to convince them that the Jew overloard means to reduce them to the status of slaves? Probably not. The goyim are so cowardly that they fake ignorance, so as not to be held liable later for doing nothing about it.

At a recent Alliance meeting here in Milwaukee, a member brought us a videotape showing, among other things, the actual Jewish method of ritual slaughter of a cow. Were the goyim all across the nation to be able to witness this demonstration of Jewish cruelty to a common animal, this shechita, first they might want to vomit. Some might be angered by the sight of the leering rabbinical butcherman, wielding his knife to the throat of the terrified beast; others would swallow their souls, rationalizing that even they, the goyim, eat meat. Thus, the Jew would be exonerated in their minds; not discovered for the arch-villain and torturer that he is. If, however, this one brutal Jewish scene could be shown to the entire nation, a nation reared on misleading pictures and descriptions of crematoria, a nation ordered by the Jews to hate everything Aryan, we believe that Jewry might succumb.

Isn't it rather sad that with all the proven Jewish atrocities against their opponents, the scene of a cow being ritually slaughtered might turn the tide against them. Maybe that's why the Jews don't mind having the goyim see the dead bodies of Israel's enemies, but they would scream like hell if someone dared to publicly show the footage of the shechita. Make certain that Jewish ritual slaughter will never be shown as a school documentary offering as long as they control the government and the media. One never knows where bits of film such as this will turn up. It exists, like "Triumph Of The Will" and "Jud Suess," like "Birth Of A Nation;" and wherever such films are shown, there will be sown the seeds of Aryan liberation.

We may, as Aryan racial nationalist, prepare ourselves for further expressions of Jewish hatred and contempt. Be certain that the Jew is our mortal enemy. He will destroy us all, if he can. The goyim don't have a chance against the Jew: they refuse to recognize the Jew as their foe. But this Jew spectre, this vampire, can have no power over the courageous racial nationalist. The Jew conspires to imprison us; he would have us murdered. Not one of our racial nationalist leaders has made a deal with the ZOG!

It has been aptly said that America is today a reflection of Weimar Germany. The Jews take great pains to deny it, for the parallels are so drawn that aware Aryans would instantly see what they are up against. What seemed like unshakable Jewish power over Germany in 1925, was destroyed in 1933. Even today, after Germany's defeat in World War II, the Plutocratic powers have to occupy the Western portion of the German nation, to force the Germans to pay their reparations to Israel, and to make sure that the old nationalist ideals do not once again surge to the surface. But they will again rise!

It is the same for us in occupied America. Each Aryan racial nationalist has made his/her decision to be a fighter for our race. Let the goyim serve their Jewish masters as slaves. It is their free choice to make. We racial nationalists will treat them as we treat the Jews, as we treat race traitors. There will come a time in which the 'white' mongrelizers will beg us for help. To them we turn our backs: let the coloreds they loved so much eat them alive! For our own fighters only do we give our courage, our blood—our very lives. □

During World War II, Dr. Oliver was Director of Research in a highly secret agency of the War Department, and was cited for outstanding service to his country.

One of the very few academicians who has been outspoken in his opposition to the progressive defacement of our civilization, Dr. Oliver has long insisted that the fate of his countrymen hangs on their willingness to subordinate their doctrinal differences to the tough /but idealistic solidarity which is the prerequisite of a Majority resurgence.

SOME QUOTABLE QUOTES FROM AMERICA'S DECLINE

FREEDOM OF SPEECH—FREEDOM OF THOUGHT
FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION

The editor-publisher of Liberty Bell does not necessarily agree with each and every article in this magazine, nor does he subscribe to all conclusions arrived at by various writers; however, he does endeavor to permit the exposure of ideas suppressed by the controlled news media of this country.

It is, therefore, in the best tradition of America and of free men everywhere that Liberty Bell strives to give free reign to ideas, for ultimately it is ideas which rule the world and determine both the content and structure of culture.

We believe that we can and will change our society for the better. We declare our long-held view that no institution or government created by men, for men, is inviolable, incorruptible, and not subject to evolution, change or replacement by the will of the people.

To this we dedicate our lives and our work. No effort will be spared and no idea will be allowed to go unexpressed if we think it will benefit the Thinking People, not only of America, but the entire world.

Revilo P. Oliver

Many mammals have odd tropisms that are innate in their species. The irresistible attraction that catnip (more properly called catmint) has for cats is a well-known example. As is also notorious, stories about supernatural mysteries have a comparable effect on human beings. Some veterinarians believe that catnip in small doses is beneficial to the felines who crave it. Fantasy about praeterhuman powers and arcane magic gratifies the human psyche and seems to be beneficial when we indulge in it in moderation and take care that the emotional dissipation does not paralyse our powers of ratiocination. There is a psychological truth in the old Horatian tag, dulce est desipere in loco: a relaxation of our reasoning faculties from time to time is probably conducive to their greater vigor, just as the occasional relaxation of muscles is necessary to maintain their strength.

The operation of the biological tropism that makes human beings crave supernatural wonders and the consequences of an intemperate indulgence of that appetite are most clearly exhibited in recent examples. They are comparatively simple and we can see at once the way in which they developed.

Everyone has heard of the strangest of our biological kin, the lemurs, who dwell on the island of Madagascar, where they seem to have been indigenous. They are tiny mammals, about the size of a small domestic cat and having much longer tails. They are shy, elusive creatures, arboreal and nocturnal, with globular eyes that are enormous in proportion to their tiny faces, and when captured, they stare at us, their strange, tailless, gigantic kinsmen, with a regard that is oddly troubling and gives the observer strange fancies. It is no wonder that the lemurs excited superstitious awe in the natives of Madagascar, or that when the little mammals were first scientifically observed, biologists gave to them the name of the lemures, the vagabond ghosts of primitive Roman religion, who were deemed to be especially active at the time of the Lemuria, a festival that was taken over by Christian mythology and, with its date changed by Celtic influence, survives as Hallowe'en.

Despite their minuscule size, the lemurs are primates and in some anatomical details they are disconcertingly more like us than the extant species of anthropoids. Any diagram that shows our biological genealogy will show the lemurs as a branch of our family tree, diverging from the line that goes on to us at a point where evolution produced a crucial divergence of bodily structure.

The diagrammatic illustration of the evolution of species in the form of a stylized tree goes back to the Linnaean classifications, of course, but what has made it now so familiar to all literate persons was chiefly the influence of the great German biologist, Ernst Heinrich Haeckel, who, although he died as recently as 1919, was the first real champion of Darwin on the continent of Europe. He was a great and eminent man of science, the author, like Darwin, of many detailed investigations of individual species and biological processes, and he is also to be honored as one of the first men to explore comprehensively the philosophical implications of the great advance in knowledge that cancelled the arguments for a rational belief in a Creator, which had been the basis of Roman Stoicism and of the Deism that was accepted by most of the founders of the American Republic.

Haeckel, I believe, was the first biologist to describe systematically the development of organic life from the earliest compounds of carbon that had some of the characteristics of life (the structureless bits of protoplasm called monera) to such marvellously perfect beings as you and me. Although subsequent research has modified his work in some details, his was one of the greatly courageous and undeviatingly logical minds of our race. His exposition of strict monism, Die Welträtsel (1899), has been translated into English under the title The Riddle of the Universe. Needless to say, he sweeps out of the door all the cobwebs of the fairy stories that are so dear to the incorrigibly religious.* That is what makes so ironic what I am

* Haeckel's Natürliche Schöpfungsgeschichte, published in 1868, was a comprehensive exposition of organic morphology and may have been the first work that stressed the evidence for biological evolution that is provided by the development of the human embryo in the womb. I need not tell you that its publication made the welkin ring with the howling of dervishes aroused by the threat to the salvation-business, who were the more infuriated because they could not resort to the theologians' favorite arguments, the pillory, the rack, and the stake. They did, however, about to tell you.

A problem that arises not seldom in comprehensive presentations of biological evolution is the distribution of species across seemingly impassable geographic barriers, especially oceans. Now the lemurs of Madagascar are similar and obviously related to species of lemurs that are found in India and Sumatra, but which differ sufficiently to presuppose a biological evolution that must antedate the time at which the little mammals could have been carried from (or to) the island by human beings migrating by sea. The Lemuridae must have originated on one side or the other of the Indian Ocean, and they certainly did not swim across it. How, then, can closely cognate species of them be found on both sides of that great water barrier?

In considering that problem, Haeckel suggested one hypothetical solution. The Indian Ocean is comparatively shallow between the Malay Peninsula and Sumatra, and there are shallows around the Maldives, the Chagos Archipelago, and the Seychelles which, although not continuous, form a kind of arc from India to Madagascar. These shallows could represent a land mass that once extended from Madagascar to India and to Sumatra and was later submerged either by subsidence of the land or by a rise in the level of the oceans. And for the hypothesis that the Indian Ocean now covered what had been a continental mass of land there was other supporting evidence, both geological and biological.

If that was the explanation of the odd distribution of species of lemurs, then, since lemurs are mammals, the land must have been submerged no earlier than the Caenozoic Era. Now another species of mammal that appears in the Caenozoic is the one which biologists now divide into two stages, Homo erectus and Homo habilis, the immediate ancestors of modern man. And the very few specimens of these that had been found when Haeckel wrote were so distributed that it seemed likely to him that, like the le-anticipate the arguments that the "creation scientists" are trying to put over on boobs today. They denounced the teaching of biological evolution in the schools on the ground that it was an "unproved theory" and not to be compared to the Jews' stories about how their ferocious tribal deity, old Yahweh, manufactured Adam and then converted one of his spare ribs into Eve. See Haeckel's Freie Wissenschaft und freie Lehre (1877). Of course, the "creation scientists" think it prudent at present to pretend that they want no more than "balanced treatment" that will equate rational thought with the hokum of their favorite superstition, but no one should be deceived by the hypocrisy that has been an integral part of their religion from its origins.

murs, our line of primates had originated on the sunken continent and dispersed thence both eastward and westward.

This hypothesis was plausible and logical and it was widely accepted by both geologists and palaeontologists. Since the lemurs were the most striking of many bits of evidence supporting the hypothesis, it was reasonable to call the lost continent Lemuria. This name did not originate with Haeckel; it was, so far as I know, first suggested by a British zoölogist, Philip Lutley Sclater, around 1870. The name was so appropriate that it was widely adopted.

Let me emphasize the fact that although Haeckel's hypothesis—which neither he nor other scientists ever regarded as more than a working hypothesis—has been greatly modified and virtually superseded as additional evidence came to light, it was strictly scientific. That land masses of considerable size were submerged during the Caenozoic Era is now certain. That the continents we know today differ greatly in size and extent from the continents in earlier eras is also certain, and is now explained in terms of plate tectonics, for which there is now geological evidence that amounts to virtual certainty, although the details of both continental movements and the times at which they occurred are still being investigated.

'Lemuria' is a nice word, pleasing to our ears, and it is, of course, identical with the name of the Roman festival of the lemures and so carries to persons who have a literary education a pleasing connotation of the mysterious and supernatural. But the word has now been discarded with the superseded theory for which it was coined.

Now I do not know, and shall not waste the time it would take to ascertain, how Haeckel's geological hypothesis and Sclater's name for it came to the attention of the celebrated hokum-peddler, Mme. Helena Petrovna Blavatsky,* whose business of conjuring up spooks for the suckers declined after

* The careers of the founders and reformers of religions are basically the same, differing only in the details of time, place, and incidents. There is one relatively unimportant distinction. Some, such as Mahomet and Swedenborg, suffer in adolescence or when under the influence of narcotics, austerities, or emotional disorders, hallucinations which they mistake for reality, but even they, if they attain any success, must have a certain shrewdness and cunning to manipulate their converts and usually have to resort to impostures they have had the art to make plausible. Others, such as Joseph Smith and Mme. Blavatsky, quite rationally set out to exploit the human tropism that has always provided so lucrative a market for transcendental buncombe. Their only problem is that of concocting a revelation that will be both novel and attract the suckers she was caught while performing some relatively simple tricks in the dark. She prudently decided to concentrate on what we may call the carriage trade in superstition, and to exploit the numerous and relatively prosperous individuals who are sufficiently well educated to see that the Judaeo-Christian myths are simply unbelievable and have lost their childish faith in Santa Claus and Jesus, but are left with an unappeased and devouring thirst for supernatural marvels. When an alcoholic can no longer obtain whisky, he turns to gin.

Mme. Blavatsky concocted her own cocktail of mystical marvels and divine revelations. Pouring a copious amount of Hindu transcendental speculations into a shaker, she added a few jiggers of other mythologies, including the Christian, and a tiny quantity brewed by her own fertile imagination, and flavored the whole with magic from the Jews' Kabbalah. The mixture, shaken until it foamed, and poured into crystal goblets, was a heady drink and simply delicious to palates athirst for spiritual things. She called it Theosophy, picking up an old word that had become familiar in English because it had been a favorite of the Rosicrucian mystery-mongers in the Seventeenth Century.*

whom they wish to exploit: the bait they use must appeal to the fish before whom they dangle their hooks. The seemingly enormous differences between The Book of Mormon and The Secret Doctrine are really superficial; there are also great differences between earthworms and artificial flies, but they serve the same purpose. Mme. Blavatsky's trout in the second phase of her career as a "fisher of men" were, as I have said, persons of some education, so, like a good angler, she baited her hokum with a display of spurious learning. She is said to cite some 1400 books in her first big bundle of bait, Isis Unveiled (1877), all of them at second-, third-, or tenth-hand from the round dozen books she actually used in concocting a lure that seemed profound to educated persons who are willing to accept as abstruse, nonsense they cannot understand. If you want the sorry details of Mme. Blavatsky's biography, see Gertrude Marvin Williams, Madame Blavatsky (New York, Knopf, 1946). Mme. Blavatsky was not a fool. Once, in a moment of alcoholic or erotic candor, she indiscreetly told a male friend: "The vast majority of people who are reckoned clever . . . are hopeless fools. If you only knew what lions and eagles in every part of the world have turned into asses at my whistle, and have obediently wagged their long ears in time as I piped the tune!" So we must, after all, credit her with having revealed the secret doctrine that unites the world's religions!

* The word first appears, so far as I know, in the Neo-Platonic maunderings of Porphyry in the Third Century, from whom it was borrowed by some of the "orthodox" Christian theologians to replace gnosis, which had become a bad word because it had been made a designation of numerous early Christian sects whom the "orthodox" were Theosophy involves endless chatter about secret doctrines, astral souls, planetary intelligences, Adepts, and Masters, especially the Mahatmas, superbrains said to roost on the snow-covered peaks of Tibet and to despatch through the air personal letters to their darling Helena, written on distinctive stationery that had been specially manufactured for her by a British paper-mill. And Helena served with it the catnip that seems to have an irresistible attraction for so many Aryan females and excite them to a kind of silly ecstasy: Theosophists must "regard all men as equally their brothers, irrespective of caste, color, race, or creed." She thus assured herself of the good will of the Jews, who probably invented that hallucinogenic drug for dim-wits and who always enjoy laughing at the gullibility of the Aryans, whom they both despise and hate.

The enterprising business woman from Russia thus founded the Universal Brotherhood of United Theosophists, which was going to unite all the world's religions by revealing the Truth of their common origin and thus inaugurate a blissful era of World Peace and Brotherhood of All Mankind. The most marvellous thing about Mme. Blavatsky's wonder-mongering was the social standing and educational level of many of the persons, including males, who became pie-eyed on her theosophical cocktails, and her business flourished until her tabbies started clawing one another. Fission began even during her lifetime, and after her death in 1891 the United Brotherhood split into many disunited branches, of which some still survive and their high-minded members nourish their astral souls according to the precepts of their holy writ,, Mme. Blavatsky's industriously refuting, proving conclusively the Truth of the "orthodox" theology with the only cogent theological arguments, fire, sword, and extermination. In the Renaissance, the Greek term was brought over into Latin, and thence into English, as a designation of the grotesque nonsense of the Jewish Kabbalah, which had a profound and constant influence on Christian theologians, especially Protestant, and for the ravings of Jakob Boehme, a "converted" Jew whom old Yahweh told wonderful things and who was the founder of a sect that was eventually merged with the Quakers, who held many of the same beliefs. In the religious brain-fever that was epidemic in Europe during the Seventeenth Century, the Rosicrucian hoax was devised, largely for covert political purposes, and was believed by an astonishing number of persons who should have known better. On this hoax, which was cleverly associated with some contemporary progress in science and technology, see the standard work by the erudite Frances A. Yates, The Rosicrucian Enlightenment (London, Routledge, 1972; paperback reprint, Boulder, Colorado, Shambhala, 1978).

The full title of this gospel masterpiece is The Secret Doctrine, the Synthesis of Science, Religion, and Philosophy. The authors, according to Madame, were two or three of the aforementioned Mahatmas, who dictated it by telepathy to her, their Chosen Vessel and amanuensis. Materialists, who are woefully deficient in the transcendence of Faith, attribute the authorship to Madame herself, but much of the credit, I think, should go to a pair of prize suckers, Bertram and Archibald Keightley, two wealthy young men of standing in British society, who not only lavished money on the aging Madame, but took the six thousand pages of more or less incoherent gabbling that the Mahatmas had sent to her, eliminated the endless repetitions, reduced the mass to an intelligible order, corrected some of the grosser errors that the all-knowing Masters had made, supplied a good deal of information to correct or corroborate their revelations, and, at their own

* What was probably the largest slice of the Theosophical racket fell into the hands of Annie Besant, the absconded wife of a respected English clergyman. She had been the intimate female friend of Mme. Blavatsky and claimed to have in her possession an even more secret part of the Secret Doctrine. She took over the headquarters in India, where she proceeded to discover that the star Alcyone had magnanimously come down to our earth as a new christ, an amalgam of Krishna, Gautama (Buddha No. 1), Maitreya (Buddha No. 2), Zoroaster, Jesus, and perhaps other hot-shot Saviours, and had become incarnate in a sloe-eyed Hindu lad named (appropriately) Krishnamurti. The lad grew up under her loving care and when he was sufficiently trained, she took the Saviour to England for exhibition, and many boobs, some of them graduates of the great universities, subsidized the patroness of the sepia-colored messiah who had come to found the Universal Republic of One World of Human Brotherhood. There was, however, an unfortunate contretemps, of which the sad details were once told me by a member of British Intelligence who had been an officer in the Special Branch of Scotland Yard in the days when Britain was still Great. When Scotland Yard raided a den of homosexual drug-addicts, they found Krishnamurti among the jolly boys and remarked that it was an odd place to find the Saviour of the World. He replied, "Bah! I am an atheist. The old woman, she pay me to sleep with her, she pay me to be the Saviour of the World. Why not?

Annie, much embarrassed, high-tailed it back to India, checked her astrological calculations, and found that she had made a mathematical error, thus mistaking the birthday of the amalgamated Saviour, who hadn't got here yet. She died not long thereafter. Krishnamurti soon repented of his admission of atheism and tried to set up in business for himself as a less high-powered christ, but without Annie's guiding hand he couldn't interest even the kind of educated nitwits whom she had charmed with her transcendental blarney.

expense, saw the first two volumes through the press,* all, it seems, without ever doubting the bona fides of the fat old hag who had been elected by the planetary spirits to enlighten the earth. "Nothing is more wonderful than man," the chorus in the Antigone said admiringly; we must repeat it sardonically.

As gospels go, Mme. Blavatsky's is one of the best and will excite as much religious awe as any other. I recommend it to aficionados of that kind of spiritual exercise, although I know that tastes in divine revelations differ. The second volume of this condensation of the Wisdom of the Ages is devoted to tracing the biological and spiritual evolution of mankind during the several hundred million years that preceded 1888. (Let it not be thought that Madame hadn't heard of Darwin! She sets out, remember, to synthesize science and religion.) Now the Big Souls, who were guiding mankind to Higher Things through their chosen vessel, naturally did not overlook the wonders of Atlantis, both technological and historical, which they evidently cribbed from Ignatius Donnelly's famous book on the subject and then corrected to surcharge it with spiritual truth. But since Atlantis, overburdened by its sins, sank beneath the waves only 850,000 years ago, there is left a big slice of the hundreds of millions of years of evolution to be filled in somehow. And what could be neater than another lost continent that was engulfed by the ocean much earlier and from which refugees escaped to populate Atlantis? Why, Drs. Haeckel and Sclater might have made Lemuria on order from the Mahatmas, it so perfectly fills the need!

Some of the errors of Professors Haeckel and Sclater were corrected and Lemuria was extended to include mountains of which the peaks are now Easter Island and New Zealand, and the inhabitants of the continent were accurately described by the planetary intelligences who had seen them and witnessed

* The first two volumes, of which it would be blasphemous to doubt the divine inspiration, were published by the Keightleys, who were preparing a third for the press when Mme. Blavatsky died. The manuscript for it was asported by Annie Besant, who, a great champion of Women's Rights, had come to adore the female messiah two years before her death. A third volume was published by Annie in 1897. Whether this is the authentic work dictated by the Masters to their Chosen Vessel or a forgery perpetrated by the wicked Mrs. Besant was a question that greatly agitated the four disunited branches of the United Brotherhood that I included in my observations in my youth, when I was studying the mysteries of Faith. I have no opinion on that point. There is no more futile waste of time than in trying to decide which gospel is less spurious than others.

their long and dolorous history. Now if you don't want to read through the second volume of The Secret Doctrine and run down copious references in the first, I will tell you what modern science, as reported by Madame's Mahatmas, teaches about those precursors of our race. Their height ranged from twelve to fifteen feet; they had complexions and features resembling those of niggers, except that they could turn their eyes to the sides as well as forwards, and they had a third eye in the back of their heads, which was mighty convenient, since they were amphisbenic, like many of our old streetcars, and could operate equally well in either direction. And what was best of all, they were hermaphrodites and could reproduce their species by just laying eggs, which, you will agree, saved them a vast lot of trouble all around.

Now, I grieve to say, the Lemurians became so corrupt that, not content with hermaphroditic bliss, they got themselves split up so they could copulate with each other, and having found out about sex, they became so enthusiastic they even copulated with animals and thus engendered the various species of apes that are with us today. That so disgusted the planetary spirits that they refused to put souls into the creatures, but the mild-mannered inhabitants of Venus took pity on the wretches and came down to teach them how to use fire, smelt metals, and raise crops. and, eager to help the species ascend to spiritual things, taught them enough morals to make them capable of reincarnation and thus of attaining immortality. And those Lemurians have left descendants today, the Lapps, the Australian aborigines, and the cute little cannibals of the Andaman Islands.

Lemuria was destroyed by subterranean fires (too many deluges in the world's history would become monotonous). Many Lemurians, however, escaped to Atlantis, and I can't take time to tell you about all that happened to them there.

Madame's genius must be credited with discovering how useful Lemuria is to gospel-writers, but two of her more intelligent disciples made better use of it. Two of the most zealous and well educated Theosophists were Rudolf Steiner, who was almost certainly a Jew masquerading as a German, and Édouard Schuré, who was admittedly a Jew. They sat at the feet of Annie Besant and admired her and admired her technique even more until they were ready to go into business for themselves and market Anthroposophy as an improved and streamlined version of Theosophy.* It was Steiner who really put Lemuria on the occult map, and he naturally improved it to show the greater accuracy of the revelations vouchsafed him by the Masters. Being a man of some education, he logically decided that the denizens of that lost continent should resemble, so far as was feasible, the lemures of the old Roman folk superstition. His lucky Lemurians were exempt from physical ills because their bodies were made of vapor, like the ghosts around you today. They naturally had no physical eyes and so never had to wear glasses, and they could float whithersoever they wished by instinct. And what completed their ideal state, they had no brains and had no need of them, for they were full of "indwelling spiritual force" and were guided by beneficent spirits who were in constant communication with their superiors and so always knew what they wanted. The Lemurians also had lots of will-power and so, although they were only vapor, they could lift heavy objects and do work when they wanted to, just as Poltergeister, who are also tenuous wraiths, can throw the furniture around on occasion and have been doing so recently to provide best-selling wonder-books for Americans who can read without thinking. And being hermaphroditic was no great comfort to the Lemurians, because they, like most ghosts, were too spiritual to worry about sexual fun.

Steiner, the "scientist of the invisible" as he was called, also knew what raised Hell in happily thoughtless Lemuria. The puffs of vapor became a little more material, and an evil power split the dear hermaphrodites into male and female ghosts, who started chasing one another, as their luckless successors have gone on doing evers since. Lemuria, weighted down with sex, sank beneath the waves, but some Lemurians escaped to Atlantis, and, of course, the thrilling tale goes on..

Gospels are like automobiles and computers: some one is always bringing out a new model. There have doubtless been quite a few models of which I have not heard, but I must mention the improved Lemurians offered by Frederick Oliver in his *Dweller on Two Planets. He brought them right up-to-date by installing a colony of them right on the summit of Mount Shasta, where anyone can see them, if he has enough transcendence in him. And then an astronomer, who was head of a small observatory on Mount Lowe in southern California, trained his telescope on Mount Shasta, and, by gum! he saw the Lemurians walking around up there and described in detail their buildings, their clothes, and their manners.† And since then, quite a few God-fearing Americans have climbed Mount Shasta and had most informative and edifying chats with the transcendentally wise Lemurians. Now it would be vain for materialists to toil up the slopes of that extinct volcano, because the spiritually wise Lemurians don't associate with such low company and simply make themselves invisible.

* The name chosen for the new racket could have been coined as an obvious variation, but is said to have been taken from Anthroposophia theomagica, a bucket of Rosicrucian slop published in 1650 by Thomas Vaughan (which, by the way, seems to have been overlooked by Miss Yates in her Rosicrucian Enlightenment, which mentions only Vaughan's publication of the manifesto of that famous hoax in 1652). Schuré was the junior partner in the new business, and, sad to say, the affections of even high-minded world-improvers are inconstant, so Schuré flounced back and forth between his Rudolf and his Annie several times, and Steiner became the sole owner of the enterprise and has left a cult of True Believers of his hocus-pocus, while Schuré has been virtually forgotten.

Haeckel's Lemuria, if it ever existed, sank beneath the waves long ago, but Mme. Blavatsky's Lemuria is unsinkable. It will probably be with us forever, floating from one bizarre cult to another, a standard ingredient of many brands of mystical

* I mentioned Frederick Oliver's hoax in Is There Intelligent Life on Earth?, p. 53, n. 33. A legal friend of mine has informed me of an amusing sequel. Oliver's book proved to be a very profitable production and was reprinted, I know not how many times, for the edification of persons who can believe anything that is "transcendental." The book, a valuable property, was inherited by the author's heirs, who, in 1941, sued a plagiarist for infringement of copyright in the Federal District Court of California. My friend sent me a photocopy of the court's decision as it was reproduced in the well-known "Key Reporter," and I was pleased that the court, with tongue in cheek, elected to believe the author's protestations that he was only an "amanuensis" and that he had only written out what was dictated to him by a Master, "Phylos the Tibetan," who used Oliver as his stenographer to put on paper a revelation that would save the world from the horrors of atheism. A Federal Court had neither the legal authority nor the physical means of preventing a Master, who presumably resided in Tibet most of the time, from using his supernatural powers to dictate to other stenographers revelations of which he was the author.

† This is so nearly incredible that I refused to trust a memorandum jotted down decades ago and my own recollection until I found that the astronomer's feat is mentioned in L. Sprague de Camp's Lost Continents, now available in a Dover reprint. That author does not tell us, and I do not remember, how the astronomer explained the bending of light rays that enabled him to see Mount Shasta from his observatory, but I imagine that such optical details would not greatly concern a "scientist" with an itch to save the world from soul-destroying atheism—or to see his name in newspapers.

The Atlanteans have been renowned for their wisdom ever since Plato invented them, but someone, (whether Oliver or another was the first I do not know) saw that the Lemurians, being so much older, must have been even wiser. And they must have left the treasures of their occult wisdom in storage somewhere for the benefit of future ages in which select individuals would become morally and financially worthy of such esoteric knowledge. It has been decades since I have heard of that wonderful book, composed in the Lemurian tongue and written in letters of gold on the hides of pterodactyls, that is preserved in a secret crypt beneath a half-ruined temple in some remote part of India, so I suppose it has gone out of fashion. The alternative is the transmission of that abstruse acroamatic lore by the Adepts of an Hermetic Brotherhood.* A secret society of masterminds, founded on Lemuria, has, through centuries of millennia, been working mightily (and in oddly dark and devious ways) to improve mankind and prepare it for the ultimate revelation of cosmic truth, which in the meantime must be kept secret and concealed from the vulgar, since only specially purified souls can operate on voltages so high they would blow the fuses of an ordinary brain and fulminate the cerebrum. Whether the Hermetic Brotherhood consists of old

* Hermetic Brotherhoods are another can of worms, and I cannot take time to open it now. The name and idea goes back to hokum that was industriously peddled to suckers by wily promoters, many of them Jews, around the beginning of the present era and was thus roughly contemporaneous with Christianity. The bait took the form of writings in koine Greek that purported to be revelations made in the remote past by Thoth, the Egyptian god of wisdom, who disclosed to worthy Adepts the cosmic secrets of magic, alchemy, astrology, and the transcendental truths about souls, etc. The con men knew practically nothing about the Egyptian god except that he had a reputation for wisdom, and they, for some reason, called him Hermes Trismegistos in Greek. Quite a few of these compositions are still extant and may be read in the excellent edition of the Corpus Hermeticum by A.-J. Festugière and Arthur Darby Nock, Paris, "Les Belles Lettres," 4 vols., 1945-1954. For an analysis of the racket, see Festugière, La révélation d'Hermès Trismégiste, Paris, Gabalda, 4 vols., 1944-1954. Since the edition of the Corpus was prepared for the press, there was found at Chenoboskion in Egypt a collection of similar stuff in which Thoth was replaced by the Christian god, except in one admirable screed, which was so arranged that the salvation-monger using it could fill in the name of either Thoth, Zoroaster, or Jesus to suit the market at which he was aiming.

Lemurians, who had survived through all the millennia without dying of boredom, or of dedicated Adepts, who have transmitted the world-shaking secrets from generation to generation even unto the present day, is an unimportant detail. Persons who can believe the one story will as readily believe the other.

There is, therefore, a wonderful Lemurian Philosophy and its secrets are available to you right now, today, if you have the time and money. If you want the very latest edition of this transcendental wisdom, you will find it in a book, hot off the press, entitled The Ultimate Philosophy, by a certain Eklai Kueshana, whose name sounds as though he may be a Lemurian, fresh from the land of the lemurs. Whatever his age, he represents the great Hermetic Brotherhood that built the pyramids in Egypt (secretly, of course) and wrought I know not how many other marvels.*

How do you acquire a copy of that precious tome? Why, you sign a "commitment" (I don't know what you will commit yourself to, but does it matter when you will attain such inestimable wisdom?) and then enroll in a Lemurian Philosophy Seminar offered by the Stelle Group, P. O. Box 75, Quinlan, Texas; $375 and certainly a bargain. You'll get lots of "privileged information" and will discover the "amazing, unsuspected powers inherent in you." You may even get to join the Brotherhood some day. To save you time, if you are in a hurry, I inform you that Quinlan is a very small town, about twenty-five miles east-northeast from the outskirts of Dallas.

If you have a soul that thirsts for occult revelations, you won't have time to read the rest of this note, but if you are an earthbound materialist, I will tell you that my purpose in writing it was only to give you a clear and simple example of the way in which a tenuous hypothesis in geology can be converted into an article of faith in less than twenty years, and thereafter haunt the minds of the gullible, perhaps for centuries, like a ghost, which is imperishable because it never existed.

* They say they built the Great Pyramid, and I do hope they did not overlook the other two, which have stood near it for so long as a silent and monumental reproach to the mystagogues who have been concentrating their attention exclusively on the one that happens to be the largest, only a few feet taller than the next in size. In fact, I have been hoping for decades that some clever fellow would find a way of exploiting in his revelations at least thirty-five or forty of the other pyramids that are scattered around Egypt. Why, the occult significance of the distances between them, computed in Egyptian units, would alone suffice to keep a seeker of transcendental truth in mental convulsions for years!

This simple, clear, indubitable modern example should teach us much about the origin and propagation of religions. On a small scale, but typically, it illustrates the dismaying force of that human yearning for the superhuman and praeternatural that enables any clever hokum-peddler to boast, as did Mme. Blavatsky, that educated and seemingly intelligent men and women of our race "in every part of the world turned into asses at my whistle, and have obediently wagged their long ears in time as I piped the tune."* A moderately adroit swindler does not even need a myth, a folk tale, or a forgery: he can take a newly coined neologism of known and strictly limited meaning and make of it a glittering jewel of transcendental meaning to hypnotize his prey. There is magic in the occult, a magic that operates on many minds as does opium or a great excess of alcohol, paralysing the mind's ability to reason, to distinguish the real from the imagined.

Lemuria is but an instance of what has happened, on larger and smaller scales, for thousands of years; it illustrates the infinite credulity of our race.

That credulity is a fact—a grim and ominous fact— that we must take into account, if we cherish hopes that some sane and healthy remnant of our race may survive and someday be emancipated from abject slavery to world's masters of deceit, the great contrivers of illusions, the Jews.

* * * * *

In what is written above, I commented on Theosophy and made a passing reference to the older Rosicrucian hoax. These are only two specimens of religions that are designed for educated suckers, and it is likely that no one who has not looked into that depressing subject has any conception of how numerous are the con games that attained enough success to flourish on a socially important scale. If you want some good examples—including the famous Illuminati of Weishaupt, to which some excitable conservatives attribute miraculous powers—you will find some in Nesta Webster's Secret Societies and Subversive Movements (London, Boswell, 1924; reprint available from Liberty Bell Publications). You will find many more

* I quoted Mme. Blavatsky's indiscreet boast more fully in the footnote on p. 5 where I also cited the biography by Mrs. Williams from which it is taken.

TRANSLATOR'S INTRODUCTION

The August-September 1983 issue of Liberty Bell contains my translation of and introduction to an article by the German geneticist, Baron Otmar von Verschuer, in which its author describes the genetically determined morphological, pathological and psychological differences between Jews and northern Europeans. This article was taken from the third volume of the series, Forschungen zur Judenfrage, published by the Hanseatische Verlagsanstalt in Hamburg in 1938. The following article by Eugen Fischer immediately precedes von Verschuer's article.

The peculiar, almost unique advantage of the Forschungen zur Judenfrage lies in the fact that in them distinguished scholars and scientists examined various aspects of the Jewish question from a non-Jewish point of view. Of the more than thirty scholars and scientists who contributed to the series, perhaps none was more famous than the anthropologist Eugen Fischer, the author of the article presented below in English translation. Fischer (1874-1967) held academic posts in Würzburg (where Röntgen had discovered X-Rays in 1895), Freiburg and Berlin. He was also a director of the Kaiser Wilhelm Institute for Anthropology, Human Genetics and Eugenics.

In 1913 Fischer published a study, Die Rehobother Bastaards und das Bastardierungsproblem beim Menschen (The Rehoboth Bastaards and the Problem of Cross-Breeding in Man). The subjects of this study were the persons of mixed racial descent (European men and Hottentot women) in the vicinity of Rehoboth, a locality in the interior of German South-West Africa east of Walfis Bay. The great significance of this study lay in the fact that for the first time proof was furnished that human racial characteristics are inherited in accordance with Mendel's genetic laws. (I am unable to find a listing of an English translation of this work.) In 1923 Fischer, together with Erwin Baur and Fritz Lenz, published their Grundriss der menschlichen Erblichkeitslehre und Rassenhygiene. An English translation of this book was published by Macmillan in 1931 under the title, Human Heredity. Amongst Fischer's numerous other works is a study of Jews in antiquity which was written in coöperation with Gerhard Kittel and which occupies pp. 1-236 of the seventh volume of the Forschungen zur Judenfrage, published in 1943.

Fischer's present article is addressed to the intelligent layman. His skill as an educator is manifested in his going from the known to the unknown in tackling the problem of the racial origins of the ancient Hebrews with all of its complexities. He thus makes observations on the inherited characteristics of various breeds of domestic animals with which we are all familiar and the analogies to the characteristics of various human races. He then discusses the less well-known environmental and cultural factors which have brought about the differentiation of mankind into various races, but explains why it is not easy to trace the particular origins of most specific races.

This article was originally given as a lecture, one in a series on the Jewish question given in Munich during July, 1938. The recognition of the importance of genetic factors in human affairs was by no means exclusively a feature of National Socialism. We must bear in mind that during the 1930s there was still a wide acceptance of eugenic thinking in western Europe and the United States. A number of states of the United States, for example, had laws which provided for the sterilization of persons who had defects considered to be of genetic origin, such as feeble-mindedness.

Much the opposite situation prevailed at the time in the U.S.S.R., which had been and was still killing off so many of the best components of the Russian population. (Cf. Liberty Bell of May, 1984, page 19 of the article by Paul Knutson, who points out that we should not underestimate the extent of biological change that the Bolsheviks' wholesale slaughter brought about in the Russians and Ukrainians.) In keeping with Communist dogmas of that time, the doctrines of T. D. Lysenko ("Lysenkoism") discounted orthodox genetic science and emphasized environmental factors in the development of plants and animals. This abhorance of scientific genetics is also common amongst American "liberals" down to this very day. Eugenic concepts are especially strongly abhorred in American academic circles.

The reader should be cautioned about Fischer's use of the adjective nordisch, which I have simply rendered as Nordic, although these words might not have exactly the same semantic function in both languages, since Nordic is frequently used as a designation of Scandinavians in current English usage. Fischer uses the word nordisch in a broad sense to designate early speakers of the Indo-Germanic (Indo-European) languages. These people, to judge especially from the evidence from diachronic linguistics, developed in Europe north of the Alps, although the exact location of their original habitation is uncertain. (Cf. Liberty Bell, June, 1984, pp. 1-3.) They pushed into southern Europe and even as far as northern India and Sri Lanka (Ceylon), where they fused to some extent onto earlier populations as a dominant élite capable of imposing their language onto the population as a whole. This process took place in quite remote times, probably preliterary times for the most part. In the cases of the Hittites (mentioned several times by Fischer), for example, this "Nordic" blood was eventually thinned considerably, even in very ancient times, as the strongly diluted Indo-Germanic components (largely grammatical features) of their language would indicate. One need only study the portraiture on the Greek coins of the fifth to the third centuries to become aware of how the racial features of "Nordics" dominated Greece proper and the early Greek colonies in western Asia Minor, Sicily and southern Italy, at least as an aesthetic ideal. On the whole, I have retained Fischer's terminology, e.g., Indo-Germanic rather than Indo-European, the term now predominantly used in the Anglo-Saxon countries.

Even though Fischer's article was published nearly a half century ago, even though we now have a more sophisticated knowledge of the molecular structure of the genes and even though archaeological dating techniques have improved considerably since 1938, his article is still essentially valid and interesting reading for those who wish to obtain an objective grasp of the Jewish problem, which has now largely shifted from Europe to the United States.

I have been considering various articles in the Forschungen zur Judenfrage for future translation efforts. These include an article on Richard Wagner and Jewry, Walter Frank's introductory address on German scholarship and the Jewish question and an article on the ascendency of Jews in the literary life of Germany during the time of the Weimar Republic, 1919-1933. I would be interested in expressions of preference on the part of readers of Liberty Bell. A complete list of the articles in the first six volumes of the Forschungen zur Judenfrage is given on pages 22-24 of my translation of the article by Verschuer in the August-September, 1983, issue of Liberty Bell.

RACIAL ORIGIN AND EARLIEST RACIAL HISTORY OF THE HEBREWS

by Eugen Fischer

This lecture is not intended to contribute new anthropological material, but rather simply to present observations from the point of view of racial research concerning the biological aspect of the origin of the Hebrew people. An examination of the historical and philological original research projects had to be omitted. These are not the author's field. For that reason source notes were omitted entirely.

The question of the origin of a single, particular, present-day human race involves two groups of phenomena which, in fact, are closely related to each other; for one thing, the question of the place, the time and, above all, the external circumstances of the formation of the race, and, for another thing, the question of the racial initial form and its individual stages of modification from this initial form down to the time of its present character. Since it is a matter of developments in the distant past, the initial questions concerning the environment and the actual developments can be examined only indirectly. The other questions concerning the past forms [of the race] can be answered only if a fortunate chance has preserved for us remains from the past. For this reason, in the investigation of the origin of a particular race our knowledge of the origin of races in general must be presented in order to attempt, then, to apply these data to the particular race while taking into account the geographical and chronological circumstances. The significance of selection and adaptation in general and in the area of origin, in this case the prehistoric Near East, will prove to be important, not only for the time of the origin, but also for the further development. Hence, after these general considerations I would like to describe the traces of prehistorical man in Palestine. These have a bearing, in turn, on the question to what extent the population which now emerges into the light of history, as Semites and then as Hebrews, descends from that prehistorical man. Only then can a racial history of the Semites be attempted and the original racial composition of the Jews and the absorbtion of subsequent racial elements into the Jewish nation that had developed be described down to the time of the extinction of the Jewish state.

We have had an understanding of the origin of human races only since that time when human genetics has furnished us the absolute proof that all human racial characteristics are genetic characteristics and only such characteristics.

This proof is furnished by the investigation of racial p.122 cross-breedings, by which it was shown beyond any doubt that the characteristics in question are transmitted without exception in accordance with Mendel's genetic laws in the first and second generations of persons of mixed breed. (Then, of course, into further generations.) These racial characteristics, like all other inherited characteristics, are thus based on individual, specific genetic predispositions which we call "factors," the bases of which we call "genes." In this connection it has been learned that, as in the case of all other hereditary characteristics, the hereditary predisposition permits a certain range of reaction for its realization in actual development, even in the case of racial hereditary characteristics. Within this range the environment brings about the actual development. The range of reaction is of quite varied magnitude in the case of the inherited characteristics, including racial characteristics. In the so-called blood groups, for example, this range amounts to zero, so far as we know. In the case of body height, the range is rather broad. A person, for example, does not inherit a height of 1.70 meters [=66.93 inches] but rather a "tall build." Whether he then actually attains a height of 1.66 or 1.82 meters or his 1.70 meters depends on the effects of environment. Moreover, he inherits his tendency to tallness, no matter whether he has reached his lower or upper genetically possible height. The environmental effects, as such, are never inherited. Races are groups of people with quite specific hereditary predispositions which are purely hereditary in them and which are lacking in other races. Every race, of course, also has in addition hereditary predispositions which are also present in certain other races and ultimately such hereditary predispositions which are present in all human beings. For obvious reasons it must be especially emphasized that mental hereditary predispositions are amongst those that belong to one race exclusively as well as those which are characteristic of human beings in general. We have conclusive proof that mental and psychological characteristics are just as much based on hereditary predispositions as are physical characteristics, normal and pathological ones. (This is not to say anything about the mental and psychological aspects per se and their relation to bodily predispositions.) [The sentence in parentheses apparently refers to the correlations of body types with psychological characteristics as presented in such works as Ernst Kretschmer's Körperbau und Charakter, 1921, and works by W. H. Sheldon. —Translator] What was said above concerning the range of reaction is just as true of mental predispositions as bodily ones. Within this range there is the effect of education and other environmental factors.

Race is thus a totality of immutable characteristics of a physical and mental-psychological kind determined by its genetic composite. Race is not simply some given body form group, nor is it simply a distinction which can be made from other such groups on the basis of a couple of external characteristics. It is an exclusive biological unit which has come about by special, orderly processes in the genetic mass, sharply differentiated genetically from other such units. The processes which led to it are known to us from the general study of genetics. It is very difficult or often impossible to survey and describe their particular development in the particular case of a quite specific race.

Our ideas about the origin of races must start out with the demonstrated reality of an originally undifferentiated human race. Just as all forms of animals living in the wild are undifferentiated and just as they exhibit, at the most, minor variations of size and color in the case of an extensive geographical range, the earliest man was an undifferentiated form. There can be no detailed discussion at this point of the proofs afforded by morphology, physiology, psychology and pathology. This human race thus also had a common stock of p.123 genetic material and, except for individual hereditary lines, a uniform stock of genetic factors. As mentioned above, the genetic factors per se are independent of the environmental factors which have an effect on the body. However, the gene is not entirely and completely immutable forever. There are changes, albeit rare, of individual genes which we call mutations. Generally, we do not know their causes. We can produce mutations artificially by means of x-rays and by means of certain poisons (in the case of plants). They are almost always pathological. In nature we occasionally see the occurrence of a mutation without any recognizable cause. In this way albinos, for example, occur (white stags, white bats, white blackbirds, and white domestic animals). In human beings, too, there are these mutations, and indeed in all races. In the case of the animals living in the wild such mutations are eliminated in the callous eradication process of nature. The only animals which are divided into numerous races, like man, are the domestic animals. The racial characteristics of these animals are just as hereditary as those of human beings, as racial crossing has demonstrated in this case also. We can not go into details at this point. The fact that all racial characteristics of our domestic animals are anatomically and genetically quite analogous to the racial characteristics of man can be seen, for example, in the color differences of blond, brunette, red, black in the hair of human races, horses, bovines, dogs, etc. Curly hair, straight hair, and stiff hair correspond to the same forms in the case of domestic animals (for example, the Angora). Dwarf build, tall build, forms of lips, forms of noses (e.g., ram's nose), colors of eyes and all such racial differences are found in domestic animals and man. Things are similar down to the finest details of the tissue structure. The breeds of domestic animals have come into existence by virtue of the fact that mutations which have arisen "spontaneously," i.e., for unknown reasons, have not been eliminated, for example, but have been retained artificially by the breeder. There is quite strong evidence that life in the domesticated condition causes the occurrence of numerous mutations by the change of nutritional factors, temperature maintenance and reproductive conditions, as opposed to life in the wild. The breeds of domestic animals thus came about by their selection and combination. It should be emphasized that their differences are not only of an exterior physical nature, but also of a physiological and psychological nature. This means that metabolic processes, capacities, and mental characteristics are racially clearly different in the case of individual domestic breeds. That, too, is based on mutation and its breeding.

The formation of human races must also be based on the same laws, because the human genes are basically analogous. After man became man, with the beginnings of his civilization, with the use of fire and hence the great broadening of his nutritional possibilities, with tools, language and social institutions, he lived, from a biological point of view, basically in a condition which corresponds completely to that of domestic amimals. In keeping with this, numerous mutations occurred. In this case arbitrary choice and caprice take over the rôle of deliberate breeding of the races of domestic animals. Selection and breeding by external factors were also not lacking at first. At the same time humanity migrated in groups from its place of origin and spread over the whole earth. No mammal is the equal of man in that regard. The constant venturing into new p.124 environmental conditions, in some cases of a quite different kind, must have had a tremendously selective effect and wiped out unsuitable mutations. The isolating of individual groups by emigration now made possible for the first time the preservation of genetic mutations which had occurred in conjunction with the effect of [natural] selection. These ideas, which were converted into a well-founded theory on the basis of observations on domestic animals, are fully confirmed by the skeletal remains preserved for us from the early time of man. From the area of origin which the Java Man and the Peking Man indicate to us, man at the Neanderthal stage of development (that is, even before the last glacial period) spread out as far as the inhabitable northern edge, the western end and the southern part of Europe and as far as the southern tip of Africa. However, the human form, as far as we can determine, is still almost uniform [at this time]. Furthermore, this form will also encounter us on Palestinian soil. At the time of, but toward the end of the last glacial period, the next migratory wave now covers the whole world. However, the formation of races has now commenced and the finds show us differences in the shape of the skull, facial form and tallness which we can only interpret as racial differences. From this time on, mankind is divided into races. It may probably be assumed that the differences now became fully established and strenghtened during the course of the subsequent periods.

The processes which led to the development of races are thus the occurrence of mutations, the isolating of tribes by migration, the increase of the frequency of mutations by cultural influences (domestication), the change of climatic and other environmental effects through migration and by the change of climate in the glacial and post-glacial periods, adaptation by selective processes, evolution and growth or decline. Thus, the different nature of the races would seem to depend on the kind of mutations, on the one hand, and the phenomena of selection and adaptation on the other hand. Certain mental and psychological characteristics will be decisive factors in this regard even if, naturally, physical health, efficiency and adaptation of physiological developments to the environment have always been an absolute requisite for the prospering of the race in question. Only in this manner can we explain the simply remarkable adaptation of many races to their environment. I am thinking, for example, of the special adaptation of the Bushman to the life in the sand of his desert and prairie, of his sharpness of senses, of his capacity to go without food and water and to walk around in the hot sun and dryness and his lack of capacity for sedentary work or any very high mental achievement. Migratory races with certain mental talents and a simultaneous physical capacity will withdraw from desolate regions and leave them to inferior races, but they will, when caught up in the climatic change of the glacial periods, for example, become a battle-accustomed, special race of strong character in an extremely selective process under unfavorable conditions, such as along the edge of the ice, by taking up a struggle for mere existence. The Nordic race is an example of such a race. Thus, the interaction between the gene stock of a mental and physical nature provided by mutation and the environment, with its selective effect, brings about the varied nature of the individual races. In view of this, it becomes immediately clear that races from one branch can develop in an

p 125 infinitely diverse manner by that force, while other races can become similar to one another without being especially close to each other in a genealogical sense. Individual characteristics of a physical and mental nature, moreover, can arise separately and independently of each other by the appropriate mutation and appropriate selection at various locations of the human race. (This can be readily demonstrated in the case of certain physical characteristics.)

This outline should show that we comprehend the origin of races quite well in a general sense, after all. The basic aspects seem well established. On the other hand, tremendous and largely insoluable problems arise at once when it is a question of tracing the origin of a single, quite specific race within the general framework. Actually, we have more or less complete information only in a single case; that is the origin of the Westphalian [Falid] type of the Nordic race from the late Paleolithic Cro-Magnon race. Here we have, indeed, the fossil records with rather few gaps down to the present-day representation in the living population. In the case of all other races the glacial and post-glacial forerunners are uncertain or completely unkown. Even the place of origin and hence the external conditions and the selective processes are, in most cases, uncertain or at most are to be assumed with some degree of probability. This is also the case with the question before us today with regard to the origin of those races which were and still are the bearers of the Semitic civilizations and hence also with regard to the origin of the Jews.

This question leads us initially not only to Palestine, as far as the area is concerned, but also to the land of the Tigris and Euphrates, from the Persian Gulf on up to the Armenian highlands and Asia Minor and thence down to Arabia and over as far as Egypt. Since we know that the Semitic peoples did not migrate into their later dwelling areas until early historical times, the skull remains of Palestine originating from the previous time are of value to us for the racial history of the immigrants only to the extent that they give us evidence concerning the possible substratum which was absorbed by the immigrating conquerors.

In Palestine the oldest finds of human remains extend chronologically before the beginning of the last glacial period. They are the famous, so-called Galilee skull from Tabgha on the Sea of Chinnereth and perhaps also a find from Mount Carmel. It is a human being from the group of the Neanderthal man, the form of development which preceded present-day humanity. Even if there are only these sparse finds, numerous flint tools originating at this time in various localities of the country show that this human being permeated the whole country. This find is not geographically isolated. We may assume that all of the Near East and North Africa and Europe shared that form of human being. Proceeding from Palestine, the nearest finds are certain finds of teeth from Malta and, further to the west, the Neanderthal skull from Rome. To the north, the Palestine find is connected with a skull find from Podkumok north of the Caucasus. From there the finds go in a westward direction to Moravia, Croatia, central Europe and western Europe. But this type of human being might not have been absorbed into the later Near Eastern population, or at least we have no reason for such an assumption. Such a human type perhaps died out or emigrated and might have been replaced by later types during p.126 the course of the following glacial period. However, we know nothing about these later forms. During the glacial period which now came about, when the Cro-Magnon man and other races were living in Europe (and not only in Europe, because the Cro-Magnon races also entered northern Africa and even eastern Africa), during this period when Europe was covered with ice except for a narrow central belt and its southern peninsulas, there was neither a Sahara nor the deserts of Arabia and the Near East. These were all fertile land under the southern rain climate dependent on the ice cover. Thus, there were tremendously large areas where tribes that had immigrated could form races. Moreover, during the course of, let us say, forty thousand years, this region underwent a worsening of the climate which was not even, but with periodic declines of heat. There took place a slow drying up down to the time of the present forming of deserts. It was only the very most recent reshapings of the land, such as the formation of the fertile land subject to inundation along the lower valley of the Tigris and Euphrates and the final sanding up of many Arabian rivers that are retained in the memory of the first men recorded in history. These reshapings were recorded in the writings of the Sumerians, the later Babylonians, the Hebrews, etc. What is interesting to us in this connection took place earlier. The finds which are chronologically closest after those on Palestinian soil mentioned above are only from the later Stone Age, when man had domestic animals along with polished stone instruments, tilled the soil and possessed the art of ceramics. As the most important find, I mention that of Gezer (situated between Jerusalem and the coast), where bodily remains of these settlers are preserved for us. These remains, unfortunately, are quite sparse. These people, as far as we may conclude from the several skeletons, were rather slight of build and dolichocephalic. In most cases cremation took place. Even in this case, cultural remains show that the settlement was widely distributed across the region. Concerning their ethnicity and language we know nothing. This might coincide chronologically with the time in which we see the first makers of Bandkeramik and Schnurkeramik [Neolithic pottery styles decorated by bands or imprints of string] coming onto the scene in central Europe. We might classify these Gezer people as members of the Mediterranean race. (This designation is better than the "Western" preferred by Günther; the two terms intend to convey the same meaning.) From present-day ethnology we know that the whole edge of northern Africa as well as southern Italy, the large Mediterranean islands and the Iberian Peninsula, and even the Atlantic coasts of southern France and England, were occupied by their race before the arrival of the Indo-Germanic people. Although it is not proved, everything can be said for and nothing against the assumption that this Mediterranean race originated in the broad zone of northern Africa, which was quite habitable during the glacial period, as I have pointed out. This race spread out toward the west as well as toward the east, over the Near East and as far as western India. In India huge finds have come to light which might belong to this race. In this huge area particular branches might have sprung up in the lap of this race in the manner which I have described above. I assume that such a separate region was the present Arabian peninsula, an area spacially separated from the rest by the Red Sea and the Persian Gulf, which extended far to the north at that time. As a result of the climatic fate of this land, a special race probably p. 127 developed from the same root as the Mediterranean race, which I designated as the "Oriental" race many years ago. This name is now in general use. During the course of the declining glacial period, which was a period of slowly declining rainfall and moisture in this area in transition from forested and open land to a prairie or even sandy desert, these people, whose origin from a truly glacial period we do not know, had to adapt themselves slowly to these changing conditions. Here, in this tremendous space, the climatic change of which was certainly uneven from zone to zone, inbreeding groups could form with a pronounced natural selection that favored certain mutations. That is the manner in which I postulate the origin somewhere in this region of the "Oriental" race from the lap of the proto-Mediterranean race. The "Oriental" race, with the nose form, eye form, color of the skin and hair and all the other characteristics peculiar to it, received its form in this area. And primarily amongst all these characteristics, the psychological type of this race was formed here, its adaptation to the initially poor life, the formation of mental capacities for the creation of the civilization of a sheep-raising, half nomadic grassland population.

Indeed, today we view the development in such a manner that we attribute to the game hunters or primitive hunters a certain tendency to remain in one location, the taming of animals and first attempts to sow seeds of nutritional plants at favorable places and we assume the origin of the first stages of cultivation with the hoe from these activities. The transformation of the game-rich forest into open land and then grassland permits the taming of goats and sheep (the dog had already long ago been tamed). Sheep-farmers come into existence, for whom the pasturing involves a nomadic movement, but not the life of a true desert nomad. At fertile places (later oases) settlement takes place for a longer period and cultivation with the hoe is carried on. In regions of rather extensive drying out the true desert nomad might develop from this stage, as we see in the area of that "Oriental" race, a final form of a cultural specialization. On the other hand, however, the sheep-raising people who carry on some cultivation with the hoe and who have a tendency to settle, even if not permanently, will arrive at a true agricultural existence and then become city builders and city dwellers. The fact that, along with all such developments extending over millenia, a very distinctive mental-psychological type developed in every case is taken quite for granted by the biologist, but let us emphasize it. This distinctive type, once having come into being by selective breeding, will be eradicated only by an opposing, strongly selective process. In general, thus, it will exist during the coming centuries or millenia. This type is characteristic of the Oriental race.

Furthermore, the later Jewish people have preserved for themselves the recollections of those earlier stages. The tales of Abel, who was a herdsman, and Cain, who was engaged in agriculture, [along with] the tale of Abraham's sheep trade with his brother-in-law and the migrations through the desert indicate that. Just as with these recollections, certain mental and psychological characteristics have remained and have their effects to this day.

This Oriental race is relatively pure, the basic stock of the so-called southern Semites, i.e., the present-day Arabs, who thus partly underwent the development to real desert nomads and partly, at a somewhat earlier state, probably likewise arrived at a settled existence. Furthermore, this race is the basic stock of
p. 128 all those Semites who spread out onto African soil in numerous thrusts in prehistoric times and who were absorbed into the Egyptian people and many other Hamitic peoples, along with a strong interbreeding with Negroes.

The later, so-called northern Semites (Assyrians, Babylonians, Aramaeans, Phoenicians, and others) likewise developed from this same race. However, they spread out from the original area and encountered other racial elements with whom they mixed in close contact, with some elements more, with others less. These contacts caused them to be different from the southern Semites. Amongst these northern Semites, naturally, are the Hebrews we are considering.

As mentioned above, during the later Stone Age, that is, many thousands of years later than the time of the origin of races and the geological revolutions, there were located in Syria and Palestine those people whom we call Gezer Man on the basis of the place where their remains were found. Around this time and further to the north, i.e., in the upper Tigris and Euphrates country, in all of Asia Minor, in the highlands of Iran and as far as Hindu Kush, another race must have been settled. We simply designate this race as the "Near Eastern" race (von Luschan's Armenids). We have no finds which prove its existence from such a remote time. We presume the existence of this race, which will later be demonstrated. We do not believe that this race even originated in the aforementioned area, but we do not know its origin. It seems most logical to think of central Asia. We have ideas concerning the shape of its skull from burial finds of approximately the fourth millenium [B.C.] and from the distribution of certain racial elements. This conclusion seems to me to be sufficiently established.

One can see that these conclusions, which are based purely on prehistoric finds of skulls and tools, and the results of geological, climatic and general biological considerations furnish a certain basis, but nothing else. Let us now turn to other sources of information.

In the case of prehistoric finds, mention must be made of another circumstance. Still other people must have entered the Palestinian area toward the end of the later Stone Age. They erected large stone monuments, prominent single rocks, gigantic tables, etc. One speaks of the Palestinian megalith culture. Even the Old Testament mentions this already. Megalith graves can be traced from southern Scandinavia across the whole Atlantic coast of Europe, over the entire northern edge of Africa and the southern edge of Europe, across the Balkan area, across the Crimea and as far as the Caucasus. It cannot be determined if a single ethnic group spread them about or if the custom of this ethnic group as such was transplanted. As for myself, I imagine that bold migrations of people of the Cro-Magnon race from northwestern and western Europe set up and left their prominent monuments here. I consider these bold migrations to be the first ones, which were followed by numerous others before and during the second millenium (see below). I do not believe that their blood was mixed into that of the native population in appreciable quantities at the places involved. They came as militarily organized conquerors ("Vikings"!) erected their monuments and then went away. This phenomenon is mentioned here just for the sake of completeness.

If one attempts to ascertain the racial history of the "Semites," one is dependent, for one thing, on the data which archaeology furnishes us from the wonderful excavation discoveries of temples and palaces, of pictorial works and utensils, and data concerning the rise and fall of civilizations and their migrations. One is further dependent on the research of linguists which reveals to us ancient origins and relationships from the vocabulary of the individual ethnic groups or at least from language remnants of their proper names or the like. [An American analogy is the retention of Indian words in place names such as Ohio, Oklahoma, Mississippi, etc. —Translator] p.129 Finally, anthropological investigation of present-day inhabitants of the areas which we may think of as "retreat areas" of ancient population strata furnishes us an indication of earlier [conditions]. Such retreat areas are remote mountain valleys and the least fertile parts of the land, but also, in a figurative sense of the word, membership in religious sects and circles of nobility and other social isolation. In Asia Minor and the Armenian highlands we have many of such retreat areas. The anthropological study of these retreat areas by von Luschan helped to throw a powerful light on the question we are examining. Finally, racial history has as a basis the actual finds of skulls or other human remains from early historical times. These finds have been increasing during the past few years to a pleasing and astonishing extent. In addition to these skulls, there are also portrayals of the people created by themselves and their kind. Quite honest criticism, cautious evaluation and knowledge of the art work in question and its history are necessary for an attempt at an anthropological interpretation on the basis of the excavated portrayal of the human countenance. With regard to such interpretation, I usually say that one must consider what the artist in question "could," "was permitted" and "intended." However, by means of this criticism one can actually obtain a realistic picture from the heads which Sumerians and Subarians, the Hittites, Babylonians, and Egyptians have passed down to us. All these sources together permit us to construct the following approximate outline.

Prior to the fourth millenium, as previously mentioned, the Near Eastern race might have been spread out in the entire area to the north and to the east of Palestine, which is of interest to us. We know this race, in terms of its bodily characteristics, primarily from von Luschan's investigations of the small ethnic and sect groups, such as the Ansarijeh, Tachtadshi, Kyzylbash, and others, as well as those amongst the Lycians, Druzes, Maronites, etc. Hauschild and Wagenseil have confirmed to a considerable extent the occurrence of these types by investigations in the Turkish army during the [First World] War. Moreover, this racial picture corresponds quite well to the relief portraits which were formerly known by the name Hittite, from Sendshirli, for example, and which are now called Subarian. Accordingly, the Near Eastern race (also called Armenoid or proto-Armenian) was of medium stature and had a coarse bodily structure, dark hair and dark eyes. However, as quite distinctive features this race had a very short, high skull with a quite flat occiput, which von Luschan described "as if hacked off." The coarse face with a perpendicular forehead is dominated by an extraordinarily large, coarse, strongly projecting hooked nose. As shown by the well-known sculptures of Sendshirli and other places, this race was the bearer of the so-called Hittite civilization, or more precisely, the Subarian civilization.

However, one must not imagine that this Near Eastern race was the only one in the area or that it filled up the entire area. It perhaps simply moved in as the dominant one. The strong impression made by von Luaschan's survey and brilliant portrayal of this race has hitherto caused the investigators to assume tacitly that really only this race and the previously described Orientalid race should be taken into consideration at all. In fact, nothing of the sort can be concluded from von Luschan's descriptions. Only in remnants and in the most p.130 remote places did he find them still extant. At all other places, that is, in a very great part of the countries involved, a population is present which cannot be traced back to the Orientalid race. Now, new finds have clearly demonstrated the presence of the Mediterranean race. Such finds, for example, are the quite splendid ones from Alisar in northeastern Asia Minor dating from the Neolithic and Bronze Ages. If the Neolithic Gezer group were really also Mediterranean, the conclusion is suggested that the Mediterranean race was once the dominant one before the invasion of the Orientalid race from the south and the Near Eastern race from the north. The Mediterranean race was then absorbed as a basic component into all the later populations. This race also witnessed the mighty displacement of land and water in that area, the formation of the delta of the Tigris and Euphrates, the coastal shift of the Persian Gulf and the mighty flood periods, the memory of which is in the Biblical Deluge, which the Jews took over from the Sumerians almost word for word.

Perhaps the picture is now becoming even somewhat more complicated. Certain observations on the Alisar find[1] argue that in addition to (previous to?) the short-skulled Near Eastern race the round-skulled central European Alpine race (Günther calls them ostisch [=Eastern], a term I consider misleading) was established in Asia Minor. In Neolithic times, their area of distribution extended certainly to Spain in the west, while the Near East was their eastern extent. That would correspond well with certain conclusions of linguistic research about the connections of the Basque languages with the languages of the Caucasus and Asia Minor. With regard to the Sumerian question, too, the key could lie here from an anthropological point of view.

Let us turn from the races to the historically recorded nations. In the southern part of Mesopotamia we do indeed find the nation of the Sumerians as the oldest known settlers. This nation is a puzzle to us with regard to origin and race. The achievement in the construction of gigantic temples and the production of art works that it attained is astonishing. It was established there certainly toward the end of the fifth millenium. The wonderful excavations in Ur and Kish have crowned our knowledge of this civilization. As mentioned, the racial origin [of the Sumerians] is uncertain. In certain documents they are called "black heads." Some of the skulls that have been found are reputed to exhibit a long, narrow form (?). The portraits are round-headed with pointed, short little noses. The physiques are represented as stocky. Their language was not Indo-Germanic and not Semitic. Some linguists conjecture Turan (agglutinating) languages, but they were certainly not Mongolids. Other linguists find a linguistic connection with the Caucasus and pre-Indo-Germanic southern Europe. From an anthropological point of view, one can first conjecture the Alpine race on the basis of the portraits. This would be in keeping with the remarks above. But one must also think of the Mediterranean race if one hears that they came from the east and previously honored their gods on mountains. One could conjecture a reverse wave of the Mediterranean race out of India.

In any event, the Sumerians settled in lower Mesopotamia, namely as builders of villages and cities. They were constantly disturbed and as early as the fourth millenium they had constant fights with roaming hoards. Bedouins, as we would call them today, attacked them repeatedly, took parts of their land and then were overcome and probably also assimilated by them. I imagine that in these early times, in the p. 131 case of very many "tribes," no definite cultural forms had taken shape as yet and that they only created their later forms, of course. Thus, there were probably migratory groups which exhibited all possible stages of economic forms, in some cases people beginning to settle and looking for fertile land for cultivation with the hoe, in some cases half-sedentary sheep nomads, while in other cases true desert nomads. The struggle between all such forms lasted for centuries until the immigration from the south became ever stronger and the government and ethnic identity of the Sumerians broke up under their pressure. Semitic cultures took their place.

Beginning with the fourth millenium, as mentioned, the Orientalid race moved from the south to the north from its previously described places of origin. Here, there took place the transition from the sheep raiser and settler cultivating with the hoe to the true village dweller and farmer to, finally, the urban civilization. This development certainly repeatedly involved a strong selective process in a certain direction. The legends and literary monuments of the Sumerians and later of the Babylonians, Assyrians and Hebrews inform us in agreement about the struggles lasting thousands of years between such invading groups and groups in the process of becoming settled on the one hand and on the other hand settled Mediterranean groups and groups of the Near Eastern race invading in the opposite direction from the north. Thus, in the origin of the Semitic peoples of the Near East (northern Semites) three races can be discerned. Of these three, one, the Orientalid race, might be the main element which brought with it the actual Semitic language and civilization and the mind of the sheep-tending nomads of the plains. This race penetrated the "Near Eastern" race, furnished it physical and mental characteristics and finally penetrated the Mediterranean race, which was established there as the old population and was absorbed into all Semitic peoples (Babylonians and Assyrians) by way of the Sumerians.

However, the picture is not yet complete at this point. From historical sources we learn also about invasions of conquerors of another origin. And that is also of particular anthropological interest to us and it is of no small importance in the origin of the final racial composition of the Hebrew nation.

There was a great astonishment at the time when it could be proved beyond question that the Hittite language is an Indo-Germanic language. Hence, a conqueror speaking an Indo-Germanic language must have entered the Suberian civilization at one time. [It was] probably only a thin dominant stratum which imposed its language on the population. In this process native linguistic elements were fused into it in large quantities. Now we know, of course, that the creators of the Indo-Germanic language group were the Nordic race. Elements of this race were thus unquestionably involved in that invasion, which began before the outset of the second millenium. However, we must not imagine the arriving people as exclusively blond and blue-eyed or simply purely Nordic. The route from the original homeland to the Near East was far and must have been covered over long periods of time, with long halts and conquests at other places. By that time only a dominant element might have possessed the remnants of the Nordic race. A migration of these conquerors so far away is perhaps not p.132 quite so unique. A thousand years later we see immigrations of people with the names Thracians and Phrygians, likewise dominated and influenced by Nordics, invading Asia Minor. Around a thousand years before these, invasions back from India seem to have taken place into upper Mesopotamia by people known as Mithanni or Manda, who likewise brought with them Indo-Germanic linguistic material. From these Hittites came a quite considerable component into that Semitic branch also, which we later find in the form of Israel. The Amurites of the Bible also belong to this movement from the north that was subject to Indo-Germanic influences. The Amurites also had Nordic elements, at least as an upper stratum.

If this picture represents in broad outlines the movements of races and nations during the fourth to second millenia in the Near Eastern area, the origin of the Hebrew nation in particular must now be further characterized.

It is not the task of the anthropologist to do that; I am simply going to point out things and present material which is already known. Of the Semitic immigrants, many groups became settled founders of cities while being fused with the previous population and while absorbing foreign elements, as described above. Amongst these were the Babylonians, Assyrians, Phoenicians and even others. However, other groups remained migratory herdsmen for a rather long time, as were the Aramaeans, sheep nomads in the highlands of northern Mesopotamia and the Jordan highlands, and in the same area the Hebrews, who pastured their sheep in the eastern part of the Jordan valley. They and the Moabites, Edomites and others thus moved through the whole land of Jordan and the region south of the Dead Sea and on northward as far as Syria around 1400 B.C. ("Abraham" came from Ur in Chaldaea!) The Aramaeans went over to a settled formation of government at the beginning of the second millenium in Syria. At first the Hebrews remained sheep herders. That was the time of the patriarchs Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. Times of particular dryness caused some of the sheep-herding tribes (probably not all of them) to retreat to the southwest and to seek better pastures in the upper delta region of the Nile. Seti I received them there in his border region. That, then, is the oppression in Egyptian captivity described in the Bible, probably until Moses led them over the sea of bulrushes to the oasis of Kadesh in the Sinai peninsula, perhaps before 1250 B.C. Here these tribes might have fused together as a race during the approximately sixty-year sojourn under Moses' rule. In two thrusts they then moved into the eastern Jordan region (they have been estimated at 25,000 souls) and from there they pushed into Palestine proper. They fused with the people who remained there and who were pressing into Palestine from the northeast. Here they interposed themselves amongst the Canaanite settlers who were present. As nomads they were inferior to the peasants in many ways, but they were mentally capable of finally gaining the upper hand and becoming settled themselves.

Their spirit is demonstrated in the promise, "A land of wheat and barley, of the grape vine, the fig and pomegranate, etc., with large and bountiful cities which you have not built, houses full of all sorts of good things which you have not filled, wells that have been dug, but not by you, vineyards and olive trees which you have not planted." (According to Auerbach.) But little by little they acquired all those things.

p.133 The son of the plain pressed into all of that and he knew how to adapt himself. Of course, there were centuries of bitter war, actual military wars and, in an extended sense, economic wars and wars against climate and events of nature. Thus, the nation evolved. In this connection, from a racial point of view, the imposing of a stratum on an already settled population, which was the Orientalid-Mediterranean-Near Eastern race, by a race which had not yet been settled, a race which was at first purely Orientalid, is of interest. What the quantitative ratio was in this mixture of blood cannot be determined. However, even still other foreign admixtures must now be emphasized. To the north lay the kingdom of the Hittites; their racial basis was described above. Their blood entered abundantly into the northern tribes of Israel. Furthermore, the Amurites were present and played a leading rôle. The land of the Amuri is known from cuneiform inscriptions. According to pictures, especially from Egyptian representations, [they were] bearded people with long faces and long heads with stout but not hooked noses. To judge from a number of intellectual traits, these people were also Indo-Germanic, at least as an upper stratum, that is, they were racially Nordic. The constant admonitions and interdictions of the Jews' prophets and law-givers alone prove that a mixing of blood with all these non-Semitic elements was constantly taking place. The Horites, who were mentioned in the Bible and known from other sources might have had the same origin, perhaps separated off the movement which brought the Aryans to India. They were later established south of the Hebrews in Palestine. The Philistines became the most important political question for the young Hebrew kingdom. The Philistines arrived in Palestine, perhaps at the same time when the last movements of the immigrating Hebrews were taking place. They had previously been located on Crete and perhaps along the coast of Asia Minor. Their language is Semitic, but all sorts of individual traits of their civilization point to the Indo-Germanic origin of an earlier dominant stratum. Schuchardt and Macalister point to the graves reminiscent of the battles around Troy and the helmet of the "giant" Goliath, to his inclination to single combat, as well as to their military organization and many traits of their civilization that clearly suggest an Indo-Germanic background. The Philistines landed, thus, and created the Palestinian state, which projected like a wedge from the sea to almost as far as the Jordan and which divided the Hebrews into two parts, a northern one and a southern one. The battles with these people lasted for two centuries. At times one of the peoples was the victor, while at other times the other people were the victors or the vanquished. There was a fusion. It was not until the reign of King Saul and especially King David that a final independence was established for a long time, the kingdom composed of the southern state of Juda and the northern state of Israel, approximately around 1000 B.C. "Under David the Israelite nation grew from the fusion of the two main ethnic groups of Palestine" (Auerbach), Hebrews and Canaanites, [who were] basically similar to each other as far as race was concerned.

One nation is now present with a racial composition that can be explained from the history of its origin; the Orientalid race as the main component, the Mediterranean race as an admixture, the Near Eastern race as a strong second component and Nordic elements mixed in now and then. The fact that the Nordic element was repeatedly mentioned in this presentation must not give the impression that this admixture was especially large! The Nordic race had (and still has!) a tremendous migratory strength and rôle as a conqueror, but the dominant strata in question were very thin, and the Nordic blood migrating to the south was p.134 very quickly and thoroughly eliminated because it was much less adapted to the climate than all others. Only traces of their culture remained, the language and other things, as evidences of their intellect.

In the discussion of the original racial elements of the later Jewish people there always comes up the question of a Negroid admixture. There is no doubt about its presence amongst the present-day Jews. Occasionally one sees Negroid hair, lips and even subdued Negroid nostrils. The explanation of this is difficult. It is not very likely that a rather strong Negroid component came into the Hebrews by way of the Egyptians

Further, remains of a Negritic population in the prehistoric and historic Near East have been conjectured which are alleged to be connected with the Negritic strata of India (i.e., not African Negroes). These people would have been of a small build, dark, strongly curly-haired and with fleshy, thick upper lips. Traces [of these people] are found even today in Baluchistan and southern Persia. Even this explanation is not satisfactory. At the most, one may think of numerous Negro slaves whom the Jews had in the Diaspora, of proselytization and a mixture of the two races. (see, for example, Kittel's brilliant presentation.) [Presumably, this refers to Gerhard Kittel's article on the connubium with non-Jews in the second volume of the Forschungen zur Judenfrage, pp.30-62. —Translator]

For the race as a whole, this question is not of all too much importance.

Thus, the Hebrew nation arose from the fusion of the Orientalid race with the Near Eastern and Mediterranean races, with an admixture of Nordic elements. The crossings which lead to the formation of such a race do not have a quite uniform result from a physical and mental point of view. We know that the physical traits of two or more interbreeding races are passed on in the hereditary process independently of each other and are then encountered in all possible combinations, thus giving the mixed race its variegated appearance. If the interbreeding components are numerically unequal and if the mixing is not uniform throughout the whole ethnic group, but is varied by strata, as is always the case with masters and subjugated people, then the one kind of traits in the total gene pool will naturally be numerically far more common than others. However, as far as the appearance in life, that is, the image of the nation in question, is concerned, it is not just a question of these numerical differences in the gene pool, but of the hereditary process of the individual traits, that is, specifically whether they are inherited in a dominant or recessive manner, in other words, in an apparent or concealed manner. The traits which are inherited in a concealed manner actually make an appearance in a racial mixture only in a manner which cannot be eliminated (unless special selective conditions intervene). In the Jewish people, for example, we see simultaneously the Orientalid and the Near Eastern nasal forms and all intermediate forms. However, the Mediterranean and once in a while the Negroid forms are present, as well as the Nordic form. It must be assumed that there was occasional blondness even in the ancient Jews, not just the present-day ones.[1] It can be explained by that which was said above. In the case of hereditary traits of a p.135 mental and psychological nature the hereditary process is naturally basically the same. However, the effect will be a quite different one because in this case parts of different origin cannot be juxtaposed without a mutual influence. Physically, a Negroid lip can be accompanied by a Nordic nose and blond hair by a Near Eastern skull. The psychological personality, however, demonstrates by its accomplishments and activities a combination of the effects of character, imagination, intelligence, temperament, etc. Then, too, one trait can characterize human beings mentally and psychologically and dominate the other traits! Considering the race as a whole, certain traits will become dominant here which are the inherent chief components of the racial mixture. Hence, even in the early history of the Jewish people are seen the emotion, the hatred and the cruelty often developing into bloodlust on the part of the sheep raiser of the Orientalid race along with the skill, adaptability, cunning and desire to dominate of the city founder of the Near Eastern race. In this regard one must not forget the fanatic aspect of the monotheistic belief in Jehovah and the concept of being the chosen people, conceived and retained fanatically by desert nomads. These aspects have made possible in the first place the isolation of the Jew amongst all his host populations. It would be logical to point out the tendency to unbridled fanaticism, particularly in the religious area, of the Islamic culture, which was borne originally by the same Mediterranean race!

Only an extremely strong selective process following racial interbreeding can again eliminate the genetic components of a race from the mixture, then, if this selective process especially involves the characteristics of the one race for reasons of adaptation. Without this strong selective process the individual racial elements that went into the mixture remain extant indefinitely. I could demonstrate that as long as thirty years ago through several generations in the southern African crossbreeds. Any glance at the Jews beginning with the time of the founding of their state [in ancient times] down to today proves the same thing.

Although from the time of the founding of the state onwards the incorporation of foreign elements did not cease, as was pointed out previously, the selective process within the closed Jewish nation provided for a complete amalgamation. As is well known, after the zenith of their power, after the death of Solomon in 933 [B.C], the kingdom again divided into the northern kingdom of Israel and the southern kingdom of Juda. Around 300 years later, Juda, and a bit later Israel, succumbed to the Assyrians and then to the Babylonians. And after the return of the Jews from the so-called Babylonian captivity a considerable amount of intermarriage might have commenced again, but in this process no foreign races were admixed, only similar ones.

This selective process in a special direction thus stamped a whole, particular race with quite specific racial traits of a physical as well as mental-psychological kind. There is an incorrect premise when one says that the Jews are not a race, but rather a racial mixture and for that reason have no racial characteristics peculiar to them. That is incorrect.

An ethnic group has a strong mental-psychological unity even if it consists of a number of races that have been fusing together with one another for many centuries if they harmonize together. The Jewish ethnic group has undergone this fusion during its long prehistory and history and the extremely strong selective
p. 136 process brought about by its fate has shaped irretrievably the characteristics of the Jewish intellect, of the Jewish psyche and of the Jewish body. To examine these in detail is no longer the task of this presentation. I can neither describe the physical traits of the resultant nation of Israel nor those of the present-day Jews. (The following lecture [on the racial biology of the Jews by Otmar von Verschuer] will have the latter as its theme.) To an even slighter extent can I describe here their psychology or even just their psychic style (to use Clauss' words). That would be a task in itself, and indeed a very large and important one.

The history of the racial origin was really completed long ago with the Babylonian captivity and the partial return from it as far as a people leading a political existence is concerned. Now there would no longer have to follow the description of the Hebrews or of the nation of Israel but rather the history of the Jews in the Diaspora, again a large task and perhaps the most difficult one.

My own intention was just the description of the origin itself. I hope that I have shown the racial origin. And if I may make a pronouncement as a systemitizer of races, it is the following: The European peoples also originated after military conquest, but in this instance the conquest by the Nordic race of other races. They thus developed into a racial entity by fusion. However, their racial elements are different ones. Originally, the Orientalid race was not present in any European nation, nor the Near Eastern race in any European nation.

These races are foreign to the European races and are of a different nature. Moreover, the Semitic Arabs are not the same as the Jews, because they have no Near Eastern Components. If Arabian blood lives on in Spain it is racially not the same as Jewish blood. However, the Jews, the race amalgamated from Orientalid and Near Eastern components, are of a foreign nature to us Europeans. They are different in body and above all psyche. They are most foreign and distinct from the Nordic race, however, whose origins took place under conditions which were just the opposite. Even today we sense that instinctively.

Dear George: 25 April 1984

I greatly enjoyed the lengthy excerpt from D. Myatt's "Vindex: The Destiny of the West," in the January "Liberty Bell."

The author's keen understanding of National Socialism is revealed in his assertion that "The National Socialist state was of the kind the [ancient] Greeks would have understood and admired, and National Socialist Germany was, in essence, the re-creation of the type of society found in Athens during the period of Athenian greatness." (pp 28-29.)

The founder of National Socialism, however, would probably have quibbled with Mr. Myatt over which Greek city-state came closest to embodying the National Socialist spirit and world view. Some five years before his assumption of power, Adolf Hitler paid homage to the eugenic values and warrior ethos of Sparta:

"The rule of 6,000 Spartans over 350,000 Helots was only thinkable in consequence of the high racial value of the Spartans. But this was the result of a systematic race preservation; thus Sparta must be regarded as the first folkish state. The exposure of sick, weak, deformed children, in short their destruction, was more decent and in truth a thousand times more humane than the wretched insanity of our day which preserves the most pathological subject, and indeed at any price, and yet takes the life of a hundred thousand healthy children in consequence of birth control or through abortions, in order to breed a race of degenerates burdened with illness."

Sincerely,
M.K., Virginia

Dear George: 25 April 1984

You have probably read the "Spotlight" story revealing the "REX 84" presidential directive setting up concentration camps for an estimated 200,000 people. The cover story for this is that a round-up of illegal aliens is planned. As you know, such a round-up would be in direct violation of the policies of cheap labor and racial mongrelization the Jews favor. Apparently, the real reason is that the US is about to go to war and this is a measure to silence terrorists and enemies of the war. No nonsense about "free speech" or the "right to protest" in a Jew-ordered war! Who is to be the enemy? One of our Jew owners, on a visit to Jewry's American colony from Israel, defined the "terrorist" enemy on a TV show last week. The enemy is: "Lybia, Syria, Iran, and the P.L.O." Not a word about Israel, which commits more international terrorism than all four of these Moslem nations combined.

This statement, added to numerous other preparations, indicates war is about to be launched against the alliance of these four nations. The U.S. and Egypt are to invade Lybia. Israel is to attack Syria with U.S. backing, and the U.S. and NATO forces, plus Irak, are to attack Iran. Khomenei has promised a world-wide terror campaign, plus closing of the Persian Gulf, in case of such an attack, so there is a real terrorist danger which can be used to justify this policy of mass arrests. The danger is that the Jews will include all their pet enemies in this round-up as potential terrorists or "violence prone" individuals, the Jew code word for white nationalists. The round-up is to be under control of FEMA, the infamous Federal Emergency Management Agency. This vile group was the one that ran the nuclear scare over the Three Mile Island sabotage. The purpose then was to crush nuclear power, which was a danger to the Jewish oil monopoly. The agency was to be activated at the end of the month but its activation was suddenly speeded up by one week so that it would be ready when the planned "accident" at the TMI plant occurred. With this kind of record, FEMA is revealed as 100% Jew flunky. Thus, the danger is that, when the crisis breaks, a mass round-up of white nationalists will take place under the pretext of "combatting terrorism." It will probably be something like the round-up in the "Turner Diaries."

. . . The recent strange events in London are a probable part of the build-up for all this. Some 40 shots were supposed to have been fired from the Lybian Embassy at a crowd of anti-Khadaffi demonstrators. Strangely, the only person killed was a British policewoman, of all people. Khadaffi denounced the whole affair as a plot by his enemies to cause trouble and later said the orders for the shooting came "from America and the Zionists." Khadaffi is said to be "crazy" by the Jewsmedia, but they say that about anyone who opposes the Jews. If you don't love the poor, innocent, noble Jews, you must be crazy!

Anyway, even a crazy man would know that it would be easy as pie to have terrorists shoot from another building. The only gainers from the whole affair are the Jews, who expressed great satisfaction over the whole affair and the suspension of relations between Britain and Lybia. Reagan also expressed unconditional approval of the British actions, though no evidence has been produced to prove the shots came from the embassy, or that the bomb at Heathrow airport was Lybian. The British Home Secretary, who handled the affair in the absence of the Prime Minister and foreign minister, has a Gentile name but is a Yiddish-speaking German Jew who snuck into Britain via Lithuania before the war. Lybia gained no benefit from this business, so I am inclined to believe their story that this was a deliberate provocation set up by the Jews and their allies. I consider this part of the build-up for war, as is the story of poison gas use in the Iran-Irak war and the story today that Iran will soon have the A-bomb. The reason Lybia is targeted is that it supplies oil to all of southern Europe and thus its shutdown would add to the effect of a Persian Gulf crisis. Khadaffi is also pro-Nazi and anti-Jew and thus a special enemy of the Jews.

Reagan has already committed several acts of war against Lybia including shooting down two Lybian jets in 1982. Reagan was apparently given an ultimatum some weeks or months ago to toe the Jew line. As a threat, the Jews suddenly raised interest rates last month, threatening to collapse the economy and blame it on Reagan. This threat was apparently effective, for Reagan obviously surrendered completely to Jew dictates at the April 1 Trilateral meeting. I don't know when this crisis will break. I have been expecting it since last year and the end of March—early April was a possible danger point. A new Iranian offensive against Irak or a closing of the Straits of Hormuz by Iran or an Iraki attack on Kharg Island would probably trigger the war and the round-up. Take note!

Best wishes,
R.S., New York State

Dear Sir: 27 April 1984

Considering the fact that it is God's responsibility to protect and support his "Chosen People," we can't see why American Marines were sent to the Middle East, or why American taxpayers are called on to give Israel a few billion dollars every described in Lady Queenborough's Occult Theocrasy (London, privately printed, 1933; reprint available from Liberty Bell Publications).* And you will find further information and still more examples in two books by "Inquire Within" (i.e., a Miss Stoddard, whose first name I cannot call to mind at the moment, and who wrote from inside knowledge of two rackets by which she was for a time deluded), Light-Bearers of Darkness (London, Boswell, 1931) and Trail of the Serpent (ibid., 1936; both books, I believe, have been recently reprinted in the United States, but I do not know by whom).

The three ladies, whom we must admire for their painstaking research and their courage in publishing it, all wrote from what is, at least nominally, a traditional Christian viewpoint, and they regard the various swindles they describe as anti-Christian, politically subversive, and tentacles of a great political conspiracy against Western civilization. That attitude is in itself highly significant. The three ladies all wrote in an age in which it was still possible to hope, and perhaps even to believe, that the Christian religion could serve as a stabilizing influence in the interest of our race and as a force for the preservation of our civilization. In their time, the traditional Christianity of the respectable churches, like the British Empire, seemed to be solidly established and able to withstand the destructive forces that were already gnawing away its foundations. The three ladies simply took for granted the Western Christianity that is now gone with the wind.

Western Christianity is not only gone; it is forgotten by the greater part of our population, remembered only by a few old men and women and the tiny groups with which they have

* The lady means theocrasy, because all of the cults are, like Theosophy, a mish-mash of earlier superstitions; the purpose of such promotions is that of all organized religions, to establish a theocracy and subject a society, a nation, or an entire race to the domination of a clique of holy men, who will rule in the name of the god they have invented. —Lady Queenborough casts a wide net and may have brought up in it a few secret societies that are not examples of religious swindles. For example, the conspiracy headed by General François de Malet, which she lists in her chapter on the Philadelphians, had, so far as I know without having investigated, only the limited political purpose of overthrowing Napoleon, perhaps by assassination. Some of the participants, no doubt, had ulterior purposes of their own, and it is not improbable that General de Malet's conspiracy was actually instigated by the notorious Fouché, just to exercise his talent for betraying all who trusted him. And that raises the question of what secret and powerful force found that anthropoid viper so useful that it protected him.

surrounded themselves. They alone are aware that they have witnessed the passing of a great tradition that the world will never know again.

If you will read attentively through the four books I have cited above, you will see that all the religious cults mentioned in them are, beneath their superficially great variety, basically the same. They differ only in their trappings, the buncombe about the supernatural that they have put together in various combinations from the Jewish Kabbalah, primitive Christianity, and Hindu mysticism, with various retouches, as in the pseudo-materialistic mysticism of the Communist International, which professes the old doctrine of the Essenes, Anabaptists, and Levellers, with the odd twist that all men were created equal by some unnamed substitute for a god. All the seemingly various cults differ only as a woman may differ from herself by changing the style of her clothing, her coiffure, her cosmetics, and her manners. Under the covers of their superficial diversity and illusory antagonisms, they all slobber on their victims the stinking drivel about "one world," "all mankind," "human rights," and "liberation."

You will see that what the three ladies, in their innocent faith in Western Christianity and writing from this standpoint, correctly identify as anti-Christian is precisely what you hear today from the pulpits of 998 out of every thousand Christian churches as their official doctrine. And the bovine congregations accept as Christianity what was unmistakably and demonstrably anti-Christian in the 1930s.

That gives you the measure of the transformation that was consummated in the past fifty years. The Christianity that was once accepted by our race and was still a bulwark of civilization seventy years ago and a still useful force fifty years ago, is now dead.

* * * * *

This is not the place to trace the squalid history of Christianity from its origins in revolutionary agitation by one or more Jewish christs to its use today as a revolutionary weapon against our race. The essentials were curtly stated by Ralph Perier in two booklets reprinted from *Liberty Bell: The Jews Love Christianity and Religion and Race. A systematic account of its derivation from earlier cults is Dr. Martin A. Larson's The Story of Christian Origins (Washington, D.C., Binns-New Republic, 1977). And I hope to summarize the evolution of the Jewish religion for goyim in a book on which I am now working. Even the most concise and highly selective bibliography of the subject would require many pages.*

In a little book written in 1969, Christianity and the Survival of the West, I called attention to the fact that the religion which had been accepted by our civilization had never appealed to other races, and in the postscript to the second edition (Cape Canaveral, Howard Allen, 1978; available from Liberty Bell Publications) I remarked on the speed with which that religion was being replaced by "Judaeo-Christianity," which was simply a reversion of the cult to the primitive form in which it was devised and propagated by the Jews for their own purposes.

What happened, of course, was that when the religion was exported from the dying Roman Empire to our ignorant and credulous ancestors, its substance was misrepresented by the missionaries, as is the custom of unscrupulous salesmen intent on making sales, and it had to undergo in practice extensive modifications to prevent our race from instinctively rejecting it as simply intolerable. The holy men had to accept in practice and accommodate as best they could in theory much of the antecedent and purer morality of our race, and the product was the blend or emulsion that was Western Christianity. The real literature of that religion is not the Bible, a collection of tales composed by Jews, but essentially Aryan thought expressed in the terms of Biblical myths: the Chanson de Roland, Dante's Commedia, Milton's Paradise Lost, Goethe's Faust, Tennyson's Idylls of the King, and even Hardy's Dynasts, to mention but a few of the best-known. Not only in literature, but in all forms of art, from music to architecture, so much of the spiritual force and vision of our race was poured into Christian moulds that a sagacious British observer, John Tyndall, writing in the June issue of Spearhead, concludes that, entirely apart from all questions of Christian doctrine and theology, Christianity, with its forms and ceremonies, will necessarily survive as part of our culture through the foreseeable future.

* Throughout history, the religion has been promoted by imposture, fraud, and forgery, much of it perpetrated by scabrous shysters whom the ignorant now venerate as "saints." I particularly recommend, therefore, Joseph Wheless, Forgery in Christianity (New York, Knopf, 1930) and Joseph McCabe, The Testament of Christian Civilization (London, Watts, 1946). The latter contains in English translation (bowdlerized here and there in conformity with laws against pornography which were in force when the book was published) significant passages from the writings of the Fathers that you could not otherwise find without going to the Latin and Greek originals in Migne's great collection, the Patrologia (389 volumes, 1856-1866, 2d edition, 1878-1902; index locupletissimus by Hopfner, 2 vols., 1928-1945).

I stress the fact that Mr. Tyndall, head of the British National Party and of what seems to be the only effective effort to defend our race in Britain, is thinking primarily of England. He must be taking into account two recent statistical surveys. The first, a sociological study made about two years ago, found that less than half of British children in their early teens attended any religious ceremony at their own option or that of their parents, a proviso that presumably excluded the pupils in some preparatory and (British) public schools, who are compelled to sit through a "chapel" or other religious rite by the school. The second, just announced by the British Council of Churches, found that of children who regularly attend a church when they are 14, 71% will have found a better use for their time when they are 20. It follows, therefore, that the waning of the religion is much more obvious in England than in the United States.

Despite the dilapidation of the cults in England, Mr. Tyndall believes that the rites and traditions of Christianity (considered without reference to doctrines and faiths) will necessarily be preserved by the culture into which the religion so largely entered. In other words, can we imagine a time at which our race will not respond to the majestic music of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony (including, of course, the words sung by the choir)? When we can view Mont-Saint-Michel or Ely or St. Peter's without reverence? When we will sneer at Titian and Michelangelo? I hope not.

Mr. Tyndall poses a problem for which I have no answer. When Georges Matisse wrote his unprophetic Ruines de l'idée de Dieu, he foresaw the preservation of the great cathedrals as architectural monuments, but he said nothing about the arts into which the religion entered more intimately. We can, to be sure, enter into the spiritual context of the great Graeco-Roman myths and the art they inspired, and as our race has done since the Renaissance in response to our racial instincts, we can feel a poetic and vivid faith in the lovely and gracious gods of antiquity and thus experience the power of the literature and art they inspired, but could we do likewise with what was inspired by our misunderstanding of an alien religion that was really a negation of the very soul of our race and civilization? I cannot imagine by what compromise we could regard Jesus as we now regard Apollo and Aphrodite, once belief in the existence of the alien god has been lost.

I cannot suggest what accommodation may be made in the future, but what is really tragic (in the true sense of that word) is that the religious parts of our culture, which Mr. Tyndall rightly stresses, came from Western Christianity, a religion that is now gone.

Christianity today is what is generally and almost universally accepted as such. It is demonstrably a heresy in terms of the tradition of Western Christianity, and one need not inquire whether that tradition is right, as a few individuals today still insist that it is. For all practical purposes that does not matter. In my youth, I knew one or two members of the American Monarchist Party, who demonstrated conclusively that the United States does not exist: it is a British colony in a state of insurrection. Its independence, it is true, was recognized in 1783 by a man named George, who was the Elector of Hanover and had no legal right to alienate British territory; its independence was never recognized by the legitimate King of England at that time, H.M. Henry IX, Cardinal York, who was then in Rome; nor was its independence ever acknowledged by his successors, including the legitimate King of England in the 1930s, Rupprecht I. Given certain premises in politics, that argument was unanswerable and the United States did not legally exist. Unfortunately, its inhabitants did not know that. Given certain theological premises, almost all the churches that are called Christian in the United States and elsewhere are actually anti-Christian heresies. Unfortunately, neither their congregations nor the public at large know that.

A sincerely Christian and learned friend of mine believes that the greatest theologian the United States ever produced was the Reverend Dr. Robert Lewis Dabney (1820-1897).*

* Dabney's collected works are being reprinted by Sprinkle Publications, P. O. Box 1094, Harrisonburg, Virginia. The most important volumes have already been published. Quite apart from theology, Dabney was a man of sound judgement and had an understanding of the realities of human society, as is shown by his perception of the consequences of contemporary events, and some of his reasoned predictions are being verified only now, in our own time. He perceived more than a century ago that the American people were doomed by the majority's morbid and psychopathic itch for innovations, no matter how disastrous their ineluctable consequences.

From the standpoint of Western Christianity, he is probably right. I shall be astonished if you can find in your community a clergyman who recognizes the name. And if Dabney's Christianity were expounded in any of the seminaries in which young men are learning to diddle the ignorant with unctuous or ranting appeals to irrationality, the twerps would be so frightened they would run to hide under their beds. The tiny minority of men who think or claim they are faithfully adhering to the Western tradition are a political nullity, of course, but even among them there are few who would not be astonished and perhaps palsied, if they grasped the full implications of Dabney's theology.

For our purposes, Christianity is what it is in practice today. And what that is, is painfully obvious.

Mrs. Webster, Lady Queenborough, and Miss Stoddard concurred in regarding the Marxist heresy, Communism, that great Jewish instrument of destruction, as the very antithesis of the Christianity they knew, and they were right. Today, most of the pulpits and even the sees of archbishops in the once staid Anglican Church are filled with Communist propagandists. They pretend, of course, that they are not Communists and claim that what they are peddling is only the "social gospel" that is found in the parts of the "New Testament" they are willing to believe. Some of the twerps may be so stupid they think there is a significant difference between the two. It is not remarkable that most of them are Aryans: so were the boys whom Fagin trained for a different and less harmful activity in Dicken's famous novel. What is frightening is that congregations listen to the prating pickpockets instead of running them out of town.

The "social gospel" is more openly practiced by the operatives of the World Council of Churches and its affiliates, who milk the suckers to subsidize savages in Africa and encourage them to murder white men. Thus do Jesus's modern disciples slake the lust for blood and destruction that festers in their venomous little souls.

In Central and South America, Catholic priests, who are busy inciting slaughter and terror, frankly proclaim that they are inspired by the gospel of Marx, which, they say, is entirely consistent with the older gospels that were the modern Jew's principal, though unacknowledged, source. In Rome, the public-relations men think it advisable to have Yahweh's Vicar issue a statement that he does not entirely agree. There is still profit in keeping up the illusion that the Holy Father is independent of the Jews he serves.

In the United States, Catholic priests and their subintroductae, commonly called nuns, jabber about the "rights" of "the poor" as they industriously defy or circumvent laws still on the books and accelerate the importation of mongrels across the Rio Grande in preparation for the glorious day when the Mexicans will reclaim the southwestern states and the Aryans now living in those territories repeat the experience of the Sudeten Germans, whose suffering evidently gave Americans such deep satisfaction after they, as the Jews' stooges, consummated the Suicide of the West.

In the United States, at least one Lutheran congregation celebrated Purim, the annual festival in which Jews encourage their racial hopes by rehearsing their legend that a noble Jewess sacrificed herself for her People by copulating with an Aryan pig, a feeble-minded King of Persia, from whom her sexual wiles procured authorization for the Jews to butcher Aryans right on the streets to their hearts' content.* According to the photograph of the performance in the Lutheran church, reproduced in Christian News for 11 June 1984, the rôle of the cunning Jewish whore was enacted by a very pretty Aryan girl with a Germanic name, while the part of the wicked Aryan who was her first victim was taken by a male who, at least as made up for the stage, resembled nothing so much as a Sheeny caught in the act of vending stolen goods. But even this visual contrast evidently failed to induce thought in the mutton-heads of the Lutheran congregation. Other Lutheran ministers, even in the "conservative" fragment of their church, beat their breasts in public as they frantically explain that the founder of their sect, Martin Luther, was a vile wretch when he made some candid remarks about God's Own Race.

The whole nation is now distracted by the tricks of "creation scientists," who, whether witlings or conscious hypocrites, have received some training in the techniques of scientific research and its vocabulary, are roosting in our already debauched academic institutions, and use the little prestige that academic titles still bestow to disseminate cunning quibbles to remove the last barrier to an epidemic of superstitious delusions. I have before me an advertisement inserted in various newspapers by the "Bible-Science Association," proclaiming that their "more realistic science of geology" has conclusively refuted the wicked notion that the Grand Canyon was formed by erosion, and have shown that instead it was split open by the ferocious old Jew-god at the time that he had Noah drifting around in his ark with his cargo of dinosaurs, pythons, typhoid germs, termites, and other of his special creations for afflicting mankind. Whether they are lunatics or racketeers, the sheer impudence of those self-styled "scientists" is enough to boggle a rational mind.

* The disgusting story of Esther (which, needless to say, is just fiction inspired by wishful thinking) was much toned down in the version for stultified Christians given in the King James "Old Testament." The more complete narrative is found in the Septuagint, which may be supplemented from the Jewish targums on Esther and the details preserved by Josephus.

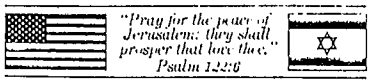
And, to top it all, 'the Jews' boob-tubes daily and nightly befuddle dimwits with the ravings of Jerry Falwell* and the rest of the salvation-hucksters, who, with all the tricks of acting and lighting developed for the cinema in Hollywood, inculcate the lesson that the Christians' god blesses those who venerate his Chosen representatives on earth. Such con men boast in print that their ranting about "God's will" and "Bible prophecy" will bring America "to its knees"—before the Jews, of course, and as though it were not already there. A typical solicitation by mail is reproduced on the following page. It emanates from a certain "divinely appointed" Mike Evans, who distributes imitation-brass pins that Aryan idiots may wear to show that they, too, "love Israel" and the blood-thirsty hostes generis humani who are reënacting in Palestine the atrocities narrated in their tale about an original conquest of that region, which scared Aryans have believed and approved for centuries as part of their Christian faith.

* This odious shyster was partly exposed in the pages of Penthouse for November 1981, December 1981, and January 1982. You may not approve of pornography, but remember that you live in a "democracy," and that the subject that chiefly preoccupies the minds of the majority of Americans today provides Penthouse with the circulation that permitted it to be the first publication to inform us of the calculated murder of American seamen on the Liberty by the Jews in Israel in coöperation with the Jews who have occupied the United States (see Penthouse for May 1976), and to publish a large number of other articles that could not possibly have appeared in a periodical of general circulation that was not based on pornography. —Falwell fleeced the boobs of what he calls a "moral majority" of $56,000,000 (tax-free) in 1980, and a friend of mine who likes to observe such diddles calculated that he increased his take to $72,000,000 in 1983. How Yahweh rewards his own! And you must remember that Falwell is only one of about a dozen hokum-peddlers who have used the boob-tubes to reach the big time in the Jesus-racket.



JERUSALEM

Dear Lover of Israel:

You are making a difference!

Your support has encouraged me so much. Together we are affecting the destiny of Israel and America.

Every group that has affected history and changed the course of nations has started with a few dedicated people . . . like you and me . . . each doing their part.

You are part of a select inner-circle of concerned Americans who are going to show the State of Israel that love is not just something you say -- it is something you do. "I will bless them that bless thee." (Genesis 12:3)

Enclosed is your official Seal of Certification for you to place on your copy of the historical Proclamation of Blessing.

I hope you will display this proudly in your home or office, and use it as an opportunity to tell others about the things you have learned . . . about Israel and America. Israel is America's key to survival -- but unless we Americans let our voices be heard from Washington D.C. to Jerusalem that we're standing for Israel -- it may be too late for both nations.

I am writing this letter to a select few who have shown by letters, calls and support that truly they are concerned. What an impact hundreds of thousands of people like you and me will have!

There are many people who love Israel, yet did not have the opportunity to see our Special. Therefore, they do not know about the Proclamation of Blessing . . . perhaps your neighbor, co-worker, church leader, Jewish friend, teacher or pastor. I trust your judgment and upon your recommendation I will send them, at my expense, the Proclamation Package like you received a few weeks ago, thereby giving them the opportunity of having their name added to this historic document.

Thank you for caring enough to take a stand. Together, we will make a difference.

Under Divine Appointment,

Mike Evans

Mike Evans

P.S. Our office is being flooded with letters and phone calls from across the nation from people asking us to air "Israel, America's Key to Survival" one more time in their city . . . or in another area they feel strongly needs to see it.

Air time is so expensive, and the extra expense is a heavy burden. Will you help me? On the card enclosed, please take time to give me your opinion and advice.

The present status of the religion was epitomized in an incident in Fort Collins, Colorado, on 7-8 January 1984. An amateur evangelist, Colonel Gordon Mohr, one of the very, very few who may be sincere in their purposes, delivered two lectures in a local Church of Christ. He stated, for example, that the Bolshevik butchery in Russia and the Ukraine had been financed by Jewish bankers in New York City; that is an indubitable fact, but one that docile Aryan curs should not know. There were two Jewesses in the audience, of course, keeping their racial eye on their goyim, and they screeched. The result was what is normal in the United States today. The fascicle of dirtied wood-pulp that is distributed daily in Fort Collins, called The Coloradan, assembled its entire editorial staff, reënforced with a local howling dervish, to produce a lamentation that the wretched First Amendment—perhaps—prevented the righteous from dropping the evil Mohr into an oubliette, such as the Inquisition thoughtfully provided for persons whom it was too tender-hearted—or hard-hearted—to burn at the stake in an Act of Faith (Auto da fe). That, of course, was only to be expected. When Frank Swinton retired as an editor of the New York Times in 1901, he said that the editors of newspapers, even at that early date, were prostitutes. That was a little unkind. It is more courteous to think of the editors as the counterparts of the hit-men for the Mafia: they do a dirty job for pay. It is true that journalists work longer hours than the hired assassins, but in compensation they do not need to have the modicum of courage that is required to shoot a man in the back from an ambush.

What is instructive about the incident at Fort Collins is that while the pastor of the church at which Mohr spoke weasled only a little, saying that the remarks were only about the Talmud and were not applicable to the dear Jews who were eating on the local population, the rest of the holy men, so far as is known, all howled frantically their hatred and execration of an Aryan so obdurately deaf to their God's Word that he could utter words that had not been approved by that god's Darlings.

That is Christianity today.

One sympathizes with the few individuals who insist that the virtual consensus of the churches today is not what they mean by Christianity. They are right about what they mean, but what matters racially is what virtually everyone else now takes 'Christianity' to mean. Christianity as a religion fit for Aryans is now dead. We are left with its putrifying corpse, and, as we all know, the organic mass that once was the most valiant, esteemed, and beloved man can in its decay breed only pestilence and death. It is time to bury the corpse. □

Certainly, if the Moslems put together an army of twenty millions of soldiers, all armed with the most modern implements of war, and then attacked Mount Zion, their efforts would be futile.

The rivers would run red with blood, the sticks would turn into snakes, the first-born of every Moslem would die, and every Moslem would be afflicted with a ten-year rash.

Here in America, the Jewish lobby, that powerful mole clinging to the underbelly of politics, rapidly is losing is invisibility. Soon support by this group may be more of an embarassment than an asset to a politician. Meddlers seem to believe that God is incapable of doing his job, that they must shunt him aside and do it for him.

To the Editor: 30 April 1984

I sincerely believe that it is vital to the Western racial - nationalist movement to get D. Myatt's complete manuscript published (The Logic of History). From what I was fortunate enough to read of it in the "Vindex" excerpt, this is obviously a tremendously important work for us, one which would take its place up on our shelves right next to "Imperium" and The Dispossessed Majority. Before the resurgence of a gravely wounded West can begin, we need "blueprints," if you will, and Myatt's work obviously qualifies on this score. The only work which I can think of that I would like to see published as much as this is Yockey's "The Destiny of America," of which only a fragment survives. But whereas that book was apparently destroyed by the powers-that-be, Myatt's manuscript is intact. Please, what can we do to get it published? I'm sure that "Liberty Bell" readers and other Majority activists would respond nobly with both advance orders and contributions should Liberty Bell Publications decide to undertake this crucial task. Please let us know if there is any possibility of this being done. Thank you!

Yours truly,
T.U., New York State

Dear George: 4 May 1984

I saw Mr. W.F.'s letter in the April issue of "Liberty Bell" wherein he asked for some data on the cure for cancer; so I thought I'd try to write in and give a simple outline of the process and the theory behind it. For more detail, Dr. Kelly's book, "One Answer to Cancer," is the best place to look. I am giving an outline of his findings below.

Cancer is basically a deficiency disease. The thing that sets you up for cancer is a low level of pancreatic enzymes in the blood. If your normal hormone balance is then disturbed, a false signal of pregnancy is given to the body. This causes the growth of throboplast tissue in any part of the body weakened or irritated by anything. It is these irritants that are blamed by the AMA doctors for "causing" the disease. Since there are an infinite number of irritants, orthodox medicine is helpless to say any particular thing "causes" cancer. The throboplast tissue is what forms the tumor, which is dividing and growing just as a baby does. The normal treatment is to kill the tumor by cutting, poison, or radiation. These "treatments" also kill the patient, but they are very profitable for the Jewish medical monopoly, so no change in them is permitted. Dr. Kelly lost his license simply for writing his book—in this land of "free speech."

Destruction of the tumor does nothing about the basic conditions that set up the disease, so the victim usually gets the disease again, is operated on again, and so it goes until the victim finally dies in agony, leaving his worldly possessions in the hands of the doctors and hospitals. This is pretty much what happened to Hitler's parents, though they had different diseases.

To cure the cancer, three steps are needed:

1. Take pancreatic enzymes. When they are in your blood, the cancer will dissolve just as it grew. Beware of taking too many enzymes, for dissolving too much cancer can overload your liver and kill you. If you feel too sick, stop taking the enzymes for a while.

2. To help clean out your body, you must alter your diet. A cancer victim should avoid all meat (artificial hormones are given to all meat animals to make them grow faster, and they are deadly to cancer victims) fats, butter. Indeed, a cancer victim should live on raw vegetable juices. Buy a juicer and drink carrot juice morning, noon, and night. I have known cancer victims who cured themselves simply by going "cold turkey" on vegetable juices. To help clean out your body, coffee enemas are useful. Dr. Kelly also recommends a process called the "liver flush" which helps clean the liver and also removes kidney stones without surgery or pain.

3. The final step is to get your body back in decent shape by a good diet. A cancer victim will have to watch his food and take supplements the rest of his or her life.

Dr. Kelly has a clinic in Washington where he will check you for cancer from a small sample of your blood. If you have cancer, he will prepare an individual program for your unique situation to get you back in shape. The cost of curing cancer by this method is only a few hundred dollars, but it requires you to change your diet and life style. But you'll have a life, which won't be the case if you submit like sheep to the orthodox "treatments" to enhance the Jew doctor's income. There are many other doctors curing cancer, many have been driven out of the US to the Carribean or Mexico by government persecution on Jew orders. Dr. Kelly is the best I know of, but Dr. Contrares in Mexico is excellent, too. You don't even need a doctor. You can buy pancreatic enzymes at most health food stores. To test yourself for cancer, take 6 tablets each day at breakfast. If you have cancer, the enzymes will dissolve enough of it to make you sick and dizzy and produce gas in your bowels.

I cannot promise that you will be cured of cancer and be restored to health, but I can tell you that it is 100% certain that if you submit to the quack's tortures, you will die. I only know of one person who has ever taken chemotherapy and lived. My own studies reveal that about 1/3 of the people who are treated for cancer don't even have cancer as the quacks don't even have a sure test for it. Those of the 1/3 who survive the treatments are the ones declared "cured" by the quacks.

Yours truly,
R.S., New York State

KEEP THE LIBERTY BELL RINGING!

Please remember: Our fight is Your fight! Donate whatever you can spare on a regular—monthly or quarterly—basis. Whether it is $2., $5., $20., or $100. or more, rest assured it is needed here and will be used in our common struggle. If you are a businessman, postage stamps in any denomination, are a legitimate business expense—and we need and use many of these here every month, and will be gratefully accepted as donations.

Your donations will help us spread the Message of Liberty and White Survival throughout the land, by making available additional copies of our printed material to fellow Whites who do not yet know what is in store for them.

Order our pamphlets, booklets, stickers, and—most importantly—our reprints which are ideally suited for mass distribution at reasonable cost. Order extra copies of Liberty Bell for distribution to your circle of friends, neighbors and relatives, urging them to subscribe to our unique publication. Our bulk prices are shown on the inside front cover of every issue of Liberty Bell.

Pass along your copy of Liberty Bell, and copies of reprints you obtained from us, to friends and acquaintances who may be on our 'wave length,' and urge them to contact us for more of the same.

Carry on the fight to free our White people from the shackles of alien domination, even if you can only join our ranks in spirit. You can provide for this by bequest. The following are suggested forms of bequests which you may include in your Last Will and Testament:

1. I bequeath to Mr. George P. Dietz, as Trustee for Liberty Bell Publications, P.O. Box 21, Reedy WV 25270 USA, the sum of $ . . . . . for general purposes.

2. I bequeath to Mr. George P. Dietz, as Trustee for Liberty Bell Publications, P.O. Box 21, Reedy WV 25270 USA, the following described property . . . . . for general purposes.

SOME QUOTABLE QUOTES FROM AMERICA'S DECLINE

FREEDOM OF SPEECH—FREEDOM OF THOUGHT
FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION

The editor-publisher of Liberty Bell does not necessarily agree with each and every article in this magazine, nor does he subscribe to all conclusions arrived at by various writers; however, he does endeavor to permit the exposure of ideas suppressed by the controlled news media of this country.

It is, therefore, in the best tradition of America and of free men everywhere that Liberty Bell strives to give free reign to ideas, for ultimately it is ideas which rule the world and determine both the content and structure of culture.

We believe that we can and will change our society for the better. We declare our long-held view that no institution or government created by men, for men, is inviolable, incorruptible, and not subject to evolution, change or replacement by the will of the people.

It has been a basis of Christian practice (as distinct from talk) since the religion was first promoted to goyim that what matters is not truth, but what you can make the sucker believe—for the good of his soul, of course, as well as of your pocketbook. Merely typical is the current squawking that the United States is a "Christian nation" because it was founded by pious Christians. The propaganda is often accompanied by a silly painting that supposedly shows George Washington kneeling in the snow, evidently trying to contract rheumatism in his knee, and with an expression on his face that suggests he has a tummy-ache.

Now most of the purveyors of this balderdash are sufficiently well educated to know that they are lying and are playing tricks with the word 'God' used in various documents at the time of the American Revolution. The word was used, perhaps with some ambiguity to avoid offense to fanatical clumps of Christians here and there, by most of the leaders of the Colonists to designate the god in whom they believed, who was not Yahweh, Jesus & Co., Inc., but essentially the god of Roman Stoicism. The predominant belief of the great men of the American War for Independence was Deism, essentially the religion of Voltaire, which he deemed an indispensable support of a civilized society. For the beliefs of Jefferson, see Dr. Martin A. Larson's excellent compilation of the substance of Jefferson's writing, Jefferson, Magnificent Populist (available from Liberty Bell Publications), on which I commented in 'Populism' and 'Elitism.' Substantially the same beliefs were held by Thomas Paine, Franklin, George Washington, John Adams, et al., with minor variations and considerable differences about the feasibility or desirability of a direct attack on the Christian sects.

The fanatics were in a minority at that time, but they were, as True Believers always are, vociferous and, in practice, unscrupulous. Fortunately, the aggressive sects, by their squabbles, and reciprocal hatreds, neutralized one another, and the Constitution, framed with an ostentatiously cold neutrality toward all forms of religion, was carefully designed to keep gods out of government. References to the unnamed deity designated as 'God' were accepted because at that time arguments for a creation of the universe or, at least, of the higher mammals, including human beings, were still more plausible than the alternatives, and were also regarded as conducive to social morality. Among the intellectually active minority, old Yahweh got the boot with the establishment of the heliocentric structure of the solar system and the vastness of the universe, but the god of the Stoics, the animus mundi who presided over the orderly processes of nature and established a certain morality as logical and reasonable, but never resorted to such foolish antics as trying to stir up Jews and getting himself crucified for his pains, remained a reasonable and plausible philosophical belief until the advance of biological science solved the problem of the origin and evolution of the almost innumerable species of organic life. The notion that men were created by some supernatural being rejoined witchcraft and astrology and the innumerable other delusions wrought by men's itch to believe what is not so.

Far from being a "Christian nation" when it was founded, the United States was a coldly un-Christian nation and in the writing of the principal Founding Fathers you will find no unambiguous allusion to the Christian deities. The total membership in Christian and allied sects (e.g., Quakers) has been variously estimated, but was proportionally lower than at any subsequent time.

When the Godly are pitching the woo for their Jesus, they often try to prove the Christianity of the founders by pointing to the words that now appear on coins and so commonly found in stores and filling stations: "In God We Trust: all others pay cash." Now everyone who has collected or even seen early coins knows that is false. The way in which the Christians sneaked the motto onto the coins is conveniently summarized by Madalyn Murray O'Hair in a booklet of reprints from the periodical, American Atheist. I was somewhat astonished by the dates.

It was in November 1861 that the government in Washington received the first suggestion that a god should be advertised on American coins. The suggestion emanated from an obscure "Minister of the Gospel" in Ridleyville, Pennsylvania. He obviously intended the word 'god' to refer to the one he was promoting, but hoped that by not naming him, he would conciliate Deists, Jews, Unitarians, and others.

The date is extremely significant. The suggestion was made in the apocalyptic atmosphere of hysteria that accompanied the greatest calamity in our history—the catastrophe, induced by crazed fanatics, that ended forever the American Republic and the society contemplated in the Constitution. Tantum religio potuit suadere malorum!

As we all know, among the earliest colonists in North America were members of sects whose agressive or ostentatious fanaticism had made them unwelcome in Europe. There followed an influx of demented or artful messiahs, male and female (e.g., "Mother Ann" Lee), who formed little enclaves of crack-pot cultists, tolerated on the grounds that one superstition could not be sillier than another. Aside from the Calvinists, whose Edwardean Conspiracy to infiltrate and capture the government was a failure, the godly were all content with a society which, though permitting sin, protected them from persecution and extermination by their numerous and diverse competitors in the salvation-business.

Religiosity did not become epidemic in the United States before the end of the 1820s, when there was an outbreak of rabble-rousing evangelists, who ranted to large crowds in "camp meetings" and preyed on the credulity and imagination of the ignorant and neurotic. They hawked many different brands of holiness, but their technique was the same. The howling dervish excited paroxysms of terror and mass hysteria with his crudely rhetorical description of the fiendish tortures that the ferocious Jew upstairs would inflict after death upon all who did not do what the dervish said Yahweh had said they must do.

The chief inspiration of rabble-rousers is their envy and hatred of the minority that in every society represents its highest culture and is believed to be fortunate and happy. And it was only natural that many of the evangelists discovered the malicious joy of exciting in the lower classes a frenzied hatred of the Americans who were most envied from a distance because they were thought to be a nascent aristocracy, the great planters of the South, of whose prosperity, culture, and comfort the masses of the North had been given the most exaggerated notions.*

* On the outbreak of the religious epidemic and its close association with

The first religious protest against slavery was uttered by a Quaker immigrant from Germany, Pastorius, in 1688, and he induced three Quakers to agree with him, but the absurdity of that wild protest greatly embarrassed the Quakers in general and they quickly suppressed the immigrant's gaffe. Honest and educated clergymen were estopped from criticizing adversely the enslavement of the savages who had been imported to work the plantations of the South, because they knew that slavery is explicitly and emphatically sanctioned in the "New Testament," which was God's Word.* No Christian could then, or can now, denounce enslavement of the lower races without expressly repudiating the holy book from which he claims to derive the doctrines of his religion, and he can continue to call himself a Christian only if he is either the ignorant victim of rabble-rousing shysters or himself a hypocrite.

There was, of course, some rational opposition to slavery in the United States, both before and after 1830, but not on religious grounds. Thomas Jefferson, a far-sighted man but deemed fanatical on that subject in his day, opposed slavery on racial grounds.† Much later, Abraham Lincoln, who was an the Abolitionists, see Gilbert Hobbs Barnes, The Antislavery Impulse, 1830-1844 (New York, 1933), and the other works I cited in 'Populism' and 'Elitism,' n. 26.

* Concerning this, there can be no possible doubt in the minds of anyone who has read the "New Testament" in Greek. The King James version often muddles the minds of persons who read the pertinent passages only in it, since the word which specifically means 'slave' is translated as 'servant,' a word which at that time was often used in both England and the American colonies to mean 'slave,' as, indeed, it should etymologically. The reason for this ambiguous translation is unknown, since the notes kept (in Latin) by John Bois on the discussions among the translators have been lost for the portions of the text relevant here. (The extant portion of Bois's notes was found and published by Professor Ward Allen, Translating for King James, Nashville, Vanderbilt University Press, 1969). If you want to make a quick check of the honesty of recent translations of the "New Testament" or the Bible as a whole, look up, for example, Ephesians, 6.5, and if it does not say "Slaves, obey your masters," you will know that translator is a cheat. Shamans are always ready with sophistries and verbal tricks, of course, but if they claim that the portions of their holy book that expressly sanction slavery are spurious or that their god has changed his mind, they have simply pricked the soap bubble.

† On Jefferson's opposition to slavery, about which "Liberals" habitually lie, see the work by Dr. Larson cited above and also my 'Populism' and 'Elitism,' pp. 24-26.

atheist (although also a practical politician), opposed negro slavery on the grounds that exportation of the blacks from the United States would automatically increase the wages of white laborers.* Hinton Helper opposed slavery because he believed it to be economically oppressive of the poor whites of the South.†

There were sound reasons for urging the end of slavery in the United States and the prompt exportation of the niggers who would thus become useless and detriments to the nation, but the Abolitionist craze that swept through Northern states was the work of rabble-rousing evangelists who claimed to be Christians and put over on the ignorant lower classes a great hoax by the Jewish technique of the Big Lie. By yelling that Yahweh-Jesus wanted the South impoverished, the hate-crazed agitators, egged on and partly financed by the Jews, eventually had the deep satisfaction of inciting Aryans to slaugher other Aryans to please the big Jew up in the clouds. Having thus convulsed the whole nation with fratricidal mania, for the profit and spiritual satisfaction of the Jews, the Abolitionists created the atmosphere of crisis and calamity in which the holy men

* Although Lincoln stressed the economic argument in most of his speeches, he was aware that emancipation of the niggers must be followed by their prompt removal from the United States. He actually began to ship them out in 1862, when he had 5000 of them transported to Haiti at a cost of $50 a head. His Emancipation Proclamation begins with a promise to export "persons of African descent," although the proviso "with their consent" was added to placate the Abolitionists, such as Garrison, who had zealously sabotaged the work of the American Colonization Society, and wanted to keep emancipated slaves in this country, since their real purpose, of course, was to use the blacks to inflict suffering and degradation on the white men and women who were the object of the envy and hatred that festered in their diseased minds.

† Helper was rescued from obscurity and almost eulogized by Jan Keown in the National Vanguard, May 1984. I have mentioned here only a few examples. There were in the North, of course, many persons who favored the abolition of slavery without really thinking about it, accepting a view that was popular among their acquaintance. For example, William Dean Howells, a youth of no education except what he picked up as a kind of "printer's devil" in the shops of ephemeral newspapers, saw no reason why he should not accept Abolitionism as part of his first employment, on newspapers that had been established by the new Republican Party (largely financed by Jews) to stir up sedition. Howells gave himself a fair education in later life. On his youth, when, given his native intelligence, he was really underprivileged, see Edwin Cady, The Road to Realism (Syracuse University Press, 1956).

I have tried to indicate concisely the true explanation why the foolish statement, "In God We Trust," first appeared on our coined money and now appears on the scrap metal that has replaced it. Such a drastic innovation, contrary to the spirit and intent of the Constitution, became possible only while the Northern States were in the throes of the homicidal frenzy of their invasion of the South. Such blatant religiosity on coins was at that time prohibited by law, but the righteous sneaked up on the boobs, as usual, by procuring the appointment of a Director of the Mint who was willing to serve them, and then slipped through Congress a bill that ostensibly provided for the coinage of one-cent and two-cent pieces, but, by a tricky little phrase that no one probably noticed at the time, gave God's confederate in the mint the right to design the coins as he pleased. So he put "In God We Trust" on two-cent pieces he minted in 1865, and in that year the notoriously corrupt Republican Congress authorized the use of the motto on three-cent pieces, and this time there was slipped in a clause which made it "lawful" for the Director of the Mint to put on other coins an affirmation of confidence in a god who has never been known to intervene in the affairs of this world. The word 'god' was now taken as referring to Yahweh & Co.

For the rest of the sorry story, including an attempt by Theodore Roosevelt to prevent such defacement of our only really beautiful coins, the gold pieces designed by Saint-Gaudens, see what is called the "Sampler" of the periodical I cited, in which is reprinted an article first published in October 1981.

In an ochlocracy ("democracy"), holy men can almost always put over their schemes. If a politician offends the howling dervishes, he will lose votes; if he behaves reasonably and responsibly, no one will thank him.

Ain't democracy wonderful?

* * * * *

There have been innumerable attempts to extract some bits of historical fact from the tall tales in the Christians' favorite story-book. And such efforts will probably continue into the future, until the subject has lost all interest.

Most myths are folk-tales, more or less innocently created by popular fancy, often poetically adorned for literary purposes or elaborated by a priestly caste to assure or augment their income. Some myths probably sprang from some actual event that was magnified and transformed by the imaginations of the successive tellers of the tale, which we can trace to its origin only by conjectures that can never be more than plausible, even if we can relate them to some scraps of historical or archaeological evidence. Such conjectures, however, become vastly more difficult and precarious when we are dealing with pseudo-historical fiction concocted by the Jews, a race that has always used deceit, imposture, and fraud as other races used spears, swords, and shields, as weapons of conquest. He who would penetrate the multiple layers of fiction, fabrication, and forgery in the Judaeo-Christian legends undertakes a task that would daunt the boldest scholar.

A particularly thorough, systematic, and instructive attempt to ascertain the historical antecedents of the Biblical tales is Dr. Erich R. Bromme's Untergang des Christentums (5 vols., Berlin, 1979-1980), which I have often recommended heartily as a drastic critique that forces its readers to confront and ponder the vast differences between Jewish fictions and the mythologies of races that do not have an innate instinct for predatory deception.

A much less impressive attempt to make some sense of the Bible seems to be attracting some attention in the United States: In Search of God, the Solar Connection, by Michael Centre (San Francisco, Centre Enterprises, 1978). I do not know why this book has apparently attained a sudden vogue in certain circles, but I have been asked by several correspondents to comment on it.

Mr. Centre begins with the truism that superstitions about gods arose from the observation of natural phenomena of which the causes could not be understood by primitive minds. He believes that by far the most important of those phenomena were the luminaries that rule the day and the night, the sun and the moon, which inspired awe and worship of a solar and a lunar divinity, producing two primary religions, heliolatry and selenolatry, which were as incompatible as solar and lunar calendars, so that the religions were reciprocally hostile. That was a primary cause of religious revolutions and wars. (He could have enforced this point by citing historical antagonism between the cults of Marduc and Sin, which was one of the contributory factors in the fall of the Babylonian Empire under its last king, Nabonidus, in 538 B.C.)

Mr. Centre believes that the Jews began to compose the oldest part of their story book a little before 538 B.C., as is likely. (That is the date at which, as Josephus tells us, a passel of Jews who had grown rich on the Babylonians rolled out of Babylon in their luxurious chariots, preceded by bands of their slave musicians and followed by their trains of slaves and a crowd of their own common people, to take possession of the part of Palestine that had been given them by Cyrus the Great. We may be sure that Cyrus was thus rewarding them for their services in spreading sedition to paralyse the Babylonian Empire and in betraying the capital city so stealthily and neatly that he was able to capture its impregnable defenses without fighting. Some have suggested that Cyrus, a sagacious ruler, may also have wished to rid Babylon of its treacherous parasites, but for this there is no evidence at all, and if he did entertain such hopes, he was disappointed, for while a contingent of the strange race flocked to Palestine, the majority remained in Babylon to continue eating on the natives.)

The part of the Bible composed at this early date, probably a few years before 538, was the first five books, the Pentateuch, often absurdly called the "Five Books of Moses." (It could be regarded as the first Zionist production, i.e., an attempt to justify the Jews' claim to Palestine as a "homeland," and it could have been used to impress Cyrus.) Mr. Centre believes that it was compiled, with revisions, from earlier folk tales, which is probable, and that some characters in the story represent persons who had actually lived, notably Joseph and Moses. He focuses his attention on the latter.

The well-known myth that Moses was an infant found adrift in a basket on a river is, of course, only one of the many derivatives of a story that an historical figure, the great Sargon of Agade (c. 2371-2316 B.C.), seems to have invented and told about himself to disguise his plebeian and perhaps disreputable ancestry. Now according to Jewish tradition, the name of Moses (Mōsēs, apparently a contraction of the better form, Mōÿsēs, which corresponds fairly well to the traditional Jewish derivation of the name from Coptic (late Egyptian) mō+oyğe, 'water-saved'; the Hebrew MŠH could represent almost anything) is Egyptian. From this, Mr. Centre reasons, plausibly enough, that the man who devised the Jewish religion was himself an Egyptian, and that the Jews, in their revision of the story, wanted to make him a Jew and so added a version of the Sargon story to explain how an Egyptian could have been really a Jew.

He then looked through Egyptian history for a suitable occasion for such an event. He found it in the religious revolution which, according to the accepted chronology, began in 1379 B.C. with the accession of Akhenaten (Ikhnaton), a half-crazed fanatic and typical idealist who madly tried to impose on the Egyptians a monotheistic heliolatry, and the counter-revolution which triumphed in 1348 with the usurpation of Horemheb (Harmhab). Mr. Centre guesses that Moses was an Egyptian noble of the defeated faction, which had tried to carry on Akhenaten's pernicious religion, and had to flee from Egypt to escape liquidation by Horemheb.

Moses fled to the desert east of Egypt, where he collected the scattered rabble of starveling herdsmen, fugitive criminals, fugitive slaves, robbers, and the like, including some Jews who had earlier been run out of Egypt for subversion. Moses tried to make of the human dregs he thus assembled a fighting force with which he could invade Egypt and overthrow Horemheb. He knew that the only way in which he could weld such disparate rabble into an army was by giving them a common religion to unite them and by posing as an intimate of a god designed to impose on their superstitions. He propagated his messianic gospel to win adherents and then, to convince them that he was indeed the leader chosen by his god, he went up to the summit of a mountain and there, with as many stage effects as he had the resources to produce, he pretended to commune with his deity, and he returned with tablets covered with writing, which was itself mysterious and excited awe in an illiterate crowd. These tablets, he said, were the commands of the god who had appointed him, Moses, the "Lord of Israel." Surviving references to "The Lord" in the Biblical text were originally references to Moses as the divinely-appointed lord and commander of the army he had improvised, and not to the god from whom he pretended to derive his authority.

Moses found in the Jews he had enlisted, his most devoted followers, and so, although as a man of the faction founded by Akhenaten his religion was heliolatry, he, according to Mr. Centre, had to adjust the religion he contrived for his followers to the Jews' tradition of selenolatry, since the various tutelary spirits they worshipped were regarded as satellites of a lunar deity, as is proved by the Jews' adherence to a lunar calendar even today. And as the minister of his compromise religion, he appointed some Jews, called Levites, as his priests. His priests because in Egypt, as in many other lands, a king was regarded as himself divine, the offspring and earthly representative of a principal god and himself destined to become one of the gods after his death, and the king was naturally worshipped together with the god he represented, at least in the sense that he was always associated with that god in the minds of the pious.

Now Moses had undertaken an impossible task. Even though Egypt had been greatly weakened, demoralized, and disorganized by Akhenaten's insane fanaticism and its consequences, Moses could never have defeated an Egyptian army with the rabble he had tried to organize and discipline. He was in essentially the position of Lafitte's famous band of pirates on our Gulf coast: he could have surprised and captured any outlying town, but he could never have held it against the regular forces that would be sent against him. Moses knew it and had to wait for some opportunity. Perhaps he was hoping for a civil war in Egypt that would give him a chance to intervene, but that chance never came.

It is probable that Moses, like Mahomet, had some difficulty from the first with followers who were sceptical of his claims to divine authority, and with the passage of time disaffection in his band of freebooters grew as he could not keep the extravagant promises he had made to enlist support. The only way in which Moses could prevent his band from disintegrating was by a drastic purge, and it may be that the potentially mutinous element was headed by Egyptians, perhaps his companions when he went into exile, who remained faithful to the cult of heliolatry and longed for the comforts of civilized life. Such, Mr. Centre thinks, was the occasion for the memorable passage in their Holy Scriptures that Christians keep at heart and practice when they can, although they prefer to talk about love and brotherhood, etc.

> Then Moses stood in the gate of the camp, and said, "Who is on the Lord's side? Let him come unto me." And all the sons of Levi gathered themselves together unto him.
> And he said unto them, "Thus saith the Lord of Israel [i.e., Moses, speaking of himself by his title] : Put every man his sword by his side, and go in and out from gate to gate throughout the camp, and slay every man his brother, and every man his companion, and every man his neighbor."
> And the children of Levi did according to the word of Moses; and there fell of the people that day about three thousand men.*

* I quote Exodus 32.26–28 from the King James version, omitting, as does Mr. Centre, the word 'God' after 'Lord' in verse 27; he regards that word, of course, as an interpolation made when 'Lord' was transferred from the dead leader to the god he had invented. The victims of the sudden purge were, it will be remembered, naked according to the Biblical tale; they were, at least, unarmed and easy victims of the armed Levites. That three thousand were killed is not impossible; the figure 23,000, given in the Douai version from which Mr. Centre quotes, in the Vulgate, and in some few manuscripts of the Septuagint, is incredible for an encampment of bandits. The word 'brother' (which is guaranteed by the Septuagint) is curious; since "all the sons of Levi" were the assassins, it cannot be taken literally, and must have been used in the sense in which it designates associates in a cult or conspiracy, as it is now commonly used by some Christians to refer to members of the same sect or congregation.

This coup d'état in the bandit encampment ended the disaffection and solidly reëstablished the authority of Moses, and it also put that authority and power over the band and all future operations entirely in the hands of the Levites. Moses himself was in their hands now: they had been his instrument; he had become theirs. Furthermore, his original problem, that of mounting a successful attack on Egypt, was not only unsolved, but farther than ever from realization with his now diminished forces.

Moses was a failure,, and he eventually disappeared. Perhaps, like Lafitte, he realized that the game was up and departed secretly, taking with him all the gold and other valuables he could lay his hands on. Perhaps, despondent, he wandered off into the desert and committed suicide. Perhaps he died naturally and the Levites averted a crisis and concealed the corpse, giving out a story that their lord would soon return. Or, perhaps, the Levites, finding him no longer useful, disposed of him.

Moses left the Levites with a custom-made religion which they had the cunning to exploit fully. Mr. Centre believes that they used Moses's followers to conquer a part of Palestine, as is told in the Biblical tale. This is improbable. It is most unlikely that that rabble could have taken Canaan from its inhabitants by an armed attack. As the Jews' great apologist in ancient times, Philo Judaeus, had to admit, what probably happened was that the Jews got Canaan by their normal and racial tactic of infiltration and subversion, and then taking over the demoralized and helpless survivors.

Such is the central thesis of In Search of God. With the exception I have noticed, it is an entirely plausible theory, and it is entirely possible that that is what really happened. Mr. Centre's conjectural reconstruction of events would make an excellent novel in the manner of the late Mika Waltari's The Egyptian. It is certainly much more plausible than the incredible yarn in the Bible. But, as I need not tell you, there is no proof that that is what actually happened. There is not even a scintilla of corroborating evidence that is not susceptible of a score of other interpretations. It is only a conjectural explanation of events which are themselves unattested—an ingenious explanation of what may never have happened at all. It is on a par with Robert Graves' Homer's Daughter and Hercules, My Shipmate. But if one understands that that is what the book is, and if one is interested in guesses about the origin of Biblical myths, it is well worth reading, and it would be gratuituous to comment on parts of the book that are irrelevant to the theory that makes it interesting.*

* Perhaps I should warn the readers of this book that, especially in the early part of it, the author plays fast and loose with Egyptian history and religion, and I really do not know whence he derived some of his odd ideas. There was a real religious revolution in the time of Akhenaten, who tried to suppress the worship of all gods except the one he had promoted from obscurity to monotheistic supremacy, but Mr. Centre retrojects that unique episode in Egyptian history into the past and imagines a religious war between the votaries of Osiris, the god of the dead who contributed quite a few elements to the Christians' conception of their deified Jesus, and the votaries of Amen, who was originally a primordial deity. Aside from insignificant local riots, there was no violence in the competition between gods in Egypt. The Egyptians believed in the existence of "millions of gods" (the phrase occurs repeatedly in their sacred writings) and several hundred of these did have established priesthoods. While priests had, of course, a vested interest in the particular god of their temple, they had to compete, as the Christian theologians do in circumstances where no Christian sect can attain the power to murder its competitors, by devising ingenious myths and theological subtleties, and by the especially effective device of giving their god the attributes of his rivals, and often by outright theocrasy. Thus, Osiris, who was primarily the god of the dead and was unique in the Egyptian pantheon because he was a god who had been slain on earth and had risen from the dead, was given various accessory attributes filched from both solar and lunar deities, and it is this merely adventitious borrowing of lunar attributes that enables Centre to imagine that he was a lunar deity and therefore the enemy of a solar god. Amen (whose name, by the way, may possibly, as the author hints, be pronounced constantly by many Christians, who imagine that it means something like "so be it," which cannot be a Hebrew meaning) —Amen, I say, was made a solar deity by being given the attributes of Rā, with whom he was finally consolidated to make a specially high-powered god, Amen-Rā, thought of as being somehow both two and one, just as some Christians like to imagine that Yahweh and Jesus are the same,

John Allegro's The Dead Sea Scrolls and the Christian Myth has just been published in the United States by Prometheus Books in Buffalo ($18.95). It is the distinguished scholar's first comprehensive book on that subject since 1964, when the second edition of The Dead Sea Scrolls was published by Penguin Books.*

though not identical, Amen was also partly amalgamated with Min to give the ithyphallic form of Amen that is featured in Centre's book. What is much worse, the author, who must have been reading some of the mounds of tripe about pyramids, imagines that the pyramids were a kind of solar magic that was part of heliolatry, and that the priests of Osiris, when they had overthrown the kings who were heliolaters, stripped the pyramids of their facings of polished stone to destroy their religious efficacy or symbolism! Nonsense! The Egyptians were afraid of gods, known and unknown, and until the time of an insane king, Akhenaten, no one dared raise his hand against a god. Even the god of the hated Hyksos, Set (who is astonishingly like the Jews' Yahweh), was worshipped in Egypt after the Asiatic parasites had been driven from the country, and no attempt was made to suppress worship of him, although many Egyptians transferred to him their hatred of the Hyksos and made him a Satanic figure in many myths, especially about Osiris and Isis. Indeed, some later Egyptian kings bore names which indicated they especially enjoyed the favor of Set. So the reader should simply disregard Centre's strange fantasies about early Egyptian religion.

* The book by Allegro that is misleadingly, and I would say dishonestly, entitled The Mystery of the Dead Sea Scrolls Revealed, published in England and the United States in 1981, is simply the Penguin volume of 1964, reproduced by photo-offset printing and with its type photographically enlarged. I do not know how many people purchased the book again under its new title, having been given the impression by artful advertising that it was a new work by Allegro. Allegro's most important books between 1964 and 1981 were The Sacred Mushroom and the Cross (New York, Doubleday, 1970) and The Chosen People (London, Hodder & Stoughton, 1971). Allegro naturally speaks of Jews with great circumspection, since he does not wish to be murdered and his publishers do not wish their offices and print shops to be burned by God's Race, which thus destroyed the establishment of the Historical Review Press in England in 1980 and destroyed the Institute for Historical Review in Torrance, California, on the night of 3 July 1984. Yahweh's Master Race naturally has to use terrorism to cow the few Aryans who have not yet been trained to cringe before their masters. Eventually, of course, we shall have real "democracy" with legislation to put such curs in concentration camps, where they can be disposed of without attracting the notice of the rest. In the meantime, the Canadian government is prosecuting in the courts Aryans so wicked they doubt what they are told by their Jewish masters, and Canada has forbidden the importation and sale of Professor Butz's admirable and fundamental work of historical research, The Hoax of the Twentieth Century, on the grounds that such reading is not good for the Aryan boobs and might even start some of them to thinking—a vice which, no doubt, will soon be made illegal.

The first lot of these now famous scrolls was accidentally discovered in 1947 by an Arab boy in a cave in the mountains bordering the Dead Sea. A large number of scrolls were discovered in other caves in the region when the Arab herdsmen found there was a market for them, and many more were found when a systematic search was begun by Western scholars and their agents. A very small proportion of the total was published and translated before the Jews and Christians could take effective action. Then the vast quantity of unpublished scrolls was concentrated in an Institute in Jerusalem and given into the keeping of a committee of Christian and Jewish scholars, learned men who undoubtedly could read the texts and put together the parts of the scrolls that had been broken, but who were also aware of what the documents thus inconveniently discovered would do to the business of Yahweh, Jesus & Co., Inc., if they were ever published. Even without the damning historical information that would be thus disclosed, Jesus's little lambs were showing an alarming tendency to think and to question the authority of the race of shepherds whom Yahweh had appointed to herd them to green pastures and the shearing sheds.

The committee, pretending they were toiling eruditely to prepare the texts for publication, denied even a glimpse of the scrolls to John Allegro and other scholars who were not in the pious conspiracy, but as year after year passed and not even a mouse came forth from the mountain in labor, their task became ever more embarrassing. Eventually, however, they were accorded the succor for which they were waiting.

The Jews, armed, supplied, and financed by the dumb brutes they own in the United States, captured Jerusalem and promptly seized the Institute. That was the greatest of the Jews' victories in that war, but it was all but unmentioned in the press. The Jews promptly discovered that the precious scrolls were being eaten up by some enterprising bacteria that had an appetite for such things; they said they were preserving the scrolls by dumping them into a subterranean vault; and they boasted that no Aryan swine would ever set eyes on those documents again. Christian clergymen throughout the world drew sighs of relief.

Now I am not acquainted with the spooks who bestow powers of prophecy on so many "conservatives," but I venture to predict as likely the perpetration of some sensational archaeological hoaxes in Palestine. It is true that, so far as my limited knowledge extends, archaeologists, even Jewish ones, have, on the whole, thus far done their work honestly. (The scandalous attempt to "prove the truth of the Bible" by lying about the tablets discovered at Ebla was the work of a philologist, and was put down by Professor Matthiae, the archaeologist in charge of the excavations.) Thus far, the attempts to use "Biblical archaeology" in the holy business have been more or less confined to giving the customers elaborate descriptions of such sites as the famous monuments at Petra, the capital of the Nabataeans, established in the fourth century B.C., and implying or claiming that they somehow illustrate the Biblical myths. But it is too much to expect that archaeology will remain unpolluted by the infection that has produced "scientists" (i.e., persons who have been trained in the techniques of some branch of research, but have remained ignorant of either the methods of scientific thought or the ethics of learned inquiry) who irresponsibly use their academic or institutional positions to peddle "creationism" to the unwary, and will even go so far as to claim they have "proved the authenticity" of even so obvious a fake as the "Holy Shroud."*

I do not expect the vendors of righteousness to undertake anything so ambitious as manufacturing a few pieces of Noah's Ark or inscribing the tablets that Moses should have brought down from the mountain after the wonderful interview at which he had the privilege of beholding and adoring Yahweh's buttocks, but the ruins of many nations are still buried in the soil of Asia Minor, and it would be easy to discover the tomb of some early potentate, preferably but not necessarily Semitic, and, with a little judicious retouching, identify it as, for example, the tomb of Jesus (called "Joshua" in Christian Bibles) who led his predatory horde of bandits to the conquest of Canaan. That would pep up the piety of many True Believers. That is merely an offhand example. The number of hoaxes that could be perpetrated to establish the Truth of God's Word is limited only by the ingenuity of the promoters, and I think it not unlikely that they will soon be inspired to go to work in earnest.

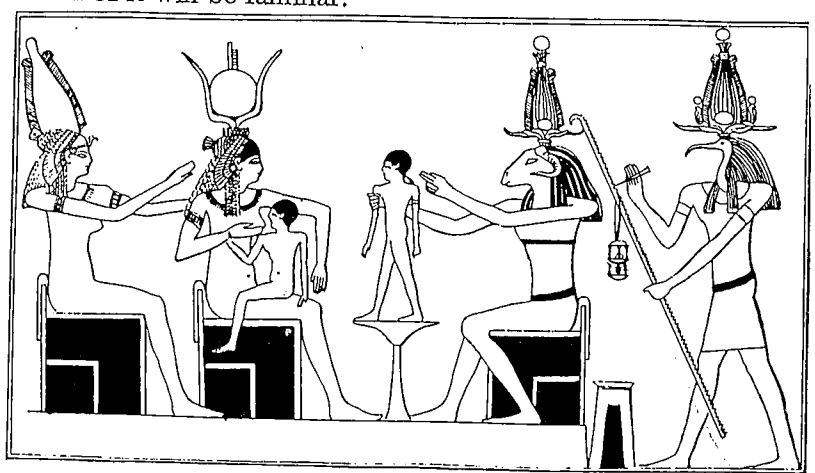
* You need only a modicum of common sense to know that the "Holy Shroud" was manufactured in the workshop of some enterprising merchant of relics in the late Middle Ages, but if you want the details, see Joe Nickell's Inquest on the Shroud of Turin (Buffalo, Prometheus Books, $15.95).

"Creation Scientists" are pepped up these days by their success in bluffing and bribing the legislature of Louisiana into inflicting "balanced treatment" on the unfortunate children of that state. They claim, of course, that they are not violating the Constitutional prohibition of use of the state to promote a religion, because they are not trying to slip any particular cult into the public schools. All creation stories, they aver, will be given equal treatment. The claim is absurd on the face of it because there are too many stories of that kind, but we may at least expect equal treatment of a few of the better ones, which are certainly as plausible and "scientific" as the well-known tale in the Jew-book about Yahweh's bungling creation of Adam, and his disastrous mistake in reusing one of Adam's spare ribs.

Here is an impressive picture of a Creator at work, and it is one that should have a great appeal for Christians, to whom much of it will be familiar.



The god Khnemu fashioning the body of one of the Ptolemies on his potter's wheel.

Here you see a man being fashioned on a potter's wheel by a god who, more diligent and conscientious than old Yahweh, is a true artist and makes each of his creations an individual and unique product of his expert handiwork. He is also more just, for if the world becomes too wicked to please him, he will just stop making men and women and the race will become extinct, with no need to take the trouble of producing a Deluge or all the pyrotechnic horrors so lovingly described in the Christians' Apocalypse.

On the right, you see the god Thoth, the celestial book-keeper, who is recording the new creation on his tally-stick. He

by
Charles E. Weber, Ph.D.

With regard to the value of third parties in the United States from the viewpoint of Aryans, I feel that I must express some opinions which differ from those expressed in "Ballot Box 1984: The Total Sham" (Liberty Bell, June, 1984, pp. 4 and 49).

In a purely two-party situation, obviously, it takes only 51% of the votes to win an election. For that reason neither party can afford to ignore the appearance of a third party which might compete with it for votes, even though the third party might have a potential of receiving only 3% to 5% of the votes. In a close election a third party can thus exert a strong influence. A vote for a third party with such a potential which defends the rights and welfare of Aryans is by no means a wasted vote as far as the Aryan voter is concerned. This is all the more the case when the two major parties are close to each other with regard to ideology and practice.

We American Aryan voters should pay little attention to the political situations in countries like Sweden and Germany, where there is still a high degree of racial homogeneity. We have little to learn from them. Our situation is a quite different one. It is that of the majority group in the United States which has been forced up against the wall by the shrewdness of minority politicians and traitors to our race who now seem willing to do anything for the votes of racial minorities.

In 1933, Roosevelt and the Jewish office holders and advisors who were playing a huge rôle in the shaping of his policies started a new era in this country. Roosevelt & Co. recognized for the first time and with a shrewd cynicism what political potentials were inherent in the graduated income tax, which Marx had recommended at the end of the Communist Manifesto of 1848 and which became a reality in the United States in 1913, albeit a reality of modest proportions at first. Nothing could be more encouraging to the growth of governmental economic intervention than the graduated income tax. This tax means that a voter who pays little or nothing in income taxes has no less power at the voting booth than a man who pays a huge tax on an income commensurate with his accomplishments and his economic and social responsibilities. Under such circumstances the majority of voters can be easily convinced by power-hungry politicians that they will benefit more from massive governmental intervention in the economy than they will suffer from taxation. In a two-party situation, we repeat, it takes only 51% of the votes to win.

From a biological point of view, the graduated income tax can hardly fail to have a dysgenic effect on a population, as the declining scholastic aptitude test scores seem to be telling us.

Over a half century has passed since Roosevelt & Co. brought about a group of social and economic changes which were strongly reinforced during World War II and which are still very much in effect. Both of our major parties now follow Roosevelt's interventionist policies to a greater or lesser extent. It is up to the Aryan voters to determine which of the two major parties pursues policies that are of greater benefit to them and thus to the country as a whole. The Aryan voter must never become so thoroughly demoralized that he wastes his precious chance to vote, even if the difference in the two strongest parties are of modest proportions. Those differences, even if moderate, must be weighed carefully by the Aryan voter and he must vote accordingly.

Looking back over the last half century, it should become quite apparent that in our American racial situation heavy governmental intervention has proved to be a serious disadvantage to the Aryan components of the American population. We need only consider the relative demographic decline of American Aryans to be convinced of this. I am more than a bit doubtful when Milton Friedman tells us that the middle class American has an advantage from Social Security because he lives longer than persons of the lower classes. If participation in Social Security were made voluntary, in all probability few Aryan earners would elect to participate in it. For most Aryans, Social Security does nothing which private insurance companies could not do much better and less expensively under the pressure of laws which punish the violation of contracts and under the pressure of competition amongst insurance companies, which can offer a great variety of retirement plans.

Monetary questions are also of great importance to the Aryan voter. One of the pivotal events in American economic history was the abandoning of the monetary stability which the gold standard afforded in 1934.* The dissociation of the monetary unit from the precious metals (first gold and later silver) was a measure which, in this instance too, was connected with the Marxist graduated income tax. If money consists only of paper notes that can be printed in infinite quantities for practically nothing, a steady inflation can only have the effect of ever higher income taxes as a percentage of gross national product. This can take place without even the slightest change in the tax laws as a result of the graduated nature of the income tax. The resulting increase in the redistributive rôle of government can only be a general disadvantage to the Aryan citizen. Monetary stability, which in practice is probably unobtainable without a monetary rôle of the precious metals, is characteristically of advantage to the Aryan. Inflation is a factor which enhances Jewish power and influence, as the European experience of the 1920s would seem to indicate.

The next time an Aryan voter faces an extra school levy or any other higher taxes for "public" education, he should ask himself if governmentally supported (and hence governmentally controlled) education is really an advantage to his race.

It is unduly pessimistic to think that things cannot be changed by working within the present constitutional framework. What is needed is a strong will to insure a bright future and biological survival of the precious, but now declining, Aryan component of the population of the United States. If there is no such will, there can be no way. That will can and must be created by information and by education of Aryans in a direction that will restore their pride, which has been severely impaired by the most insidious and sophisticated of methods, such as the deprecating caricatures of Aryans on Jews' television (e.g., Archie Bunker and "Dallas.")

If we Aryan voters are going to change things in our favor, we must think of third parties as an ultimate threat to politicians who pay no heed to our welfare and who take our votes for granted just because they make some little concessions to us once in a while. Remember, if third parties take or even just threaten to take several percentage points of the whole vote, they can play an important rôle in shifting the behavior and principles of the two major parties.

CHURCH & CAPITAL

As he was entering Jerusalem, preparing to announce his kingdom,, Jesus came riding on an ass (somewhat uncomfortable, but innocently disarming—the first clerical subterfuge!). Ever since then, the Church has preached Poverty. But has it practiced poverty? Let's take a look at the intricate maze of clerical entanglements in the world of finance.

Practically right from the start, the Christian leaders robbed pagan temples of their treasures. The institutional church's efforts at converting (read: believe it or be killed!) our forefathers were also characterized by unheard of robbery as well as murder. All the death verdicts of the Augsburg Bishopric (previous to the so-called Peace of Augsburg in 1555) ended with the formula: "All our property shall go to the treasury of his princely majesty, the right reverend father Marquard, Bishop of Augsburg and Prior of Bamberg."

One of the most tragic examples of clerical financial cunning and one of the best ways they would make fools of our ancestors, occurred at the death bead. Before a priest would perform the Sacrament of Extreme Unction he would graphically depict all the horrorful things that will befall the hapless peasant because of unatoned sins. But, lucky for the poor old man, the priest would promise to say many masses for him—providing, of course, that he be endowed with some earthly remembrance ("Oh, an acre or so will do!"). The uneducated peasant, frightened at the prospect of shovelling coal into a bottomless furnace while being taunted by weird beings was only too glad to put his X on a sheet of paper, promising the priest everything—even his wife's share of the property! Over a period of years, the Church practically became the owner of half of Europe.

In Europe today, the churches are supported in various ways by the governments, particularly in the West. Outright grants, 'clerical welfare funding,' and other taxes levied support the Church with billions of dollars. With so much, what does the Church do? Give it to the poor? No, it invests in all sorts of enterprises regardless of the 'moral' character of the firm. A good example is the Italian clothing company Jesus Jeans. This business, owned by the Vatican, produces sexy jeans and similar items; its advertising is highly erotic. Yet, the same religion that tells its members to be 'pure of heart,' sees nothing wrong in selling 'impure of heart' wares to the public!

The financial portfolio of the Roman Catholic Church makes Rockefeller look like a ragged pauper. The following list is but a small sample: a goodly share of US Steel, Sharon Steel, Bethlehem Steel, General Motors, Prudential Life, McDonnel-Douglas Aviation. The Jesuits own 51% of the Bank of America. Of course, the Vatican also has controlling interests in many European companies as well. It virtually monopolizes the banking world in Italy; it has large shares of Fiat, the automobile manufacturer, Alitalia, and 90% of the Italian steel industry. In West Germany, the Catholic Church is the Insurance Magnate (three large companies), plus BASF, Siemens & Halske, Hamburg Electric Power (in the Protestant North, no less!), and many other large companies.

While the Church constantly pleads in the well-to-do countries that their citizens should help the poor, unfortunate people of the 'underdeveloped' nations, the financial arm of the Church is the actual owner of some of the worst violators of human dignity in the Third World; the zinc pits of Bolivia are just one example. To be sure, the Church does spend some of its take for good causes, but when one considers the astounding wealth of the Church and compares it to the philosophical message, "Sell what you have, give it to the poor and come follow me!", the realization of the hypocritical attitude of the Vatican emerges with full force. Selected individuals within the Church will argue that money is needed to finance its work; this may be so, but it doesn't jibe with the Church's own teachings, "Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth . . .; for where your treasure is, there will your heart also be" (Math. 6:19 & 21).

It is obvious that the Church fathers do not follow their own teachings: after two thousand years of Christianity, the hypocrisy is as bad as it was when St. Mathew said about the scribes and Pharisees that "they bind heavy burdens and grievous to be borne and lay them on men's shoulders; but they themselves will not move them with one of their fingers . . . Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites, for ye make clean the outside of the cup and the platter, but within they are full of extortion and excess . . ." (Math. 23:4 & 25). □

The following article was originally given as a lecture and was subsequently published in the series, Forschungen zur Judenfrage (Studies on the Jewish Problem). It was taken from the second volume of the series, which was published by the Hanseatische Verlagsanstalt in Hamburg in 1937. It is the second article by its author to appear in English translation in the Liberty Bell. The first translated article by Baron Otmar von Verschuer (1896-1969) appeared in the August-September, 1983, issue of the Liberty Bell under the title, Racial Biology of the Jews, which had originally appeared in the third volume of Forschungen zur Judenfrage. (For further biographical details on Verschuer and the contents of the series, see the introduction and conclusion of this translation.)

The present article is of interest because it reveals the German thinking on the Jewish problem and the research objectives pertaining to the problem during the earlier years of the National Socialist period. Together with the article by Verschuer mentioned above and another article by the distinguished anthropologist Eugen Fischer (The Racial Origin and Earliest Racial History of the Hebrews, Liberty Bell, August, 1984), this article is one of the three articles (out of over fifty articles in the whole series) having primarily to do with the racial and biological aspects of the Jewish problem as seen by outstaning German authorities on them at the time. Most of the other articles in Forschungen zur Judenfrage are concerned with historical, literary, theological, economic, and demographic aspects of the Jewish problem.

Verschuer's article appeared shortly after the promulgation of the "Blood Protection Law" of 15 September, 1935, to which reference is made toward the end of the article. This law defined German citizenship along racial lines and the legal position of Jews living in Germany at that time. One of the functions of the law was the definition of the status of the rather many persons living in Germany who were only partly of Jewish extraction. Persons of such mixed ancestry were designated as mixed to the first degree if one parent were Jewish and mixed to the second degree if one grandparent were Jewish.

One of the most notable features of this article is Verschuer's repeated insistence that the policies of the German government with respect to Jews were not based on any evaluations of Jews with regard to their inferiority or superiority in relation to other ethnic groups. The basis of these policies, he points out, was the desire to preserve the genetic and biological basis of German civilization and cultural life. At the very end of Verschuer's article he explains why he feels that this basis is worth preserving.

Nearly a half century has passed since the publication of this article. During that time demographic developments in the United States have become an ever-greater threat to the preservation of the racial and biological basis of American cultural and economic life. During that time, too, thinking and research on racial matters have been beclouded, twisted, and perverted by anthropologists and sociologists who have little sympathy for, or even an active hostility toward, the majority racial elements of the American population. Their writings and pronouncements have had a profound effect on American education, law enforcement, immigration policies and economic life. Perceptive, patriotic, and responsible Americans cannot avoid sensing that these aspects of American life are deteriorating so severely that the future of their nation is jeopardized.

To a considerable extent American "thinking" on racial and eugenic questions has been dominated in recent decades by a frame of mind which rejects emotionally, irrationally, and uncritically all policies on racial matters which were current in National Socialist Germany just because they were denigrated by a constant and presently continuing barrage of propaganda against all aspects of National Socialism, although it can be documented that there were American and other foreign influences (e.g., publications sponsored by Henry Ford in 1920-1922) which had a considerable effect on National Socialist policies.

Today it is refreshing to read Verschuer's article with the awareness that it represented the genuine concern of a distinguished scientist with the future of his country, a concern that has become all to scarce in our present-day United States.

What Can The Historian, The Genealogist And The Statistician Contribute To The Investigation Of The Biological Aspect Of The Jewish Problem?

Baron Otmar von Verschuer

Let me begin with a little experience that came to my mind while I was preparing this paper. Thirteen years ago, in the spring of 1924, I had given a talk on racial hygiene [i.e., eugenics] at a student study camp which was sponsored by a nationalist student organization. During the subsequent, animated oral discussion, which was also continued in written form, a leader of the nationalist student organization expressed the following idea: He was struck by the fact that anthropological science had hitherto failed to demonstrate the racial inferiority of the Jews. He believed that such a determination was necessary for a justification of anti-Semitism. I replied as follows: Anti-Semitism is primarily a national and political struggle whose justification and necessity, apart from any value judgement of the Jewish race, evolve from the threat to our national existence [Volkstum] from Jewry. A government with a nationalist orientation had to make its highest duty the preservation of our national existence. For that reason the German nationalist struggle should direct its effort primarily against Jewry because German national existence is threatened in a special way by an excess of Jewish foreign influence.

Just because we put the matter of national existence in the foreground does not mean that the importance of race should be minimized. This importance becomes clearest when we approach the solution to the Jewish problem. It is not the first time in history that a foreign nationality has established itself in the geographical area of our nation. I simply point out the establishments of the Romans and the reception of the Huguenots, who had been driven out of France on account of their religion. However, there is no longer any Roman or French national component [Volkstum] within our nation. Those foreigners and their descendants have given up their language and allowed the cultural aspects they brought with them to assimilate in the culture of their host population. They thus gradually became components of this nation.

Many people have dreamed of a similar solution of the Jewish problem as well. Quite aside from the fact that the mutual relation between Jews and Germans was an entirely different one, just in the ethnic sense alone (language, religion, history, attitude toward the host population and its culture, giving up the previous nationality), the racial question is added as an
p. 217 essential factor. Jews and Germans are quite different from each other with regard to their racial origins. The racial homeland of the Germans lies in northern and central Europe, while the homeland of the Jews is located in the Near East and Arabia. The basic racial component of the Germans is the Nordic and Falid [fälische] races with additional components of the Alpine, Dinaric and, to a lesser extent, the Mediterranean races. The basic racial component of the Jews is the Near Eastern and Orientalid races. In addition, admixtures of a great variety of other races have entered this basic component partly at a very early time and partly during later migration.

The absorption of Jews into our people would thus not simply be a blending of another nationality and another culture into the German culture, but a simultaneous incorporation of a foreign racial heritage which has hitherto not been present at all in central Europe. In the judging of this last question, the advances of anthropological and genetic research are now certainly of the very greatest importance.

Racial differences are genetic differences. Hereditary tendencies are developmental forces which determine the physical, mental, and character development of the human being in the original cell of every organism, within certain limits. These forces are transmitted from generation to generation in accordance with laws discovered by Mendel [1822-1884]. Aside from rare mutations occurring under certain influences, the special characteristic of every individual hereditary tendency is maintained without change. A person can give up the culture of the people of his homeland and enter into the cultural sphere of another people. In some cases he can become a member of another nation. It is impossible, however, for a person to give up his race in order to assume another race. Every attempt toward this end is condemned to failure because it is opposed to the laws of heredity which are well-known to us today.

The nationalist government has shaped for itself the instrument of its national biological policy in the present governmental concern with heredity and race on the basis of the findings of genetic biology and racial hygiene. There are measures for the preservation of our racial character in addition to measures which serve to preserve genetic health by the elimination of severely pathological genetic material [*] and the maintenance of good genetic qualities by the encouragement of the reproduction of persons who are genetically healthy. The avoidance of any racial admixture is the clear and simple imperative. Within the framework of this concern for race in the narrower sense, for us Germans the discussion of the biological aspect of the Jewish problem is of prime importance. On a statistical basis alone, other admixtures of foreign races are a minor consideration.

The racial policy of our government has as its objective the preservation of the racial heritage of our people as the biological requisite for German national existence and German civilization. This positive attitude with regard to our national existence can have no bearing on opinions regarding the superiority or inferiority of a race foreign to us. For that reason, we likewise reject a foreign admixture of Jews as well as mixed marriages with Negroes and Gipsies, or for that matter, with Mongolids or South Sea islanders. Our national attitude toward the biological problem of the Jewish question is, accordingly, completely independent of all observations which have to do with strengths or weaknesses, good or bad characteristics of Jews. We can quietly wait for the results of such investigations. They can alter nothing with regard to our basic attitude.

Our position on the race question is rooted in the known facts of genetics; our position on the biological Jewish question [is based] on what we know about the foreign racial nature of the Jews. All research projects related to that are therefore of essential value. We possess sufficient datan on the bodily and psychic characteristics of the Jews of the present and the past.

[* Similar eugenic measures were by no means a National Socialist innovation. A number of European countries and rather many states of the United States had enacted laws providing for them long before 1933. — Translator.]

The anthropological picture is a rather clear one. We are also well informed about the origin of the Jewish people. We likewise see the roads these people have traveled since their dispersal. There is perhaps much to be done with regard to particular questions in order to extend and supplement that which has hitherto become known. Above all, the biologist is interested in the investigation of the question as to what extent the Jews, particularly the Jews who have immigrated into Germany, have absorbed other racial components from their host populations during the past 2,000 years. That is the case because the absorption of such other blood could have changed the original racial makeup. The great difference between the Ashkenasim, with a stronger Near Eastern component, and the Sephardim, with a stronger Orientalid and Mediterranean component, is well-known and emphasized by the Jews themselves.

The further research on the racial makeup of the Jews is primarily the task of the anthropologist, the physician and the psychologist. On the other hand, the services of those versed in historical science are primarily required for the clarification of the racial history of the Jews.

An area which is still investigated to a very slight extent within the framework of the biological problem of the Jewish question is the interbreeding of Jews and non-Jews, i.e, persons of a different racial origin. This is a particular aspect of interbreeding in human beings in general. It is an accomplishment of permanent value on the part of Eugen Fischer that he investigated the consequences of crossing between two strongly different races by employing methods of Mendell's genetic research for the first time in his classical work on the Rehoboth bastards. Only a few rather large investigations of this sort are extant in addition to the work by Fischer (1913) concerning the half-breeds of Boer men and Hottentot women. I shall mention that of Rodenwaldt (1927) on crossbreeds of Europeans and Malays, that of Davenport and Steggerda (1929) on crossbreeds of Europeans and Negroes, that of Dunn (1928) on crossbreeds of Polynesians, Europeans and Chinese, that of Lotsy and Godijn (1928) on crossbreeds of Negroes, Europeans, Hottentots, and Indians, that of Herskovits (1930) on Negro crossbreeds in America, that of Williams (1931) on crossbreeds of American Indians and Europeans, and finally that of Tao (1935) on the children from marriages of Chinese and Europeans. As you see, there is no work amongst these having to do with crossbreeds of Jews and non-Jews. There are probably numerous individual observations, but a rather large investigation and comprehensive disquisition are lacking. Initially the scientific foundations had to be prepared, for one thing; the knowledge of the laws of heredity of the particular bodily and psychic characteristics of the human being. In the field of genetic psychology the research is still quite in a state of flux with regard to basic questions, while in the case of inheritance of bodily characteristics the basic laws are known to a considerable extent and simply have to be cleared up as to many details. Further, there was the matter of investigating the phenomenon of racial crossbreeding on a quite general genetic-biological basis. It is no more than obvious that such a research turned to the most extreme racial crossings at first (as, for example, between Negroes and Whites) because the bastardization phenomena are still simplest to investigate in the children and grandchildren of such crossings in view of the great racial differences. But today we have made so much progress that research can also be directed toward cases of crossbreeding which are more difficult to analyse. Such a genetic-biological and anthropological investigation consists of an exact determination of the bodily and psychological characteristics of the racially different parents and of the children who issued from the mixed marriage and their further descendants.

In the course of carrying out the legislation related to racial policy, all the living people who are of mixed ancestry of the first and second degree in the meaning of the First Regulation for the Carrying Out of the Reich Citizenship Law [Reichsbürgergesetz] will be identified to an ever-greater extent and finally nearly completely. [Persons of mixed ancestry of the first degree were such persons who had one Jewish parent, while those of the second degree were those who had one Jewish grandparent. —Translator.] Numerous data are being obtained concerning these persons of mixed ancestry and even concerning biological facts, especially in the case of every petition for permission to marry. Even if I do not expect any all too great scientific results from such a collection of statistics of observations entered in the documents on the petitions for permission to marry (because the observers are too varied to guarantee a uniformity and basis of comparison of the findings), the attempting of such a project should not be forgone. I expect more from a methodical collection of all material which can be gathered about mixed marriages that have occurred in Germany between Jews and Germans. In this connection it is important to observe the following: What kind of people entered into the mixed marriages, in the case of the Germans as well as that of the Jews? Can the genetic material of these people be deduced, perhaps, from their own life and from that of the parents and other family members? Which characteristics are manifested in the case of the children and grandchildren of these persons of mixed ancestry? In what way do these characteristics differ from those of the German families, on the one hand, and of the Jewish families, on the other hand, which have crossbred with each other? It is no more than obvious that any such research must avoid generalizing from individual observations and that the attempt must be made to derive more general laws from statistical summations.

I wish to select just one example at this point. In the semi-Gotha pocketbooks [see the bibliography at the end of this article] many hundreds of aristocratic families are listed in which mixed marriages with Jews or Jewesses have occurred. In many cases it would not be difficult to determine if, and in some cases in which way, a family tradition showing typical success in life was changed. Have, for example, the previous careers of landowner, officer or official been abandoned?

In all such investigations the primary consideration is a collecting of the extant material with a maximal exactitude. The biologist is not suited to carry out this part of the work. He is quite dependent on the collaboration of the psychologist, the historian and the genealogist. The source material deposited in a great variety of archives should not be just collected but also be evaluated in an historical and critical manner. Only after this prelimary archival work can the statistician undertake the evaluation with the objective of obtaining biological data. The path of this research is a long and tedious one. At this point, too, I shall mention just one example: My collaborator, Dr. Mess, had already begun with a collecting of all baptisms of Jews in Frankfurt am Main when I took him into my institute. For this purpose he examined, in addition to the baptismal books, the records of the poorhouse, of the orphan home, of the workhouse, of the tax office [Kastenamt], and of the hospital office, the church records, the citizenship books, the petitions, the city council records, and the records of the mayor's office. But this compilation of the baptisms of Jews is only the very beginning. To this must be added a methodical collection of the life data of all descendants from mixed marriages with Jews, which is then followed by the comparison with corresponding German population groups.

One last question from the group of biological problems of the Jewish question should be examined here. To what extent has a permeation of the German ethnic group by the foreign racial heritage of Jews already taken place? How large is the number of people who have crossed over from the Jewisg group to the German group and how many descendants have they left behind?

There are only incomplete data on the number of baptisms of Jews in Germany. Mess found 175 baptisms of Jews in Frankfurt am Main down to the year 1806 (information given to me personally). I have not been able to find a number for the Reich as a whole. However, baptisms of Jews are a rarity in the seventeenth century, but a bit more common in the eighteenth century. According to Levita (quoted from Gutmann), 224,000 are supposed to have been baptized in Prussia during the nineteenth century. However, this number appears to be too high. During the years 1901 to 1918 approximately 400 to 500 joined the Protestant Church in Germany every year (according to Gutmann). According to the data from Samter, 9,149 Jews were baptized in the period 1880 to 1903. In Berlin alone there were 2,977 from 1872 to 1903.

As yet no reliable data on the number of racially mixed marriages in Germany can be given. The statistics have been concerned only with marriages of persons with different religions. Their number is considerable enough and it has kept climbing. At the beginning of the century every twelfth Jew entered a mixed marriage. In Prussia, from 1875 to 1903, there was a total of 9,578 Jewish-Christian mixed marriages. In the years 1901 to 1924 there were approximately 28,500 mixed Christian-Jewish marriages in Germany. In the years 1901 to p.221
1933 there were 42,452. The vast majority of these mixed marriages were in large cities. In Electoral Hesse [Kurhessen; the northern part of Hesse called Hessen-Kassel before 1803], Euler found that mixed marriages very seldom occurred amongst Jews living in the countryside.

The depressing reality of the large number of Jewish-German racially mixed marriages is somewhat limited as to its racial-biological effects on our people by the fact that the number of children from mixed marriages is somewhat below average. Indeed, it is not even sufficient to replace the parents.* This

* In particular instances, nevertheless, the progeny of baptized Jews is extraordinarily large. Thus, Mess (information given to me personally) could ascertain 1,200 descendants of Daniel Liechtenstein, who was self-eradication, however, has not led to a decline in the number of persons of mixed ancestry, as a result of the increasing number of mixed marriages. It was not until the Blood Protection Law [Blutschutzgesetz] of 15 September, 1935, that there has been a guarantee that henceforth no persons of mixed ancestry of the first degree will be born in Germany. [Here we should note that a number of states of the United States had laws against miscegenation long before 1935. They were in effect until 1968, when the Supreme Court declared them unconstitutional. — Translator]

Our present legislation with regard to racial policy gives us the foundations for determining the number of persons of mixed ancestry of the first and second degrees. It will also insure, most importantly, that the number of persons of mixed ancestry will keep declining and thus that the racial separation of Germans and Jews will become a complete one.

As a representative of the field of genetic biology and racial hygiene, I could only point out desiderata and requisites for the investigation of the biological aspect of the Jewish question. I could only hint at what the biologist expects from the historian and the archivist, the genealogist, and the statistician. However, I cannot judge in detail how this contribution can be worked up and what means and paths are the most favorable ones. In these questions I request your individual suggestions. The representatives of quite varied scientific fields who have convened in the Reich Institute for the History of the New Germany are the best interdisciplinary group for showing the ways which are practical and promising for the investigation of the biological aspect of the Jewish question. May the Reich Institute for the History of the New Germany succeed in finding the suited research persons and in equipping them with the necessary funds and auxiliary personnel in order to make progress on the questions discussed here.

In the framework of the investigation of the biological aspect of the Jewish question I have designated as the most urgent task the investigation of the extent and results of racial crossbreeding between Jews and Germans. Finally, however, I should like to emphasize expressly that we do not have an aboslute need of such research as a basis for our racial policy. It is not possible to reproach our racial policy for being premature because we still know too little about the results of interbreeding of Jews and non-Jews. I herewith return to the beginning of my observations by adding that we reject the interbreeding as such of persons of German extraction with persons of a foreign race, regardless not only of the value judgement of the foreign race in question, but p 222 also regardless of the evaluation of persons of mixed ancestry resulting from the crossing. This is because it is scientifically indisputable that the breeding of a foreign race into an ethnic group leads to the alteration of the biological foundations which are in keeping with the character of this ethnic group and from which its own culture has developed. Alteration of the genetic-biological and racial foundation of a nation must also have as a result the alteration of its ethnic character and culture; whether in a favorable or unfavorable way can only seldom be predicted. The political and cultural history of our people provides examples of bravery, heroism and loyalty, of intellectual accomplishments in sciences and arts and deeds of religious faith which remain a model for all times. Care of the genetic health and the preservation of the racial nature of our nation will make it possible that leaders will be born in our nation and that they will find a loyal following.

Comrade Dietz: 5 May 1984

Well, they've done it again! Last time I wrote you, I sent you a picture of the race-mixing Catholics. Not to be outdone, the Lutherans have groveled sufficiently for their head witch doctor, David Preus, to get the "Hall of Fame" award from Temple Israel. Having been baptized and confirmed in the A.L.C., it fills me with shame to see how the Lutheran churches have ignored the warnings of Dr. Martin Luther. It is becoming increasingly obvious that the churches deserve no loyalty from White people.

Temple Israel to honor Preus

David Preus, presiding bishop of the American Lutheran Church, has been elected to Temple Israel's Minnesota Hall of Fame and will receive the award at Temple Israel at 8:15 p.m. Friday. Rabbi Max Shapiro will present the award.

Heil Hitler!

Dear George: 12 May 1984

The Jew IRS finally condescended to send me back a little of the money they stole from me last year; Paying taxes is bad enough, but I would cheerfully pay twice the amount if the money wasn't being used to wage a war of extermination against me and my race; every dollar stolen from me fills me with rage. Anyway, I finally have enough money to order the following books. . .

In ancient times, when some robber baron or king sold the Jew a monopoly, the Jew usually had to pay an enormous sum for the privilege. Here in America, Congress, in 1913, gave away this privilege for nothing [The Federal Reserve Act!]. No wonder Jews love Democracy!

A year ago, there was a public comiseration in the press that an important official like Paul Volcker got a mere $66,000 a year in salary. Hell! In a sane country, he would be required to PAY billions for the position! Indeed, he would be lucky to escape being executed like Jew Suess!

At present, the Jew banks are actually raising interest rates in an election year; an unheard of action and one that clearly shows that the President has no control over the Federal Reserve. Latest indications I get are that the mideast crisis has been rescheduled for June. Just because one day or another passes, don't think the mideast war is called off. The invasion of Lebanon was originally scheduled for 1980, but the failure of Reagan's assassination caused it to be postponed until 1982 before a suitable pretext could be faked up. The current situation is much the same .

I have to agree with Mr. W.F. of Washington about LaRouche. His organization is one of those that has been set up to mislead Whites and waste their efforts in futility. My point was that LaRouche himself is not a Jew and is open to reason if the encrustation of Jew-Socialist propaganda can be broken. His fundamental error is that he really believes all the "all races are equal" nonsense, and the theory that differences between peoples are economic. This leads him to such nonsense that the only thing needed to raise the niggers to civilization is economic development, by the White man, of course. I think LaRouche is close to seeing through these Jew lies, but I fear if he ever does, he will be killed or forced out of his own party. Unless you are endlessly alert for Jew treachery, you will be zapped every time.

In this context, your article on "Soviet Anti-Semitism" was very timely. I will believe that Russia has freed itself of the Jewish curse when I see the Jews stripped of their fat jobs and packed off to outer Mongolia, and when the Russians give the Arabs weapons to match those Israel is getting from the JEW-S.A. Until then, all the stories about Soviet "persecution" are suspect. Hell! They tell people in other countries how they are persecuted here in the Jew-S.A.

Sincerely,
S.T., New York State

Dear Fellow Patriots—Freedom Fighters:

I've been a John Bircher since 1969; at first I was convinced that the JBS was the only EFFECTIVE way to shackle the Beast with the two left hands. I was wrong; they HAVE given MUCH truth which we can't possibly get from the Jewish media.

By sheer happenstance, I came upon the electrifying news that Col. Jack Mohr of Bay St. Louis, MS. had given up on the lace-pantied twits. I called him for verification and reason. He had, and the reason was his absolutely unyielding dedication to Truth, unraped by Zionist Jewry.

I've paid my last dues, and anyone looking for a sure-thing gamble can safely bet their last funny-money Jew-Fed dollar that they [JBS] will know exactly why. There is no doubt whatever in my mind but that the JBS has ALSO been infiltrated by the artful Talmudic superbugs.

My ethnic countryman, Mr. Joseph Dilys of 3607 So Union Ave., Chicago IL. (my hometown, incidentally), who has more than paid his dues as a no-quarter-asked-nor-given patriot, sent me enough literature regarding the Talmudic termites to infuriate even me into a raging lion. (Mr. Dilys is without a doubt one of your best, if not THE BEST, salesmen of yours.)

Enclosed is a moneyorder for the above bookorder. If I am short, please let me know, but please don't delay the shipment. The only time I WILL cheat my fellow patriots is when I become pregnant and the "Chozzen Pipple" convince me that the Easter Bunny is the Messiah!

Let's put the bastards to flight!

Sincerely,
B.A., Florida

Dear George: 21 May 1984

It was indeed enjoyable to get your cheerful note on an otherwise dreary morning. . . . . I thank God that MEN like you are around to have kept things alive. In my book, you play the major role in the National Socialist Movement.

I am enclosing a photo taken from the San Francisco Chronicle as one more example of the tragedy we call "The American Dream." The time will come when the wheat is separated from the chaff. [See photo on following page.]

Take care and good health; warm regards to your family.

Dear Mr Dietz: 24 May 1984

First, I would like to commend the idea behind your magazine and the issues covered therein. It is superb that some one is willing to take the challenge to clear up the minds once again of the people, namely the Great White Race, and get their thinking back on the right track.

Keep up the good work to the White Race.

Sincerely,
F.W., Arizona

Dear George:

1 June 1984

Thanks for that ',A Legacy of Hate" sheet. Some cheek of the Jews talking about "hate" in others when their entire religion is just one long screech of hatred against the human race. Well, they have always been known for Chutzpah and lying.

Brooke Shields and Michael Jackson: "He's a very good friend of mine and I trust him and he trusts me." (San Francisco Chronicle)

She might have added, 'The White Race—including its pretty trash—shall inherit the earth, according to 'The Church of the Creator.' '

Burton's book, "The Jew, The Gypsy and El Islam," is a real eye-opener. I loved the parts where he quotes the commentaries of Rabbi Caro of Safed on the Talmud. His strictures on medicine have obvisouly been taken as policy by the AMA.

A Jewish physician who wishes to study medicine may attend a Gentile gratuitously, "but he should usually kill such patients while pretending to cure them. This, however, must be attempted only when there is no chance of detection."

This is what now is going on at every hospital in America. I shudder when I pass these places. Next time you go to a Jew doctor, remember that this is the kind of teaching he has been given! I have known about this sort of thing for years, as will anyone who wonders at what is going on in medicine, but I thought it was the result of greed and incompetence. I see now that there is policy behind it.

Another delightful quote:

". . . in speaking especially of Christians, he declares that if the Jewish physician takes his fee without poisoning them it is as the gift to the wicked woman." (Wages of Sin.)

In other words, if the Jew doctor does NOT poison a Goy victim, it is a SIN! I have watched medicine based on this sort of thinking in action for years without realizing that it was planned. I could not believe human beings could be so evil. Did you read that account of Farrakhan's March speech? It has been circulating in this area on cassette tapes like Khomenei's speeches used to. That was the famous "Hymie" speech. The Jewsmedia made a big stink over the "Hymie" threats, they did their usual coverup of the substance of the speech. Farrakhan predicted an all-out racial war and massacre of the White population by 1986! He further said that the nigger "soldiers" in this massacre of the Whites would be street gangs and criminals with whom he is forging links to hasten the great day. Now it is clear why the Liberals want the White population disarmed. It may also mean what I have long suspected, that much of what is called "crime" is really racial war against Whites.

Yours truly,
S.W., New York State

Dear George: 7 June 1984

Enclosed $25 to renew my subscription. That story, "Farewell to a Doomed Nation," is pitiful. I can understand people living in America and Europe not comprehending the nigger problem, but people in South Africa? After Rhodesia? It is amazing how little say the population has in important matters. Civilization seems to come from the top. When the top spots are captured by the Jews and the media, the "nerves" of the boobs are controlled by them, the body politic seems to lapse into insanity and death. It is just amazing that people will go on with "business as usual" till they are wiped out, but that was the case in Rhodesia and has been the case here and in South Africa too. One thing I'd like to comment on, the elections. After the massive fraud we have seen in El Salvador and the U.S. primaries, no one can put any faith into election promises made by a Jew government. Nobody knows what the real count was in the recent South African elections or how many Whites really voted for their own suicide under Jewish mind control. One thing is sure, if the Whites of South Africa go down to exile and slavery without revolt, then the omen for America is ghastly. As Professor Oliver puts it, this will show that we really have lost the will to live and deserve to perish. The Liberals really have a death wish. Let us hope they can fulfill it without taking the rest of us down. Let us help them to their desired demise!

Constant slobbering over "D-Day" 40 years ago. The media are full of D-Day stories, usually always told by Jewish "combat" veterans! Now, there are a few of these, but nowhere near their proportion of the population. The news stories are bound to cover this over. The Jews' actor-president was over in France mouthing platitudes about "freedom," as the Jew conquest of Europe is referred to, and making very real plans for the mideast war and plotting to squeeze more interest payments out of the bankrupts. Forty years have passed and the hate against Hitler is still kept up unabated. That shows whom the Jews fear above all else, and whose ideas are the correct ones for the future, if our world is to have a future. Interestingly, the Japanese Emperor, the contemporary and ally of Hitler, still rules Japan and is allowed to do so without criticism, while Hitler is an entirely different story.

For nearly forty years we have been forced to live with the WWII settlement and total Jew rule. Now that has taken its toll and the world is collapsing into bankruptcy and chaos. There are numerous signs that the WWII agreements are about to collapse as the U.S. has been too undermined to survive as a world power. In the years to come, our race will have to develop strong leaders to survive. It is our part to make sure they are not ignorant of the Jew and are not manipulated as previous rulers have been. The list of rulers who played along with the Jews until it was too late is pitiful. All the Jews have is knowledge and organization. If our race can develop a tenth of what the Jews have, our victory is assured. Without it we will remain helpless.

Yours truly,
T.U., New York

Dear Sir: 7 June 1984

I noticed your name in the Manchester, Connecticut "Journal-Inquirer" of May 23, in a series on Jews in America and particularly on anti-Semitism. They spoke well of "Liberty Bell Publications", reputedly the largest anti-Jew propaganda mill in the United States. Anyway, they mentioned that you distribute bumper stickers, "6 Million Dead Jews? Find Them In Jew-York." I applaud you for your work. I belong to the National Alliance and the NSDAP/AO and have a couple of your publications. My eyes were opened to the Jew, Nigger, and alien menace three years ago and since then I've read all I could on the subject. Please send me an up-to-date list of all your publications.

Thank you,
D.N., Connecticut

Dear Sir: 11 June 1984

I've read three booklets of yours, two of them by Dr. Oliver and the other a translation of an NS article on Jews—and I have been very impressed. Why is it, then, that I've seen no mention of "Liberty Bell" and Liberty Bell Publications in "Spearhead" or "Instauration"?

Anyway, please send me a sample copy of your magazine and your book list. The magazine should be right up my street, providing I can afford it.

Yours sincerely,

Herr Dietz: 13 June 1984

I'm writing because I wanted to thank you for the May 1984 issue of the "Liberty Bell," you sent me. As soon as I save up enough stamps I plan on getting a subscription. I really enjoyed the May issue and I click my heels and give you the Aryan salute for what you are doing for the White Man.

Keep up the good work telling the truth about the yellow-skin Yiddish maggot devil. The Jew is a worse disease than the poison gas from hell. Once again, I salute you, George.

Dear Mr. Dietz: 23 May 1984

I left the U.S.A. because I could not stand living in a colony of World Jewry. I chose to live in Argentina because I thought the Jews did not have much power in that country. This was a great error. In the U.S., where the printed word belongs almost exclusively to the Jews, I was made to believe that the Argentinians were anti-Semites and the Jews were persecuted.

It did not take a long time to realize that this was absolutely untrue The Jews have here as much power and influence as they have anywhere. The Argentinian sheep are as stupid and submissive as the sheep anywhere else.

To give you a sample of the poison the Jews are giving us here, I am sending you a magazine on whose cover the first and most important title is: "The Ashkenazi Jews are Descendants of an Aryan Empire." The article was inspired by Arthur Koestler's book, "The Thirteenth Tribe." I happen to possess and have read this book. The Jew Arthur Koestler does not pretend such an observation, but since his book is not available here, it can be used for any purpose. The readers of the magazine will not start an investigation to find out the truth.

The new "democratic" government makes it easier for the Jews to advance towards the total enslavement of this nation.

I just renewed my subscription to "Liberty Bell" for another year, but I might not be around here for that long.

Sincerely,
H.T., Argentina

Dear George: 25 May 1984

I enjoyed the sheet "Legacy of Hate" you sent. Where is the rest of it, and, if that is what you spread, do spread a little more my way. I thank the Almighty that has sent you; I am honored to know you.

Sincerely,
V.M., California

Dear Mr. Dietz: 12 June 1984

Enclosed please find my contribution of ten dollars. Just received your May "Liberty Bell." Always good to receive your literature. It is like a breath of good, wholesome air as contrasted to that of our Jewish-Third World ambiance we have to put up with here in Trudeau's Soviet Provinces of Canada.

I have just glanced through the leaflet "A Legacy of Hate" by Ernest Volkman, but imagine it to be good reading and will watch out for it at book stores and the main public library here. Incidentally, speaking of our main public library here, it might interest you to know that many "Nazi" books are in circulation there, including "Mein Kampf."

Did you ever glance through the French weekly magazine "Le Figaro"? In it are a half dozen pages each issue dealing with the Vichy side of the story in the years 1940-1944 that shed a balancing light on the guilt attributable to BOTH sides in WWII.

has the head of an ibis and so may be presumed to have a bird-brain, which should commend him to Christians, whose Jesus has ordered them to be "like the birds of the air" with brains that "take no thought for the morrow."

The Creator is Khnemu (Khnum), a specialist in the creation of human beings, who are, as all Christians know, a form of organic life entirely different from other mammals. Khnemu, to be sure, does have the head of a ram, but that merely fits him to be a Good Shepherd and lead the flocks of the Lamb to Green Pastures.

To the left sits the goddess Isis, the Mother of God (Horus), with her divine infant at her breast. She was draped by theologians to become the Virgin, Mother of God (Jesus), who is worshipped in many Christian cults, although their holy men, who had to work hard to fuse three males into one composite, shied at the prospect of amalgamating the sexes to augment their Trinity and resorted to equivocation, denying to poor Mary the social standing of a goddess but authorizing worship of her on the grounds that she now sits at the right hand of Sonny and tells him what to do. (Other Christian sects, to be sure, don't want females in executive positions, and when they had the power, they slaughtered millions of 'Mariolaters' to reprove them for their theological error, while the Jews watched gleefully, delighted by the ease with which they drive the superstitious Aryans to race suicide in Holy Wars and Do-Gooding.)

It is true that Isis was not said to be a virgin, so far as I know, but up in Heaven virginity is a more complicated business than one would suppose.* It may be to the point that Isis conceived

* Virgin goddesses are very popular in religious circles, but divine mysteries must not be judged by natural laws, for gods, by definition, can do much that is impossible for mortals. That is true even in the relatively sober theology of the Graeco-Roman religion. Every educated person, of course, knows about those indomitable virgins, Artemis/Diana and Athena/Minerva, but few know the relatively obscure revelation that Hera/Juno, the wife of Zeus/Jupiter and the mother of Ares/Mars, is also a virgin for an unstated length of time each year after she has taken her annual plunge into the magical waters of the fountain of Canathus. And according to the theologians whose views were mentioned by Aelian, Juno restores her virginity after each act of coitus by bathing in the fountain Burrha. If gods can die and rise from the dead, it is only fair that goddesses can have sexual intercourse and become virgins again, but, so far as I know, this happy idea has not been taken up by Christian theologians, although it would have provided an intelligible explanation how Mary was Horus by Osiris after that god had been slain and before he arose from the dead. She did it by using a mode of sexual intercourse that does not involve physical contact, and that's more than the Holy Ghost was able to do, according to most Christian authorities. And it is only appropriate that Isis, when dressed up as Mary, still bears what is, in all probability, an Egyptian name.*

On the extreme left, behind Isis, sits her sister and co-wife, Nephthys, who, like the sister of Mary, accompanied her to the tomb of the slain god. The two sisters coöperated in reassembling and resurrecting Osiris, a god who, unlike ordinary gods, had both a human and divine nature. That noteworthy characteristic, of course, gave the Christians the idea of attributing a dual nature to the god they made out of a Jewish christ.

This description of the creation of our species, so clearly depicted on Egyptian monuments and so relevant to our culture, will be taught the moppets in Louisiana on a par with the Yahweh-story, if we believe the "creation scientists." Of able to become a virgin again after giving birth not only to Jesus but also to his brothers, who were admittedly engendered by her husband. That Mary's virginity was restored immediately after the birth of Jesus is certified by a Gospel of James, which, although it somehow escaped notice when the "New Testament" was put together, is the most certainly authentic of all, since it was written by Jesus's own uterine brother. According to James, Salome, who visited Mary immediately after the birth of the Saviour, impiously doubted that the mother could still be a virgin and insisted on inserting her finger in Mary's vagina. She found the hymen present, but the organ was so charged with divine mana that Salome's impious finger was burned to a crisp; it was healed when an angel prescribed touching the divine infant as an infallible cure.

* Christian tradition is unanimous in giving the name of Mary to the virgin mother of the incarnate one-third of their god. Mary was a very popular name for Jewish females because, according to the legend, it was the name of the sister of Moses, who may be expected to have had an Egyptian name, since Jewish tradition admits that 'Moses' is an Egyptian name. The female name, at all events, is not Hebrew, but was written in Hebrew as MRYM. This was so vocalized in the first century B.C. that it appears in Greek as Mariam, which became Maria in Latin, whence the English 'Mary.' MRYM most probably represents a syncopation, common when vowels are not written, of the old Egyptian Merut-Ámen, Coptic Merit-Amm, i.e., 'Beloved of Amen,' the great god whom the Egyptians eventually amalgamated with Rā. That would be a good theophoric name in the Egyptian manner. (I use Budge's old transliteration of hieroglyphics because it is still in common use and facilitates reference to his Hieroglyphic Dictionary, which is to be found in almost all libraries.) course, we don't. We know perfectly well that they are sneaking up on the boobs with the hypocrisy and mendacity that has been an integral part of their religion since its origin in fraud and forgery.

One does not expect Christians, except simple-minded peasant folk, to tell the truth about anything they regard as important. Lying for the Lord always has been a normal act of piety, and it naturally establishes the habit of telling the suckers whatever suits the convenience or malice of holy men at the moment.

A lady of our acquaintance, a respected member of the staff of a large university, tells us that about twenty years ago, when she was employed as the secretary of the big Methodist church in her home town, she was given a copy of John Stormer's amazingly popular book, None Dare Call It Treason, which would have precipitated a revolution in the United States, if the mush between the ears of the Aryan boobs could be stirred by any disclosure of the nature and purposes of the government under which they unthinkingly live. (Stormer's book, published in February 1964, sold more than 6,800,000 copies by the end of that year. It had no slightest effect that was not ephemeral and it is now forgotten. Let that be a lesson to the hopefuls who still babble about "publishing the facts" and "awakening the people" and "the Truth shall make you free!")

The lady took None Dare Call It Treason to the office of the church to be read during her leisure moments. The book was lying on her desk when the reverend manager of that retail outlet of the Methodist salvation-business came into the office. When he noticed it, the dervish fixed his horrified eye on the book and indignantly demanded to know what his secretary was doing with such prohibited reading. He warned her that she must never again pollute the sacred premises with so abominable a book. He assured her that it was full of lies. And he asseverated that he had himself made an investigation and knew that no such person as John Stormer existed. The name was merely a cover under which evil "Fascists" did their dirty work.

The lady did not argue with the Methodist witch-doctor, because a job is a job and she needed one to support her young children. She did, however, make a mental note about pious practices, because the book was a gift from her brother, who lived in St. Louis and was personally acquainted with Mr. Stormer.

What is ironic about the otherwise commonplace incident is that Mr. Stormer was himself a Christian and a member of the congregation of a church in his community. He imagined, as so many other Americans still did at that time, that the older forms of Christianity could be used as a barricade against the more recent reformation of the religion, commonly called Bolshevism or Communism, which differs from the older cults much as Calvinism and Methodism did in their day. Even as Stormer wrote, a majority of the professional pulpit-performers preferred the Marxist Reformation, found it more credible and attractive, and were its most zealous proselytes, although they commonly promoted it with some hypocrisy, from prudence or force of habit.

The irony is sharper. Mr. Stormer, after selling at least another million copies of his book in following years, eventually saw how vain had been his hope that the American herds could be turned from their stampede to the precipice over which nations disappear from history. Instead of analysing the causes of his failure as a publicist, he became a kind of amateur evangelist himself and worked actively to propagate the cult that was the narcotic which had sapped in Aryans the biological instinct of self-preservation that is found in all viable species of animal life.

The "creation scientists," elated by the corruption of the legislatures in Louisiana, have now got the bit between their teeth and are running all out. It is easy to see whither they are heading, so you may as well prepare yourself for the smash ahead.

The Cleveland State University, which was established by the tax-paying idiots of Ohio in 1964, and by 1983 had an enrollment of 17,830 customers for the pieces of paper called diplomas, is now made illustrious by the effulgent brain of James Hanson, a full Professor of Mathematics and Computer Science, who specializes in Celestial Mechanics and so knows all about the movements of the stars and other heavenly bodies. His mighty intellect has now destroyed the bogus science that sprang from the impiety of wicked old Copernicus, who was every bit as bad as that evil man, Darwin—in fact, much worse, because Copernicus pretended that the earth rotated on an axis and actually revolved about the sun, thus subverting the whole basis of True Science.

The great Professor Hanson has conclusively proved, by the well-ascertained laws of science, that the earth cannot possibly rotate on its axis and cannot possibly move in space at all, let alone around the sun. The proof is simply irrefragable. For one thing, the famous Michelson-Morley experiment with the speed of light showed that the earth's rate of motion is "an experimentally precise zero," although nasty atheists try to claim otherwise. But the crowning proof comes from the indubitable laws of physics concerning motion and inertia. If the earth had been spinning on an axis, it would have been instantly disintegrated by inertia, if its rotation had been suddenly and completely arrested, as Yahweh would have had to arrest it at the time he gave his pet bandits light so that they could go on slaughtering Semites all night without interruption. So, you see, the very laws of physics prove that the earth must be absolutely immobile and the sun must go around it, so that Yahweh could stop it in its tracks.

This is beyond question because, as the wonderful Professor Hanson says, "the literal Bible" is "the first, last, and only absolute authority in the area of Cosmology (as well as in all [other] areas." Now there is a trifling difficulty here. In the Book of Jesus (mistakenly called 'Joshua' in the King James version and its imitations), 10.12-14, it is said that the bandit chief, Jesus ('Joshua') spoke to the sun and told it to stand still at once and precisely over the town of Gibeon and the sun, probably saying "Aye, aye, sir!," slammed on the brakes and stopped as directed. The moon, given orders to stop itself over the valley of Ajalon, a few miles to the west, also obeyed. Now the sun and the moon (obviously alive, since they could hear and obey) presumably has the permission of Yahweh to behave as they did, but according to the King James version and the Vulgate, etc., it was the blood-thirsty barbarian who gave them the orders.

I am sure the erudite Professor Hanson knew how to solve that problem. In the "Old Testament," the story is said to be "written in the book of Jasher," which was presumably its source. That vital part of God's Word was somehow overlooked when the collection called the "Old Testament" was put together, but fortunately it was not lost.* And, by Jove! the story is in Jasher, 88.63-65, but with the express and highly important statement that it was old Yahweh who made the sun and moon stop "for thirty-six periods of time." So all is well, you see.

Professor Hanson is supported by many competent scientists who are not taken in by the vile Copernicus's bogus science. I have the announced program of a conclave of scintillating scientists that was held in Cleveland, evidently last year, and the readers of scientific papers include a Professor of Physics at Queens University of Ontario, a Professor of Mechanical Engineering from the Virginia Polytechnic Institute, one of Hanson's underlings in his department of Informational and Computing Science at Cleveland, a hot-shot engineer from Pittsburgh, an "aërospace engineer," a retired educator and epistemologist from British Columbia, a biophysicist about to receive his doctoral degree from Cornell, a retired holy man who knows all about the "Preserved Literal Bible," and a "Bible chronologist." So, you see, True Science is assembling a phalanx of coruscating is SPR H YŠR, 'the upright [i.e., honest, accurate] book.' The misunderstanding in the King James version, in which 'Jasher' looks like a man's name, arose from the translators' perplexity when they consulted the Septuagint, in which the Hebrew YŠR is translated as euthēs, a word which in the Jews' dialect of Greek, a kind of ancient Yiddish, replaced the Greek word euthys. The reference to the book is ambiguous in the Septuagint and could mean either "in the upright book" or "in the book of the upright [man]." As I am sure Professor Hanson knows, this divinely-inspired work is simply indispensable for an understanding of the earlier books of the "Old Testament." For example, you have doubtless been puzzled by God's bungled attempt to murder Moses for no obvious reason, mentioned in Exod. 4.24, whence it appears that God hid out in the bushes around a desert inn, lying in wait for Moses to come along, but missed his aim with his knife or blowgun or possibly bow and arrow, showing that he was simply incompetent as an assassin and would have done much better to give a contract to the Mafia. You will find a much better and intelligible account in Jasher, 79.8-12, whence you will learn, to God's credit, that God did not try to do the job himself but sent one of his hit-men ('angels') to be the first of the Jew terrorists and to throw a scare into Moses because old Moses had not sexually mutilated his male child to please the vicious old Jew up in the clouds. It was Moses's current wife who got the point and obediently mutilated her son, as is told in Exodus, thus saving Moses's life, even though she was just a goy bitch whom Moses naturally kicked out as soon as he was safe in Egypt. (As God taught his Master Race, goyim are just animals, to be disposed of when they are no longer useful.) If you want a copy of this priceless part of God's Word in the English translation, published in New York by Noah & Gould, 1840, the quickest way to get one is to order the reprint from Health Research, Mokelumne Hill, California.

intellectual brilliance, who will soon put to eternal shame the stupid astronomers who atheistically deny that the sun zips around the earth, just as is said in Yahweh's "inerrant" book.

I fear, however, that for all his wisdom, Professor Hanson has not yet really thought out his problem. For one thing, he is a pillar of what is called the Tychonian Society, and that would indicate that he has not yet freed himself from the un-Biblical and atheistic notion that there are planets that revolve about the sun. There just can't be. If there were, they would have gotten all snarled up in a tangle or have been thrown off by inertia when Yahweh told the sun to slam on his brakes. What's more, there isn't room for them. The sun, of course, can't be far out there in space. For an accurate stop on sudden notice just about a squalid little town in Palestine, the sun can't be very far up above the clouds, say 30,000 feet or, at most, 50,000 feet above the earth he runs around every day. And Professor Hanson's "only absolute authority in the area of Cosmology" frequently says or implies that the sun, moon, and all the stars are whirling about the earth just high enough to clear the mountain tops. And since Yahweh and his celestial establishment aren't very far above the clouds, if not actually floating on them, it would be absurd to suppose that he hung his lanterns much higher.

Old Yahweh isn't such a big fellow, you know, (his height can be estimated from Exod. 33.21-23, which describes his posture when he exhibited his buttocks to Moses), and, as we all know from the "absolute authority in the area of Cosmology," Yahweh's angels climb down to earth on ladders; Yahweh himself (as it says in Psalms, 104) rides around on the clouds as on a chariot; Elijah soared right up to Yahweh's cloud Heaven in a whirlwind (i.e., in the funnel of a tornado); and when Jesus finished hiding out with his disciples after he sneaked out of his tomb, he just floated upwards like a hot-air balloon and disappeared in a cloud. Now it would be absurd to suppose he floated upwards for thousands of miles or out into chilly space; his destination can't have been much higher than, say, a cirrus formation. Furthermore, as the "inerrant" book teaches us, when Jesus was baptized, his Papa yelled down a recognition of his legitimacy, and later, when Jesus went up to the top of a mountain, his Daddy shouted a recognition and we are explicitly told he was floating in a cloud when he spoke.

Nope, True Science inerrantly teaches us that the sun can't be higher than the stratosphere at the outside, and as for people who claim they have been higher, they must be purveyors of bogus science, just like Copernicus and Darwin, and we ought to put them in their place.

Now the professorial glory of Cleveland State University, I am sorry to say, has expressly stated that he thinks the earth is spheroid, just as the bogus "scientists" would atheistically have us believe. I am sure that when Hanson has read the only source of True Science again, he will see his terrible mistake. For one thing, the waters were all there before old Yahweh started creating light etc., and making a mess of things. Nope, God has distinctly implied in many places in his "inerrant" handbook for mortals that the earth is a flat or almost flat cake of mud, floating on waters that are under the earth. Hanson had better wise up and learn the facts from the distinguished scientists of the Flat Earth Society, who years ago conclusively proved the earth is flat or nearly flat, and proved it from the pages of the one and only scientific treatise that Professor Hanson recognizes as infallible in what it says about everything.

And there is another thing that worries me a lot. When he teaches his pupils about computers, he probably talks about electric circuits and conductors and semi-conductors and microchips and things like that, but does he present those materialistic notions as facts or as the "unproven theories" of a possibly bogus science? Isn't it absurd and blasphemous to suppose that little bits of lifeless matter could perform mathematical computations faster than the enormous brain in the Hanson skull? True Science must surely see the fallacy of such an un-Biblical idea.

I haven't read through the Jew-book recently, but I have a reliable concordance, and it tells me that old Yahweh didn't say a word about computers or anything like them. Now what he did talk about was his angels, who pop up in all sorts of places, and his other agents and handymen, including the head of his Secret Service, Satan, who has a big staff of his own. An inspired Man of God, Jean Weir, in his authoritative treatise, De praestigiis (Basileae, 1568), ascertained that there are at least 7,405,926 devils, exclusive of their commanding officers, and that they serve in 1,111 legions, with 6,666 in each legion. Dionysius the Areopagite in his De hierarchia caelesti classifies and distinguishes the nine orders of angels and their respective duties, but does not, as I recall, estimate their numbers. And it must be remembered that all of these are really under the same management, for Professor Hanson's 'inerrant' manual of True Science explicitly states, in a book called Job, that Satan is just an employee of Yahweh and runs around as an agent provocateur to see how much he can make human beings suffer on earth or for all eternity, for old Yahweh, as we all know, is a ferocious sadist.

And I must mention here a True Scientist whose name is known to everyone, since Coleridge quoted him in the margin of the first edition of the "Ancient Mariner," and cited him in a footnote in the second edition. He is Michael Psellus, who flourished in Byzantium in the Eleventh Century. His Dialogus de energia, seu operatione daemonum was generally read in the Latin translation by Petrus Morellus (Parisiis, 1577). In that work he proves that what is called energy and moves things is really the work of invisible spirits of divine nature (daemones), and that the atmosphere above the earth, and the air around us, and the land, and the sea, and the deeps that lie below the earth are just chock-full of those invisible spirits, packed together like sardines in a can, and that what materialists call the processes of nature are really the work of the billions of spirits whom Yahweh has charged with getting things done.

Now I have cited these few statistics to show how much more reasonable and righteous it is to teach the spiritual truth that computers must be operated by such sprites and sylphs, rather than sanction the materialistic notion that inanimate matter can do arithmetic and calculus. The denial of spiritual agents in computers must be the work of nasty atheists like Copernicus and Darwin, as I am sure Professor Hanson, in the amplitude of his wisdom, will see sooner or later, and introduce True Science to his professional teaching, if he has not already done so.

So, my friend, get ready for the New Age the "creation scientists" are ushering in. It will be on us much sooner than you think.

No one should be deceived by the vociferous hostility between purveyors of Communism and of Christianity, by which each sect tries to conceal its affinity to the other. One still sees quoted silly diatribes by Bolshevik agitators in the 1920s, advertising their humanitarian desire to strangle the people "with the guts of the last preacher," and we hear endlessly repeated bleats that we must "destroy Communism and return to the Judaeo-Christian faith." Although the antagonism is real enough on the lowest level, where the salesmen are competing with each other for business, the vociferations are designed to make us suppose that there is a diametrical opposition and total antithesis between the cults that the Jews have provided for their goyim.

We should remember that such furious hostility is only normal in monotheistic religions, which are always a blight to the nations that succumb to them. It is the essence of such religions that heresies within them must be extinguished in blood to defend the "true gospel," what that may be at the time, of the god who has been irrationally imagined as the creator of everything. There is no reading more dreary than the fanatical ravings of theologians determined to extirpate their rivals in the "one-god" business, but judicious sampling of the swill is highly instructive, and everyone should read something of the endless logomachies that accompanied the Protestant Reformation. Read a little of all sides, just to assure yourself there is no basic difference except in the identity of the damnable agents of the Antichrist.

Here is a nice illustration of the point I wish to make. It is one of a series of woodcuts made for Martin Luther to give graphic expression to the obvious need to exterminate Catholics from the face of the earth. "MOST You will note that the "Most Satanic People" and his Cardinals have not been hanged in the usual way, by which the neck of the victim is broken, thus cutting short his death agonies; they have been suspended from a beam by loops of leather about each throat, so that they will be slowly strangled while making desperate efforts to breathe and thus will suffer as much as possible. You will note that the drawing and the verses below it are signed by Luther himself.

We must not accuse Luther of undue animosity: his Catholic opponents saw with equal clarity and charity the imperative need to exterminate all Protestants to gratify the same god. In the upper left of this woodcut you see devils capturing the black souls that escaped from the mouths of the strangled Catholics. Now the comparable pictures produced on the Catholic side show the very same devils seizing the black souls that have escaped from the mouths of executed Protestants. Sensible men naturally drew the conclusion that the religious zealots of all sects were crazed and harvested by the same fiends at the orders of one and the same god for his own Judaic purposes.

Sensible men also knew that it would be futile to try to abate the fury of the long Wars of Religion that permanently impoverished our race by the slaughter of millions, including much of our best blood, while the Godly on all sides tried to please their Jesus, who was presumably watching with pleasure. The Son of God expressly commanded (Luc. 19.27) that he should not be deprived of the fun of watching the death-agonies of all who displeased him. And all of the warring sects were united by their common desire to give him a really delightful show.

How much real basis there was for that bloody piety and insane righteousness was made painfully apparent by the recent cuddling between the Pope and Lutherans, who are being demonstratively lovey-dovey, and saying to each other, "Why shouldn't we have a big merger now? After all, we're in the same racket."

Lutherans and Catholics no longer find it feasible to butcher each other's customers, but you may be sure that they and the Bolsheviks will not get together for a merger until both sides have exhausted their power to make their goyim slaughter one another to demonstrate their own righteousness and the Eternal Truth of the revelations made by their respective Jewish messiahs.

God moves in a mysterious way his wonders to perform.

The Church of England elevated to the office of Bishop of Durham a clergyman named David Jenkins, who had been honest enough to state publicly that he did not believe the tales about pregnant virgins and resurrected corpses in the Christian's Holy Book. Persons who profess to believe such things asked indignantly what beliefs the man had left that would justify his continued participation in the salvation-business, much less his advancement in the managerial hierarchy of his corporation. And we must admit they asked a question to which it is hard to imagine a satisfactory answer.

The consecration of the new Bishop of Durham took place in the York Minster, officially, the Cathedral of St. Peter. This magnificent structure was one of the most beautiful and architecturally nearly perfect monuments of Western Christianity, and they who have seen it will never forget its austere beauty or their meditations about the power of religion, the surprising skill of Mediaeval architects, the innate genius of the Aryan race, and the nature of its Faustian Civilization, of which Spengler had identified the great cathedral as the clearest concrete expression. No civilized man, I believe, has contemplated the great cathedral at York without feeling a melancholy nostalgia, a deep regret for the passing of a religion that inspired our race to such achievements.

A few days after the consecration, on the night of 8-9 July 1984, the splendid edifice was largely destroyed by a conflagration ignited by a thunderbolt during a violent electrical storm. True Believers began at once to proclaim that their god, the officially recognized successor of Zeus Keraunios, wielder of the lightnings, had sent down the thunderbolt to mark his displeasure at the consecration of a bishop who did not recognize the divinity of his filial segment. Now it is quite true that old Yahweh, the Jews' ferocious deity, would certainly have been capable of so atrocious an act of sabotage, but rational men could not but ask themselves why that irascible Lord of the Clouds hadn't used his thunderbolt to split the skulls of the disbelieving David Jenkins, of the Archbishop of York, and of the Archbishop of Canterbury (the Primate of England), the three guilty heretics. Hadn't he heard about the consecration in time? Or couldn't he aim his missiles well enough to hit such small targets? Or had he been asleep or drunk at the time and just woke up or sobered up on the night of 8 July, so that he behaved in the manner of the man who kicks the bed in which he has overslept? And anyway, even if he was in a tantrum, why should he wantonly ruin one of the greatest tributes ever paid to him by men who believed in his divinity? The only answer to such questions is that he, as we have been so often told with oleaginous unction, moves in a mysterious way so that men won't know what he's up to.

Among the True Believers who most loudly proclaimed that their god had destroyed his cathedral to vent his ire at the consecration of David Jenkins was a well-known American dervish, Carl McIntire, who, although he is not really in the big time on the salvation circuit, does extract a good income from the Faithful: he affirmed that Jesus destroyed his magnificent edifice to warn Queen Elizabeth II, the nominal head of the Church of England, that she had better get a move on and make everyone believe in the "resurrected Christ who will return to raise the dead and gather believers to himself in the clouds."

Now it is to the point that God, moving in his mysterious way, moved a Christian organization called America's Promise in Phoenix, Arizona, to call attention to a book in which is recorded McIntire's cleverness, doubtless divinely-inspired, in collecting, as charitable contributions, goods having a wholesale value of $12,500,000, which he was to give to the starving niggers in Biafra, and which he adroitly sold for more than $6,000,000 cash to the Nigerian Army, which was then engaged in starving the niggers in Biafra into submission. Now I personally have no knowledge of what McIntire did, but if he did maker others' charity so profitable for himself, he only behaved as one would expect an evangelist to behave; for whom should the Glad Tidings gladden so much as the holy man whose pockets they fill? The report, if true, merely proves that the situation is normal in the salvation-business. What is interesting about it is that the report, which was reproduced photographically and disseminated by mail about the time that McIntire was disclosing God's work as an arsonist at York, is acutely embarrassing to the pious Mr. McIntire. Why should Jesus choose to embarrass the expounder of his will to mortals, especially at such a time? What can Jesus have been thinking of when he put the finger on one of his most zealous propagandists? The only answer must be that God moves in his mysterious way etc.

Have you ever noticed the Jewish fat lips, beady eyes, and brutal neck of Al Capone, the 1930s' Chicago gangster, or Frank Sinatra/Al Pacino, the matinee idol?—All Jews. And then they and their Jewish supporters try to shove that old gag of being persecuted down through the ages down our throats.

This morning I almost got myself killed when I called the bus driver "Nigger" and told him to go back to Africa where he belonged. Naturally, a big college (University of Western Ontario here) punk told me to shut up. I told him off. A woman said that all the passengers were behind the driver, but I held my ground, and I noted that no one carried out any of the threats to me, which proves that some Canadians are yellow indeed.

Dear Kinsman Dietz: 16 June 1984

Racial greetings, it has been a year since I have last had the privilege of communicating with you, I hope that you are doing well.

I wrote to you from the Federal prison at Bastrop, TX. I had hopes that by now I would be out in the free world and able to pay for my own subscription to "Liberty Bell," but it appears I still have awhile to go before I will be able to contribute to our fine cause financially.

My address has changed from the FCI Bastrop to the state system Ellis II, Huntsville, TX. Brother Dietz, I would appreciate it if you could find me another sponsor for a subscription to "Libery Bell."

I miss the news Liberty Bell carried; I am on maximum lock-up for being a racial agitator and any and all news is greatly appreciated; the Texas Dept. of Corrections has effectively cut me off from many of my brothers, but the few of us that are on this farm are very strong, the White man is definitely a minority here, because we are not rats or politicians, we do not enjoy the priviledges extended to the niggers.

I would welcome and reply to all mail from any Aryan Brothers who have time and the inclination to drop me a few lines.

Dear George: 18 June 1984

Keep up the good work! The Americans with intestinal fortitude are finally putting their muscles to the wheels of Justice and the Truth, and in their righteous anger, they are trying mightily to straighten up the Constitutional Republic back i to its original form of Life, Liberty, and the Pursuit of Happiness for all of us who are willing to Fight For It! As you and I know, we are a nation of LAW being run by OUTLAWS! There are more and more thinking Americans who realize that we are being had and in spades. Black is black is black, but the spirit of truth and purity is found in the color White. . .

I am now sixty years of age and realize that my life of retirement will never be, for I won't let up the fight until I see that all of our sovereign rights have been fully restored. We are a nation that has a heritage of freedoms and creative ideas born of free spirits that will never die. We live and fight now so that our posterity will not be serfs on their own land and that taxes and inflation will be no more. . .

Hitler was right about the Jews and fought the good fight against tremendous odds. We, too, can win the fight against tremendous odds!

For the enclosed contribution, please send me back issues and flyers so I can help increase subscriptions.

Yours for Liberty and Justice,
J.J.D., Sr., Hawaii

Dear George: 19 June 1984

I'd like to tell you how much the books and pamphlets were appreciated. You must be a hell of a man and patriot to do what you're doing in the face of all the Jew, Nigger & Communist rhetoric and propaganda, to say nothing of the ostracism and hostility you must encounter. People can be so stupid and blind. . .

Heil Hitler!

Dear George: 24 June 1984

Could it be that Jessie Jackson has more 'guts' than anyone else involved in politics at this time? By allowing his advisor to make statements about the relationship between the negroes and the Jews, and by not divorcing himself from these statements, he has shown what can only be termed 'guts.'

During the campaign, his advisor, Minister Louis Farrakhan, has spoken of the "almost total control of public opinion by the Jewish-owned media," and the "existence of an international Jewish conspiracy." He has also asked "radical Jewish elements" to refrain from assassinating Jackson the way they have "assassinated so many other black and national leaders."

It's ironic; the 'black boy' who has built the Jewish money temples with his sweat and blood, and whose submissiveness has been taken for granted, has now become impertinent and is calling the child by its real name. I think, George, the time has come to send this negro a couple of books. This I am doing.

Keep up the good work, George.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR: Dr. Revilo Pendleton Oliver, Professor of the Classics at the University of Illinois for 32 years, is a scholar of international distinction who has written articles in four languages for the most prestigious academic publications in the United States and Europe.

During World War II, Dr. Oliver was Director of Research in a highly secret agency of the War Department, and was cited for outstanding service to his country.

One of the very few academicians who has been outspoken in his opposition to the progressive defacement of our civilization, Dr. Oliver has long insisted that the fate of his countrymen hangs on their willingness to subordinate their doctrinal differences to the tough but idealistic solidarity which is the prerequisite of a Majority resurgence.

SOME QUOTABLE QUOTES FROM AMERICA'S DECLINE

On the 18th Amendment (Prohibition): "Very few Americans were sufficiently sane to perceive that they had repudiated the American conception of government and had replaced it with the legal principle of the 'dictatorship of the proletariat,' which was the theoretical justification of the Jews' revolution in Russia."

FREEDOM OF SPEECH—FREEDOM OF THOUGHT
FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION

The editor-publisher of Liberty Bell does not necessarily agree with each and every article in this magazine, nor does he subscribe to all conclusions arrived at by various writers; however, he does endeavor to permit the exposure of ideas suppressed by the controlled news media of this country.

It is, therefore, in the best tradition of America and of free men everywhere that Liberty Bell strives to give free reign to ideas, for ultimately it is ideas which rule the world and determine both the content and structure of culture.

We believe that we can and will change our society for the better. We declare our long-held view that no institution or government created by men, for men, is inviolable, incorruptible, and not subject to evolution, change or replacement by the will of the people.

To this we dedicate our lives and our work. No effort will be spared and no idea will be allowed to go unexpressed if we think it will benefit the Thinking People, not only of America, but the entire world.

Higher Education and Aryan Survival in the United States

by
Charles E. Weber, Ph.D.

The following observations and impressions are based on 32 years of teaching thousands of students on both the undergraduate and graduate levels at the University of Cincinnati, the University of Missouri, the University of Tulsa, and Louisiana State University in Baton Rouge. To a certain extent I write as a friend and proponent of higher education, but I feel that many illusions and fallacies about it are current which have been and continue to be menaces to the survival and happiness of the Aryan components of the American population, components with which I strongly identify myself and which I wish to support strongly.

One of the most important sets of illusions about higher education lies in the economic area. There can be no question about the fact that, on the average, persons who have earned college degrees have higher lifetime incomes than those who have not earned them. However, it would be an utterly naive confusion of cause and effect to assume that this fact is solely attributable to higher education as such. The youngsters who have the motivation, persistence, intelligence, and financial backing to make their way to even just a bachelor's degree would doubtless pull ahead, by most criteria, of those who do not have such assets, even if the college graduates would hypothetically have terminated their formal education with just a high school diploma.

On the other hand, economic success and whatever psychological well-being it brings with it are not simply a matter of total earnings during the entire course of a lifetime, but also the time of life during which these earnings are received, especially with regard to the demographic survival of a race. When a young person seeks employment immediately after graduation from high school he starts accumulating practical experiences and| skills which are usually denied to those who elect to continue their education for another four years. From the standpoint of commencing reproductive activities, the youngster who starts to work at 18 years of age starts to earn money when it counts the most.

Quantity of reproduction is one thing; quality of reproduction is another. The great trust which Aryan Americans put in higher education for the purpose of securing their socio-economic status causes their best and brightest to spend their best reproductive years in situations which do not encourage reproduction. We must strongly suspect that over a long period, over several generations, higher education has had a dysgenic effect on the American Aryan population. Scholastic aptitude test scores, which have been declining substantially in recent years, might very well be a result of such a dysgenic effect, not simply the shortcomings of public schools.

The big, redistributive government and sharply graduated income taxes of our age demoralize the high achievers and have a tendency to reduce the advantages of long educational preparations for the purpose of increasing later earnings. In spite of superior educational preparation and intelligence of attainers of college degrees, the economic advantages of higher education, such as they might be, are further reduced for the young Aryan job applicant by discrimination against him enforced and reinforced by the arrogant federal bureaucracy. At best, this discrimination is based on the fallacious assumption that members of all races have the same set of capabilities and motivations.

The private nature of the rather small "private" sector of higher education has been severely compromised by a number of judicial decisions to the extent that it is almost debatable if there are still any colleges and universities to speak of which can be called truly private. Even federally sponsored scholarships and low-cost loans for students have been used as a legal and administrative basis for the exertion of governmental influence on what remains of the private sector or higher education. However, in the final analysis, Aryans would probably be far better-off if all education on all levels were strictly private.

Academic empire builders are concerned primarily with enrollment statistics with which to impress legislators rather than course content and the impact of their policies or students and on the nation as a whole. Declining birth rates during the 1960s have resulted in declining or, at best, stagnant enrollments in most universities. To cope with this situation, administrators have resorted to aggressive recruitment of students and lowering standards in order to retain students who really have no business wasting their own time and the taxpayers' money by continuing their formal education. As a result the vocational and intellectual value of a bachelor's degree has been eroded even further. Even as a means of identification with a socio-economic group its value has declined.

The extent of Jewish influence on higher education in the United States may be gauged to some extent by the many "Holocaust" courses, seminars, and programs that have been held on American campuses in recent years and the almost complete lack of any seminars to refute them. The very few professors who have had the integrity and courage to question this fraud have had serious troubles. I speak from my own experience in this area, having been virtually forced to resign my tenured position of full professor in 1981 with 21 years of service to the institution in question. Much of this heavy Jewish influence is bought by big donations, even to supposedly Christian private institutions. One can readily imagine how much more easily Jewish students are admitted to medical, dental, and law schools than Aryan students.

Intercollegiate spectator sports play a large rôle on American campuses, both socially and economically. These sports, especially football and basketball, are now largely dominated by non-Aryans whose "studies" are heavily subsidized. It is difficult to assess the psychological damage this circumstance causes to Aryan students with regard to self-image and wholesome racial pride, but it can be readily assumed to be considerable.

Higher education imposes a number of problems on the Aryan student in the sexual and reproductive areas, partly as a result of economic factors, as mentioned above. However, there are other factors operative in this area. My own observation is that the incidence of homosexuality is much higher in the academic profession than in other professions, although exact and reliable statistical data in this area might be quite elusive. This problem is especially acute in some specific fields, such as drama, art, music, English, and foreign languages. The reasons for this pattern are not obvious, although economic factors must be strongly suspected, at least in part. Students in sexually formative years should not be confronted and influenced by such instructors lest their reproductive potentials be impaired. Such influences can endanger the actual demographic survival of Aryans in view of the large percentage of them who extend their education into the higher levels. As a group, professors themselves have notoriously few children of their own.

American education as a whole has a gross sexual imbalance which probably does damage to male Aryan pupils. Elementary education is virtually a monopoly of female teachers, many of whom offer little in the way of a model of wholesome heterosexual adjustment. On the higher levels, the numbers of women taking graduate degrees have been increasing rapidly, partly as a result of governmental pressures for the preferential hiring of women for academic positions on the higher levels. By contrast, only about 15% of the persons taking Ph.D. degrees in the 1950s were women.

One of the most insidious and detrimental aspects of higher education for Aryans in the United States is the decidedly leftward stance of American professors as a whole, but especially those in such fields as educational psychology,[1] sociology, anthropology[2], and economics. It is not at all difficult to identify one very simple, basic cause of the generally strong prejudice of American professors in favor of redistributive governments; the vast majority of professors teach at institutions which are mostly dependent on governmental funding and the vast majority of American students study at such institutions. (My impression is that the present percentage would be around 85%, having been far lower before World War II.) Important though this single factor might be, there are other important factors which are far less obvious. The relative poverty of the profession has a tendency to cause many professors to develop hostility toward a system which they suppose to be unjust because they occupy a low economic status in it. Sometimes this hostility assumes the subconscious desire to pull down the most successful members of the very society and social classes which support them. Many professors have also developed a perverse prejudice in favor of minority, non-Aryan races, much to the disadvantage of Aryan students. (Is there a single student organization on any American campus which dares to call itself "Aryan" amidst all the Negro and Jewish student organizations which are flagrantly racially exclusive?) In the case of professors in such fields as sociology and educational psychology there is even another leftward pull as a result of the fact that they are preparing students who are most likely to enter government service of some sort or another where egalitarianism is de rigueur. (For detailed studies on the leftward tendencies and prejudices in professors of the social sciences and economics see The Great Deceit/Social Pseudo-Sciences, West Sayville, New York: The Veritas Foundation, 1964, and Keynes at Harvard, 1960 and later printings, likewise published by the Veritas Foundation.) John Maynard Keynes (1883-1946) not only became the academic pontifex maximus of redistributive government but is also known to have been a flagrant homosexual. Keynes is an outstanding symbol of the degeneracy of the academic establishment and the dangers which that degeneracy presents to the young Aryan students and indeed to Aryan society as a whole.

1. We must, of course, be aware of the courageous exceptions. In the Winter, 1969, issue of the Harvard Educational Review Professor Arthur R. Jensen of the University of California at Berkeley (of all places) published his famous article, "How Much Can We Boost IQ and Scholastic Achievement?" This article caused a tremendous cackling and flapping of wings in the academic establishment because it furnished a mass of experimental data which demonstrated that human intelligence was essentially genetically determined and that its profiles varied from race to race.

Although very few American professors could be characterized as Bible-thumpers, many of them, especially in such fields as sociology and educational psychology, instill in their students moral precepts—of sorts. This sort of "morality" is strongly concentrated on economic and societal concerns for people fancied to be underdogs. Such a "morality" could be quite injurious to prospects for Aryan survival in a multiracial population.

When the young Aryan man commits four valuable years to college-level education he is confronted with having to make one of the most difficult choices of his life, the choice of a profession. This choice must be made at a time of his life before he has accumulated much practical economic experience and before he has learned to assess his own abilities with much objectivity. Mistakes in this choice can result in wasted time or even life-long maladjustments.

I have frequently encountered a Faustian element in the psyche of young Aryans, especially young Aryan men. This is a desire for knowledge for its own sake and beauty. The ultimate causes of this common feature of the Aryan psyche are perhaps to some extent a cultural heritage, but we must not rule out a priori genetically determined characteristics of Aryans. So accurately did Johann Wolfgang von Goethe (1749-1832) portray this idealistic thirst for knowledge in his dramatic masterpiece, Faust, a drama composed during the course of some sixty years of his brilliant life, that we frequently designate such an idealistic, but not necessarily happiness-bringing, search as "Faustian." No literary work has ever portrayed with greater insights the ethical and psychological problems of scholars and scientists.

When young Aryans find a deep personal satisfaction in the pursuit of knowledge they would do well to try out their capacities for higher education, but always with the practical awareness that higher education is often overrated as to its economic advantages. When a young Aryan woman devotes her best reproductive years to acquiring a higher education she should ask herself if she will have to pay a high price in her later years in the form of childlessness. I have frequently counseled my students that they should have limited expectations of purely economic advantages from higher education and even told them my modest academic salary, at which they were usually astonished.

On the other hand, at the age of 18, Aryan men of the type most likely to continue their education beyond that age have a further average life expectancy of around 55 to 60 years. The four years invested in an undergraduate education seem a modest enough fraction of this time if they provide psychological and economic benefits over such a long period. There is a certain validity to the old German proverb, "Jung gelehrt, alt geehrt" (educated in youth, honored in later years), but this proverb probably does not have as great a validity as is often imagined. If education is bought at the price of the demographic decline of one's race, what are its ultimate benefits?

Obviously, those who have specific professional goals, such as a legal or medical career, can enter these fields only through higher education. Today there is a grossly disproportionate number of Jews in these professions and the young Aryan man frequently has undue difficulties in competing for entry into professional schools in these fields. The most effective, and indeed quite legal, way to right this wrong is for Aryans to seek medical and legal services only from members of their own race. On the basis of the German census of 16 June 1933, there were 22 times as many Jewish lawyers, 15 times as many Jewish physicians, and 12 times as many dentists as the Jewish proportion of gainfully employed persons. In 1934, 9,4% of the inhabitants of Vienna were Jewish by religious affiliation, but 86% of its lawyers and 52% of its physicians were Jewish.[3] While the disproportions in the United States have not yet become as great, they represent a problem for Aryans who seek professional services from members of their own race.

Many Aryan students become interested in such subjects as English or history and choose them as their major subjects. Often this choice is based on a genuine love of these subjects which they acquire in their undergraduate years. After graduation with a bachelor's degree, however, they soon discover that their studies have given them little advantage in earning a livelihood. Then many of them decide to continue their studies in graduate school (where standards have also been lowered in recent years) in order to prepare themselves for teaching positions at some level or another. As a result, there is presently an oversupply of people seeking teaching positions in a number of fields with resultant decreases in salary levels in the teaching profession. The process described above is sometimes quite appropriately designated as the "academic trap." People in the teaching profession often complain about their low salaries without seeming to realize that simple laws of supply and demand account for the low salary levels. People who set policies for admission to medical and law schools are generally far more sophisticated about the economic impacts of their decisions than those who admit students to graduate studies.

3. Forschungen zur Judenfrage, Vol. III (1938), pp. 188 and 192.

Another result of the overcrowding of many sections of the teaching profession is a great fear of teaching anything really important and hence "controversial." (Das Beste, was du wissen kannst, darfst du den Buben doch nicht sagen; The best things you can know you are not permitted to tell the boys, after all, as Mephistopheles reminds Faust in lines 1840-1.) A notable recent example is the cowardice that nearly all history professors have had in investigating the fraudulent "Holocaust" material, although it has perverted American foreign policy and hence should be considered one of the most urgent tasks for the historian.

Higher education has advanced the Aryan nations in important ways, but not without considerable costs. In the United States, other races which do not place as much emphasis on higher education are beginning to inundate the Aryan components of the population demographically. We Aryans, individually and as a race, must weigh the costs of higher education more carefully against its real or supposed benefits. We Aryans must also become aware of the features of higher education which can jeopardize our future. Many changes could and should take place in higher education lest its primary creators be defeated by it. □

I very much enjoyed our telephone conversation the other day. I have previously never had any interest in history before being stationed here in the Philippines, but for some reason being in a country with even less than the minimal freedoms we have in the U.S. caused my interest in politics and history to spark. At first only involving their leader, Marcos, and later a friend exposed the fallacy of the "Holocaust," and this raised the enormous question, "How did they pull this off?", and "Why?" Now I am burning to find as much of the truth as I can get my hands on, so enclosed is another order and a donation of as much as I can spare at this time; because I am getting married this month, money is quite tight.

As I discover more and more about the Jew-Communist problem and how to combat it, I am also educating my future wife. I have not been watching TV for years, realizing as I exited my teens that it was only emitting mindless garbage which I have since learned to have been Jew propaganda. My father always would joke about me butting my head against the walls of the "System" and I think that this allowed me to be more objective when I was exposed to new and contrary ideas.

My father is of West Virginian origin; he met my mother during the Berlin Airlift. He is now a professor at . . . . . College and teaches German and Psychology, so I might have trouble disputing the many years of inputs from the psychology texts, but, hopefully, logic and nature will prevail. I had a chance to search my roots as well as see the world at age 13, when my father, mother, and I lived in Germany for a year due to a Fulbright instructor exchange involving my father. I lived in Kassel for the most part, going to a German school and vacationing in neighboring European countries. After being immersed in the German culture for ½ year, I was speaking German fluently. I was proud to be an American and then I felt even prouder of my German heritage, but now I realize I should be proud instead to be a White man. After all, it's not the dirty word they make it out to be.

I never had much connection with blacks in my life until I joined the Air Force, and it was then (even before I was enlightened) that I started noticing them not pulling their load, and getting away with it. They would pass the work down to their subordinates whom they know would do it, but they themselves would rarely set the example.

I'm sick of the system (Social Actions) that allows all minorities to extort the White man. If a black would hit you and you defended yourself, even with witnesses seeing him hit first, all he has to say is you called him a "nigger" and he is the angel and you are getting hit with the book.

I called my parents and prepared them for the material you are sending them, so it would not be wasted and they would know it was from me indirectly.

Thank you for your patriotism!

Sieg Heil!

Gentlemen:

Knowing what I do about Judaism, I was naturally distressed to see that you have erroneously featured me as a JEW in "Encyclopaedia Judaica." Please do not make this mistake again in any future editions of your voluminous, pseudo-authoritative publication. I AM NOT TODAY, NOR HAVE I EVER BEEN A JEW, AND AS A MATTER OF FACT, I AM UNCIRCUMCISED.

I suggest rather than fraudulently misrepresenting me to be a Jew, and dishonestly abusing my name and reputation as a kind of advertising gimmick to improve the image of your religion (Judaism), you TRY TO PROMOTE YOUR RELIGION ON

ITS OWN MERITS—IF INDEED IT HAS ANY!

In closing, I trust that I am not being unrealistically optimistic, in thanking you you in advance for your anticipated cooperation in this matter.

Truly yours,
Bobby Fischer

Dear Mr. Dietz: 1 July 1984

Thank you very much for sending me a complimentary copy of Aprils Liberty Bell along with the Revisionist series and other printouts. We got a great kick out of the "Communism Is Irish" flyer. I've made several copies and gave them to some of my fellow patriots.

I do believe that it is too late but will keep trying and spreading the word When I can.

While attending church on Sunday, I had the opportunity to speak with a missionary who was born in Russia and came to the U.S. as a boy with his Russian parents. He now is broadcasting to the people behind the Iron Curtain in the U.S.S.R.

After the service, I walked up to him and said, "Pastor, in 30 years, this country will be Soviet America." He looked at me and somberly said, "You overestimate the time, all the ground work has already been laid. The schools, churches, and government have been infiltrated, not to mention the media." I was quite surprised at his answer as I didn't think he was aware as he made no mention during the service.

I cannot seem to get through to most of my friends and relatives, they have no idea what is going on and are too darn lazy to read to find out.

I do pray that this new Populist Party can gain strength and eventually will make a big difference. I will support them all I can as Reagan has proven to be a great disappointment to all conservative Americans.

I thank you for the brave stand you and your family have taken. God Bless you all.

Please send me a one year subscription to Liberty Bell. Also please send me one copy of "Know Your Enemy" and one copy of "The Protocols of the Learned Elders of Zion." I shall order other publications in the future.

Sincerely,
S.L., North Carolina

To the Super Patriot of the White Race:
Dear George: 1 July 1984

Enclosed is my check for another year's renewal for the priceless Liberty Bell.

It is most unfortunate too many intelligent (?) men (?) swallow the hokum of Christchurchianity, spooks, spiritualistic mediums, cults, etc. Apparently, they would expend too much effort in checking the realities set forth by men like Dr. Oliver, Perrier, Klassen, Nietzsche, Simpson, and Hitler. Besides, they may find some facts that would disturb their brain-polluted thinking and the bubble of religious convenience would burst, resulting in tears in their beers.

Ronald S. Hand summed it up fairly well in his March 25th letter printed in your May issue: "Today, if we had in America 'Odinists' instead of 'Identity Christians' we would stand a much better chance of wresting our destiny from the hands of the Jews." American so-called Christians fall far short of the total man when compared with Hitler's National Socialists.

Only fools will be like sheep, be humble, be meek, turn the other cheek, love their neighbor (even if he is a nigger, a spic, a zip, gook, chink or other mud-race mongrel, because that is also 'Christian').

Due to the fact that the masters of deceit and propaganda have made the vengeful Yahweh's book a best-seller ever since they put it together, any thinking man should come to realize what Francis Parker Yockey said in his book "Imperium": "No religion of Jewish origin is a proper religion for men and women of European race. It is truly said by the Jews themselves that the Hebrew spirit breathes in every word of the Old Testament. Religion of Jewish origin is not in accord with the spirit of

WHEN the National Socialist Government came into office, on January 30, 1933, it was confronted with widespread chaos and confusion in the social, economic and political life of the nation. A similar state of affairs existed in the legal sphere and in the administration of justice. The situation was too critical to allow of any time being lost in dealing with it.

The first step taken was to put an end to the manner in which Parliament had hitherto functioned. Even in imperial times, before the War, this institution had proved itself inefficient. The republican parliament however, which followed the War, turned out not only inefficient but positively detrimental to the interests of the country. This republican Reichstag had been organized according to the principles laid down in the Weimar Constitution of 1919. But that Constitution had been drawn up by a Conference of theoretical jurists and politicians who were quite out of touch with the practical needs of the nation. It was therefore out of harmony with German historical tradition, with German mentality and the ethical constitution of the German nation. Moreover, the constitutional laws enacted at Weimar were formulated under the aegis of the so-called Peace Treaties and as such they naturally failed to arouse popular opinion in favour of the new Constitution. In the final crisis of 1932/33 the legislative body operating under this Constitution, that is to say, the Reichstag, absolutely failed to function. Parliamentary legislation was increasingly superseded by emergency decrees issued by the President of the Reich. In the year 1931 35 laws were passed and 42 emergency decrees were issued. In 1932 only 5 laws were passed, but 60 decrees were issued. This system of emergency decrees could not furnish a permanent basis for the government of the country.

Just as in the case of the State, the local administrations were also unable to cope with the difficulties that confronted them. Especially the municipalities were threatened with disaster, owing to the economic conditions which resulted directly from the political chaos. In addition to all this, the unfortunate dualism between the Reich and the governments of the federative states[1]) led to the development of an administrative apparatus which was becoming more and more disjointed.

The administration of justice failed to check the increasing volume of crimes and misdemeanours. In spite of the growing leniency towards the criminal, which was due to the prevailing laxity of moral ideas, the number of persons accused of larceny in Berlin rose from 32,452 in 1926 to 52,231 in 1932. The number accused of burglary rose from 18,673 to 36,729 within the same period. And the number of cases of robbery with murder from 2 to 7. The damage resulting from theft amounted to 16.5 million marks in 1926. In 1932 it amounted to 32 millions. The increase in acquittals, which offended the popular sense of justice, was an outstanding proof that the existing criminal code was inadequate to deal effectively with new developments in general delinquency.

The laws in regard to labour, which were based on the idea of a permanent conflict of interests between employers and employed, were unable to maintain industrial peace, which is so necessary to national existence. The increase in unemployment heightened the existing tension to a point where it was becoming intolerable.

The sources of the nation's food supplies were in a precarious condition. The farmers were heavily in debt and, moreover, their farms were difficult to work profitably owing to the dividing up of the land according to the hereditary system.

Furthermore, a large class of aliens, namely Jews, had migrated to Germany from the East, especially during the War, and had gained a decisive influence in politics, law, the learned professions, education and in control of the cultural organizations. Although the Jews represented only one percent, of the whole population, they had secured a footing in nearly all the key positions in public life.

[1]) The expression „federative states" is used several times throughout this article and much of the recent constitutional reform affects the position of these states. As the average outsider has been accustomed to look on Germany as a political unit, it may be well to explain that before the War Germany was a Confederate League bearing the name: German Empire, under the hereditary presidency of the King of Prussia, who bore the title: „German Emperor". In 1918 the kings and princes of the various federative states abdicated; but the Weimar Constitution retained the principal federative states in the form of republics, with their independent government and parliaments. These were: Prussia, Bavaria, Saxony, Württemberg, and the minor states: Baden, Thuringia, Hessen, Mecklenburg, Oldenburg, Brunswick, Anhalt, Lippe, Schaumburg-Lippe. In addition to these there were Free Hanse Cities of Lübeck, Bremen and Hamburg.

The political transformation which took place in 1933 brought with it the introduction of many practical reforms in the realm of law. The threatening collapse proved clearly that the existing laws were inadequate to the vital needs of the nation and that a change in juridical practice, or the passing of individual measures or supplementary laws, would have been insufficient to eliminate such profound defects. The situation could be effectively remedied only by creating an entirely new order, based on the new political principles which the National Revolution had introduced into national life.

But a new and permanent system could not be created at once. Therefore the Reich Government did not hurriedly draw up new codes; but for the time being it had to content itself with introducing supplementary laws which would clear the way for further developments and prepare the ground for a future systematic code. The laws to which the legislator would give final form would have to arise from the life of the nation itself. The Academy of German Law was set up as a public corporation and within the framework of this organization a number of committees are doing the preliminary juristic work which is necessary before the new codes can be finally shaped. At the present time the Academy is principally engaged on that section of the code which will establish and guarantee the position of the family as an integrant unit in the national community.

The whole body of new legislation is to be inspired by the main ideas which dominate the German mind today: namely, the idea of Leadership, the idea of the People, and the idea of the Community of the People.

In order to understand what is the basis of the new legislation one must have a clear grasp of what the Germans mean today when they speak of the Community of the People, the Volksgemeinschaft. This idea of the people is based on the fact that their members have a homogenous national character. When great multitudes act together, conscious of their historical unity and determined to pursue the fulfilment of one mission as a national unit, then they are a political unit also. Of this political unit those who are its leaders form an integrant part. All the members form one corporation which is called the Volksgemeinschaft, literally, Folk Community. Now the laws that govern the Folk Community emerge from the inner spiritual, political and material necessities which have developed through a common historical experience. Therefore in the National Socialist sense law is not the expression of the State's authority, to which the people must submit as a passive and inert mass. In harmony with the concept of the Folk Community, law is part of the life of the people. The legislator draws out and gives organic expression to the sense of what is just and unjust, the feeling for what is good and what is evil, which is inherent in the soul of the people. Therefore the starting point of the National Socialist conception of law is the people, not the State. The task of the State is to see that the law is carried out.

The legal system which was introduced into Germany towards the close of the middle ages was based on the principles of Roman jurisprudence. These principles were revived and reformulated in the nineteenth century. They were entirely foreign to German traditions and they proved a perpetual hindrance to the development of a uniform system of German law. The German people have not a traditional legal system such as that through which the Anglo-Saxon people have found expression for their inner sense of justice and which forms the foundation of all their legal ideas. In many spheres of German life the introduction of a system foreign to the nature of the people separated the operation of the law from the naturally developing life of the people. The legislative efforts made by the Second Empire ever since 1871 failed to close the breach between the legal instincts of the people, developed out of their traditions, and the ideas of learned jurists. The great work of codification carried out under the Second Empire was done by men who had been trained in the ideas of Roman law. It is a well known fact that this code was soon shown to need reform; and yet all attempts to improve it have failed.

One special factor that played a large part in bringing about an estrangement between the laws and the natural legal instincts of the people was the dominant position which the Jews acquired in the legal profession. In Berlin alone 1835 or 54% of the lawyers practising in 1932 were of Jewish extraction. In interpreting and applying the German law they were guided by the legal ideas of their own race. The difference between the Jewish and German ideas of law is indicated by the fact that up to the nineteenth century the Jews received special treatment in the courts in view of their different notion of what was legally right and wrong. Special forms of oath were drawn up for them and they could not be punished for receiving stolen goods. The Law of September 15, 1935 put a stop to the further predominance of the Jews; but there are still many Jewish lawyers in Berlin. Out of the total of number of lawyers 943 or 32,6% were Jews in 1937.

In the National Socialist State the Führer is the lawgiver; but he himself is an integral part of the Folk Community. And so the National Socialist law follows a different principle from that on which the status of a dictatorship is legally based. In order to maintain the rule of the dictator external compulsion is necessary; but leadership depends on the unconditional authority of conviction. Where there is compulsion the individual feels that he has no responsibility to the community or to the future, but it is just on this feeling of individual responsibility that the National Socialist law is based. The highest honour and the highest ideal consist in the service of the community. Honour and internal as well as external freedom are essential to the existence of the community.

Therefore, as the ideal of the Folk Community forms the basic principle of National Socialism, a legal form must be found which expresses that principle and gives each German his place as a constituent part of the national community. The individual does not stand isolated over against the community. A community must be made up of members. These members are not the mere objects of its rule or social institutions. Each represents the community in himself and has his field of activity within it. The total activity of the community depends on the strength and achievements of the single members. Therefore the member is not in the positon of a subject who has no rights on his own account, as is the case in the absolutist State. The rights of the community are his rights and on him depend its honour and freedom. But he occupies this position for the sake of the community and not for the sake of the individual. It implies political duties as well as political rights.

The National Socialist Revolution did not merely mean the external collapse of the existing State. It implied also a change in the fundamental ideas of the State as such and its laws. Therefore we should be mistaken if we regarded it merely as a revolt against the evils, which existed in 1933. The National Socialist law rather represents something essentially new, which is capable of infusing a new life into all traditional forms. Führer and people, Folk Community and German citizen, constitute the essential elements of the National Socialist conception of law. And the purpose of the new laws is to give form to that conception.

The National Socialist Revolution was not, like other revolutions, carried out by a breach of the constitution. The constitutional transition from the Weimar Republic to the National Socialist State was given its constitutional form in the law establishing the Leadership of the Reich, which was passed on March 24, 1933. On that date, and by a majority of 441 to 93, the constitutionally elected Reichstag transferred the leadership of the Reich to the Reich Government. That meant the abandonment of the existing method of legislation. In passing this law the Reichstag was acting within its rights as defined by the Weimar Constitution; for the latter put no restriction on the ambit of such laws as might be enacted for the purpose of altering the Constitution. The stipulated majority had been attained. The forms which the Constitution required had been observed. Through this law the Reichstag declared its approval of the government proclamation issued by the Reich Chancellor. This proclamation laid down the lines along which the work of reconstruction, within and without, was to proceed. But the political significance of the law goes much further. It acknowledges the leadership as invested in the community of the German people. Therewith was abolished the division which the variety of political parties had caused in the life of the nation. The Government of the Reich was entrusted with the task of carrying out the new reform. By assuming the legislative function the Government did not thereby introduce a transitory state of emergency which would eventually be terminated by the restoration of the old state of affairs. Once and for all the authority of the leaders of the State was recognized, and in their hands the legislative and executive powers were combined.

It is not without importance for the development of the legislative activities which followed its assumption of power that the National Socialist Revolution was accomplished without any violent external breach of the law, although it profoundly influenced the life of the people as a whole and also that of the individual German. Up to the present day the Weimar Constitution has not been formally abolished. But when the revolution became a fact the Weimar Constitution lost all practical importance as the basis of the State, since the national life had burst its forms and was seeking new forms of legal expression. The principles of the Weimar Republic would be in conflict with the national constitution in which the German people live to-day, although as yet no written constitution has been drawn up. The Reich Government did not hold it to be their task to issue a new constitution. The first foundations have been laid and therewith the ground has been made ready for a new legal structure which will be a living embodiment of the national life.

Apart from the law regarding the Reich Leadership the following laws which, on account of their fundamental importance, may be regarded as constitutional laws have been passed: The Coordination Acts of March 31 and April 7, 1933, the Plebiscite Act of July 14, 1933, the Act establishing the unity of Party with State of December 1, 1933, the Succession Act of August 1, 1934, the Regional Governors and Local Government Act of January 30, 1933, the Fighting Services Act of March 16, 1935, the Reich Flag Act, the Citizenship of the Reich Act, and the Act for the Protection of German Blood and German Honour of September 15, 1935, the Act reuniting Austria and Germany of March 13, 1938.

From this list one can see that the centre of gravity of the State does not lie in its external structure and in its position in relation to something outside of the State itself. The State is determined rather by the internal relationship of the people, whom it is meant to serve. State, Party, Economic System and Judicial System, are only secondary factors which exist for the service of the people. This is clearly shown in the Führer's decree of August 8, 1934, in which he called upon the Reich Minister of the Interior to prepare a referendum on the decision of the Government to appoint the Führer President of the Reich.

"I desire that the German People should give their explicit approval to the decision of the Cabinet whereby the functions of the former Reich President were transferred to me and therewith combined with those of the office of Reich Chancellor. Absolutely convinced as I am that all power in the State proceeds from the People, I request that the decision of the Cabinet, with any additions necessary to be made, should be presented to the German People without delay for them to express their opinion on these measures in a free plebiscite."

This relation between People and State shows how false it is to characterise the National Socialist State as a totalitarian State. A State which itself works for an end and is not an end in itself cannot in any sense be called a totalitarian State, in which the centre of gravity has been shifted to the disadvantage of the individual. In such a case the defenceless individual is confronted by an all-powerful State. But the National Socialist State exists to serve the People and therewith each member. Each German is a member of the whole and therewith called upon to cooperate in the life of the State. The term, totality, properly applies to the National Socialist Weltanschauung, which is embodied in the whole people and activates every branch of national existence.

The most important of the constitutional laws are those designed to maintain the purity of German blood. The word People does not mean for National Socialism the total number of German subjects, nor does it mean merely all those with a common history. The people is a political factor which has its own being, and in order to preserve this being its blood must be kept pure and healthy. The foundation of the national being is race. It would be a waste of time to argue about the constituents of race. Races are the stones with which God has built up mankind and our task can only be to preserve them as such. This is the aim of the Act for the Protection of German Blood and German Honour, which was passed by the Reichstag on September 15, 1935. The Act ensures that the German people shall be clearly separated from the Jewish people living on the same national territory. This separation is a strict one, and its results have often seemed to bear harshly on the individual. But only a complete separation in life and law can make it tolerable for two peoples to live together in the same territory. This is to be attained by preventing every kind of blood mixture. Only if there is a healthy mutual feeling that the other race is foreign, can hatred and contempt of the one race by the other be avoided. This Act secures for the future the necessary biological unity of the German people. The Reich Citizen Act of September 15, 1935, supplements the other act in the political sphere. It makes a distinction within the State between German citizens, who are the representatives and foundation of its greatness, and those persons who merely reside in the State for their own profit. "Only those who are nationals can be citizens of the State. They alone are nationals who are of German blood, no distinction of religious creed being made. Therefore no Jew can be looked upon as a national." (Party Programme, Point 4). Reich Citizens alone possess full political rights. They alone can exercise the franchise, can occupy official positions, can take part in the Reichstag elections or plebiscites. Only they can become members of the Reichstag or of a State council, a provincial council, town council or district council, or may become civil servants or hold honorary public office. A condition for the granting of these rights is that such persons should be capable and willing loyally to serve the German people and the German Reich.

When this distinction had been made between citizens of the Reich, whose rights are granted to them in the form of a certificate of Reich Citizenship, and Reich subjects, who merely belong to the German State as protective units, it became necessary to regulate the position of those who are only partly of Jewish blood and are at present domiciled in Germany. The lot of such persons, who stand between two essentially different races, is especially difficult and has been the subject of much discussion. To solve the question it was necessary to make far-reaching concessions. These consisted in laying down the rule that all those who have less than three Jewish grandparents and do not declare their allegiance to the Jewish people should not count as Jews and should be allowed under certain circumstances to be absorbed into the German nation. Only those subjects who are descended from three or four Jewish grandparents count as Jews. Subjects who have two Jewish grandparents can get the permission to marry persons of German blood. They and the subject who only has one Jewish grandparent may in future be absorbed into the German body politic under certain conditions. This regulation benefits those who have one or two Jewish grandparents. But it could not have been successful if it had not been accompanied by the repeal of the Aryan regulations regarding private clubs and societies etc. But it has been made impossible for all time that the country should ever again be ruled politically or culturally by Jews. The more severe restrictions embodied in legal enactments or party regulations remain as they were. The German people will be robust enough to stand this admixture of foreign blood if they are in future protected from any further mixture. In special cases the Führer can grant exemption from the Act.

The National Socialist Party is the organization which represents the political life of the people. It is the only political organization in the German Reich; for the Act of July 15, 1933, stipulated that, the old party system having been superseded, no new parties should be formed. The task of the Party is to inspire each individual with a feeling of duty towards the nation. The Party does not owe its position to the State but exists in its own right. Actually the present State existed ideally in the Party before it was established in fact. All the laws passed by the new State only carry into effect the principles of the Party and the Party holds the dominant position in political life. Yet, in spite of holding this dominant position, those Germans who are not members of the Party are not thereby precluded from playing their part in political life; for the people as a whole have become the repository of political power through the National Socialist Revolution. The position of the Party in relation to the State was further defined in a special Act providing for unification of the Party with the State. This Act was passed on December, 1, 1933. In practice the unity thus legally established had been already brought about through the appointment of the Führer as Head of the State and through a widespread personal union in Party and State offices. The Act supplies the legal basis of this practical union. But the Act did not aim as drawing a clear line of demarcation and division between the various spheres of activity carried on by the Party and the State respectively. Its aim was rather to open a way for combined work and collaboration. Externally the new positon was given formal expression in the appointment of the Führer's Deputy as Cabinet Minister without portfolio. As such his duties do not appertain to any one department of State. He devotes himself exclusively to Party affairs and supervises the influence it exercises on many of the internal affairs of the State. This combination of State and Party has given the National Socialist State its characteristic form. This may be observed in all departments of public life.

The Reich Leadership Law, subsequently amended and supplemented by the Reich Reconstruction Act of January 30, 1934, represented a rejection of the hitherto existing forms of representative democracy. It placed new emphasis on direct democracy by means of elections and plebiscites, the adoption of which was greatly extended. Formerly the mistake was frequently made of identifying democracy with peculiar institutions allied to it. For this reason people generally assumed that because Germany had abandoned the system of having several political parties and the system of legislation through parliamentary vote, she had thereby abandoned the democratic principle itself. But democracy signifies the sovereignty of the people and implies that political leaders should be responsible to and representative of the majority of the people. Accordingly if we consider the life of the German people from within we must admit that, independently of the dispute about democracy or dictatorship, a fundamental change has taken place in Germany and that this change amounts to the establishment of a direct form of democracy. Nobody can say that the Führer has not recognized the sovereignty of the people as the supreme ruling principle in the State. He has repeatedly submitted his work to the judgment of the people and no one has more right to act and speak in the name of the people than he has. The democratic principle is also being put into practice through the fact that we are steadily developing a political leadership as an emergent from the mass of the people. A process of selection whereby really capable men belonging to the masses of the people can be appointed to positions of leadership without regard to origin or possessions, superior fitness only being taken into account. In his speech to the Reichstag on January 30, 1937, the Führer said: "By this process of selection, which will follow the laws of Nature and the dictates of human reason, those among our people who show the greatest natural ability will be appointed to positions in the political leadership of the nation. In making the selection no consideration will be given to birth or ancestry, name or wealth, but only to the question of whether or not the candidate has a natural vocation for those higher positions of leadership."

The Act of July 14, 1933, set forth the legal procedure for the carrying out of a plebiscite. It authorises the Reich Government to obtain the verdict of the people as sovereign power, not only on matters of legislation but also on other measures. If a particular law be the subject of a plebiscite the favourable verdict of that plebiscite is not merely an act of approval but is in itself a formal enactment. Within the first four years of the National Socialist regime there have been four Reichstag elections and three plebiscites. The subjects of the plebiscites were respectively Germany's withdrawal from the League of Nations, the repudiation of the military clauses of the Versailles Treaty, the assumption by Adolf Hitler of the office of President of the Reich, and the reunion of Austria and Germany.

The national unity brought about by the Revolution called for a corresponding unity of the State in accordance with the unity of the popular will. Thus a long-standing desire on the part of the best elements of the German people finds its fulfilment in constitutional law. The federal structure of the German Reich had its origin in dynastic rule which, even under the Second Empire, was sovereign in the respective federative states. The presidential decree of January 28, 1933, already empowered the Government of the Reich to take the necessary steps, by the appointment of Reich Commissioners, for the maintenance of law and order in the various federative states. The first decisive step towards constitutional unification was the Act of March 31, 1933. This Act stipulated that the composition of the parliaments of the federative states and also of the local councils should be altered in accordance with the results of the Reichstag election. Therewith those bodies were given a uniform political direction and the entrusting of legislative power to the federative states according to the principles laid down in the Reich Leadership Act led to the unification of political leadership. The dissolution of the Reichstag on November 14, 1933, led automatically to the dissolution of the federative parliaments and the latter were not re-elected. The Reconstruction Act of January 20, 1934, legally abolished the federative parliaments. The Act of April 7, 1933, subordinated the activities of the federative governments to the Government of the Reich. A Governor was appointed for each of the larger federative states, such as Bavaria and Saxony, and the smaller federative states were divided into groups, a Governor being placed over each group. These Governors took over a number of duties formerly carried on by the federative governments. As representatives of the Führer, the Governors have to see that the work of the federative governments is directed towards consolidating the political unity of the Reich. One of the principal duties of the Governor is to appoint and dismiss prime ministers and other ministers of the federative governments. He draws up and promulgates the laws for his respective federative state. He appoints civil servants and may dismiss those not appointed by the Reich. The Act of January 30, 1934, transferred the last remnants of federative sovereignty to the Reich. In virtue of this measure the governments of the federative states became mere channels of Reich administration. Legislation in the federative states requires the approval of the competent Reich Minister. The administration of justice has been taken over directly by the Reich. But in spite of this centralization of all power in the hands of the Reich Government the position of a Governor is maintained in the Act of January 30, 1935. He is a link between the Reich and the federative authorities, and has been entrusted with some of the functions of the Reich Government so that, where necessary, special local conditions can be taken into consideration. In this way, notwithstanding a unification of the Reich, the traditional characters of the various branches of the German people will be maintained.

But the laws which have been promulgated up to now do not represent the final stage of constitutional development. They merely clear the way for further development. The formation of a new Constitution is to take place not from above, but from below, from the smallest cells in the community of the State, the Communes. They were therefore the first to receive their Constitution, embodied in the Local Government Act of 1935. But this Act is not only of interest for the political life of the Communes. In many respects it is an attempt to try out on a small scale things which may eventually be of importance for the Constitution of the State. The Local Community Act is thus one of the foundations of the National Socialist State, and on the ground prepared by it the new structure of the Reich will be raised. The provisions contained in the Local Community Act are derived from old and valuable German ideas of law. Its most important part was advocated by Baron von Stein, for the aim is to give the Communes a great measure of independence so that they can contribute to the fullest extent to the good of the whole nation. The form which was chosen for the realization of this purpose represents one of the first examples of the National Socialist idea of the Folk Community as applied to the administration. The Local Community Act does not therefore look upon the Commune as merely a technical and economic administrative unit, but regards it as a community formed according to the special conditions of the neighbourhood. The law encourages a sturdy independence in each district so that each citizen may, through his work in the narrower community of the Commune, cooperate sensibly and with a full sense of responsibility in the work of the larger community of the nation. He is therefore no longer a mere number among many millions, but has his special function in political life. For this reason the Commune is not regarded simply as a passive organ for carrying out the commands of the State, but within the limited framework of its district bears the responsibility for fulfilling those tasks which concern the National community. The nature of German local government can be summarized under the following three headings: -

1. In principle the Commune has to carry out its own tasks on its own responsibility. State supervision is limited to ensuring that the administration is according to the laws and in harmony with the general policy of the State. But this supervision cannot lead to the State taking over the organs of administration when it disagrees with the measures adopted by a Commune. The Supervisory Board can only prevent the putting into force of decrees which run counter to the political aims of the Reich government: it cannot compel the local authority to carry out any particular measures. The Commune is left to solve its own problems in its own way. It is thus made sure that the State supervision will in no way hamper the initiative and enterprise of the local authorities. It must be left to the Commune to correct any mistakes which are made. In this way every member of the Commune is trained in political sound thinking.

2. In the person of the Mayor the Commune possesses its own particular organ for the forming of decisions. Neither he nor the Aldermen are appointed by the State. The Mayor is appointed by the Commune itself, and the Aldermen by the Deputies of the Party. The Local Community Act stipulates that those citizens are to be made Aldermen whose professions are representative of the Commune and its special problems. This means that only those who are in close touch with the life of the Commune and feel themselves therefore naturally responsible for its welfare are qualified to be Councillors.

3. The citizen of the Commune is called upon to play a part in the making of decisions and to cooperate in the administration. The new Act is not concerned to ensure that every citizen should once a year, by means of a secret vote, symbolically assert his responsibility for the local administration: it is concerned to bring about the actual collaboration of each citizen and to ensure that each member of the community shall bear his actual share of responsibility. The maintenance of certain technical forms is no guarantee that real self-government exists. The latter is guaranteed only when each citizen not merely has the right, but also the duty to cooperate in the administration. There are many honorary workers, and the Local Community Act requires that no one should refuse an honorary position. The extent to which this honorary collaboration has been introduced is shown by the following: — of the 51,311 Communes in Germany 96,03% are ruled over by Mayors whose posts are honorary. Out of a total 138,895 Aldermen 99,42% are honorary. There are in addition 291,234 Councillors and 305,248 Assistant Councillors; so that 777,973 citizens hold honorary positions whilst only 2,770 devote themselves to local government work as their chief profession.

Like the State, the Commune is built up on the principle of leadership. This principle does not merely mean that one person has the right to lead, it implies also that this leader is the representative embodiment of the community. The position of leader implies responsibility for the community as well as authority in the community based on the work done for it. The Mayor of the Commune must not be content to administer the Commune according to the law and to increase its economic efficiency. He must not look upon the Commune merely as an economic unit, but must always bear in mind that it is made up of individual men and women who are his fellow-countrymen. He must therefore always seek their collaboration and not retire into his office to lead there a secluded existence. The Local Government Act presupposes a living contact between the Mayor and his Commune. Where such relations do not already exist the Act opens the way for their introduction. This is the basic element in the whole Act, and the life of the Commune is founded on it. The special work to be done in each Commune depends on local conditions, canal construction e.g., which goes beyond the limits of any individual Commune is undertaken by associations of Communes. Cultural policy presents a wide sphere of activity for the Commune. The encouragement of cultural activity is especially important for the Commune, because in local government it is easier than in State policy to establish contact with the individual citizen. The community feeling which grows from people living in close proximity is a good basis for cultural work. In the economic sphere the activity of the Commune is restricted by the fact that it may not enter into competition with the economic activity of its members. The community can only undertake work which individual initiative has failed to accomplish. The Commune is not on that account bound to confine itself to the provision of water and electricity. It can also devote itself to other tasks which are of service to the community. But commercial undertakings must not be carried on merely for their own sake and for the sake of the profit they may yield.

Since the number of towns with over 10,000 inhabitants has grown considerably, we find a professional bureaucracy side by side with the honorary workers. The ordered administration of these towns demands a high degree of legal knowledge such as the honorary worker cannot always be assumed to possess. But these professional officials too are subject to the Mayor. They act only as the auxiliaries of local government. This legal administration is not therefore in any sort of opposition to the political administration, but is rather an integral part of it. In every Commune a Deputy of the Party is appointed, and this Deputy has to exercise his influence in such a way as to ensure, in accordance with the unity of Party and State, that the work of local government is in line with the general policy of the Reich. He must not interfere in matters of everyday administration. But even in cases where the Mayor is bound to act in collaboration with the Party Deputy the former is still held personally responsible for decisions suggested to him by the Deputy. If a measure taken by the Mayor is vetoed by the Party Deputy, and if the Mayor nevertheless still holds such a measure to be necessary, he must lay the matter before the higher departments of the State administration for their verdict. As far as finance is concerned the powers of local authorities are restricted. The extraordinarily widespread indebtedness of the period before 1933 made it necessary to strengthen the supervisory powers of the State. But the Act concerning Taxes on Real Estate and Commercial Transactions, of December 1, 1936, has already increased the financial independence of the Communes to a considerable extent. A further easing of the restrictions is planned for the future. The German conception of self-government does not regard the financial part as the decisive one. The essential is the development of community life, the inculcation of sound political ideas and a sense of political responsibility. The Local Government Act had laid down very strict provision to ensure that the economic policy of the Communes would be carried on in an orderly and sane manner. The Local Community Act also gave the Commune the right to make its own laws. The Commune may formulate and enact a special Constitution for itself, in accordance with the principles laid down in the Act, and this Constitution does not require the approval of the Supervisory Authority in so far as it does not affect the position of the Commune within the framework of the State.

Apart from the Local Community Act two further aspects of life within the State have been given their final form:- By the Act of May 21, 1935, military service was declared a service of honour to the German People. The Army, Navy and Air Force are the only bodies entitled to bear weapons for the State and they form a training school for soldierly qualities. Further, by the Act of June 26, 1935, general compulsory Labour Service was introduced. This institution plays a vital part in the life of the people as moulded by National Socialist ideas. Its purpose is to imbue every young German with a proper respect for manual work and with the right attitude to labour.

CRIME AND PUNISHMENT

In no field of German law was the desire for reform and for a revision of the existing code so strong as in the field of criminal law. As far back as 1900 the Congress of German Jurists had stated that the reform of the criminal code was one of the most urgent tasks which legislators had to fulfil. From 1909 to 1927 no less than five drafts were published; but the work remained nevertheless uncompleted. This continual discussion of reform and search for a solution led to a regrettable weakening in the position of the judicature and made the combatting of crime more difficult. For this reason we were compelled to direct our attention first of all to the reform of the criminal code which, more than any other part of the law, expresses the political attitude of the nation. In Autumn 1933 the Reich Minister of Justice, acting on behalf of the Führer, appointed a Commission for the drawing up of a criminal code; and this commission, after three years' work, completed a draft which has now been presented to the Reich Government for its consideration and approval. The draft itself has indeed not yet been made known in all its details, but the reports published about it have attracted considerable attention. Detailed opinions have been expressed on it, so that the underlying ideas are now generally known. The public discussion of the plans in the draft has done much to clarify people's ideas on the subject, so that the ground has been well prepared for the reception of the new law.

The plans of reform have already been anticipated by two Acts the consideration of which will enable us to get an idea of the present position of criminal law. Both are quite at variance with the principles on which criminal laws have been based hitherto. The latter sought not only to protect society, but also to protect the criminal against the arbitrary actions of society. The two new laws seek simply to protect society against every sort of criminal attack. The task of the criminal code must not be to safeguard the lawbreakers but only to contribute towards the preservation and safeguarding of the people and to combat those asocial elements which seek either to avoid their duties towards the community as a whole, or to offend against the interests of the people (Hitler, January 30, 1937). Above persons and things stands the community of the people and any breach of loyalty is a legal offence. The interpretation of the statutes according to the mere letter of the law had therefore to be abolished. The Supplementary Law of June 28, 1935, lays down that a punishment may be inflicted not only when the law prescribes it, but also when a sound sense of justice requires punishment for the act committed, and when the fundamental idea underlying a paragraph of the criminal code is applicable to such an act. Hitherto criminal law had compelled the judge to keep closely to the letter of the law. He had to do this because apart from the existing statutes no law was recognized. A judgment, therefore, which was not based on a strict interpretation of the words of a law necessarily appeared arbitrary. If, like National Socialism, one does not limit the law to the written statutes, one must admit that there may be cases not specified in the statute which are in effect just as criminal as acts enumerated therein and therefore ought to be punished.

The Supplementary Act of June 28, 1935, does not state that judgment should be based on the subjective feeling of the judge. It requires the latter to take account of the people's sense of justice and then to decide according to an objective standard—the root principles of the particular paragraph of the criminal code—whether actions similar to those punishable in the law have been committed. Only if such is the case he may inflict punishment, and this punishment must be such as is prescribed by the law. The judge is thus bound by the law; for every law represents a political decision of the Country's leaders, the judge having therefore only that amount of freedom which the law specifically allows. The law does not regard the people's sense of justice as being merely any particular view of law held by the masses, but rather as the sound and dispassionate judgment of the average citizen. The judge must therefore in future base his judgments on the law of the German People.

With this supplementary law the well-known principle that only those crimes can be punished which are exactly described in the law (nullum crimen sine lege) has been abandoned. This principle has been described as one of the foundations of criminal law in all States with European civilization, and for this reason it was also included in the Weimar Constitution. The study of comparative law reveals, however, that this view is incorrect. By "lege" we understand only statutory law and not judicial decisions and prescriptive law, however generally recognized the latter may be. In Great Britain most of the criminal law has been revised and regulated by statutes. But homicide is still subject to Common Law. However strictly statutory law may be interpreted the principle "nullum crimen sine lege" cannot be maintained here. Apart from this the English Statutes, through the variety of their language and the rules of interpretation contained in them, give the judge an amount of freedom quite unknown in the German courts. But prescriptive law exists outside the United Kingdom, as for instance in three Swiss Cantons. In Denmark the criminal code goes so far as to admit the application of the law to cases analogous to those specified therein. In Norway,. Sweden, and Finnland this manner of interpretation is indeed not explicitly permitted by the law, but in practice the analogy principle is applied in many important cases. It must, however, be admitted that the unrestricted use of analogy would open the way to all sorts of interpretation, so the judges themselves might finally evolve a law which would be remote from the life of the people and opposed to that popular sense of justice which should be the source of all unwritten law. For this reason German law provides for a combination of root principles contained in the written law and the popular sense of justice, so that these two factors may correct each other. A number of the Federal States of North America have also included in their Criminal Codes the provision that the application of the law must not be restricted to a literal interpretation, but must take account of the basic ideas of the law. The Criminal Code of the State of New York contains, in Article 675, the provision that anyone who commits acts against the person or property of another, who disturbs the peace or the public health, or offends against decency, may be punished, although the act be not included in the written catalogue of punishable acts. The claim that the administration of public law in all civilized states demands strict interpretation of the law and forbids analogy cannot be maintained. Even in those countries where this rule is to be found a law may be so loosely drafted or a crime so widely defined that in practice the judge is given complete freedom to decide as to what acts the law applies. Thus when the Supreme Court of Switzerland asserts that a person can only be prosecuted if he infringes some law there is no doubt that what is meant is that no other punishment may be inflicted but what is prescribed in the law. But this principle does not mean that those who draw up a law are compelled to give a detailed list of all offences which might be punishable under that law. They are, on the contrary, at liberty to substitute technical names for groups of crimes or to use some general conception of crime. Thus in the application of a statutory law the conception of larceny may be interpreted by the judge according to his own views of law. This practice too is provided for in the Supplementary Law of June 28, 1935. But it has to be stated that the departure from the principle nullum crimen sine lege, does not mean abandomement of nulla poena sine lege. Only such kinds of punishments can be inflicted wich are known to the code.

The purpose of criminal law is to defend the community against all that may endanger it and therefore the Supplementary Law of November 24, 1933, contains provisions to combat habitual crime, and measures to safeguard the public. Formerly the criminal had to be released after he had served his sentence, even when it could be foreseen that his asocial disposition would lead him to abuse his liberty by committing further acts against the social order. How often did the unhappy mother of murdered children or violated girls ask the Court if it was really necessary to set the criminal free again to attack unfortunate creatures and inflict serious injury on the community. But this law enables the judge to sentence dangerous habitual criminals to a severer punishment than is prescribed for normal cases. The extent to which the punishment may be increased is stated in the Supplementary Law itself, A dangerous habitual criminal is a person who repeatedly—generally speaking, three times—commits an offence, and who shows from the general circumstances of the cases, that he not only habitually commits crimes but that he is, for the future as well as the present, a danger to society. These provisions therefore refer only to serious crimes, and not to such misconduct as habitual begging etc. Apart from increasing the punishment, the law prescribes preventive detention as a final means of protecting the public. This is not considered a penal measures. The crime itself is punished by imprisonment, but if that is not sufficient to protect the community for the future the criminal is interned in order to keep him from doing further harm. This internment lasts until the criminal is no longer held to be a danger to society, and a periodical examination ensures that the term is not extended beyond what is necessary. A further protective measure is the castration of dangerous habitual sex criminals, a measure which exists also in certain North American States and in Denmark. This is indeed a permanent and serious interference with the bodily integrity of the criminal, but it makes it possible to preserve him from a complete loss of freedom or long internment. By means of this operation the urge to commit sexual offences is at anyrate so weakened that it no longer represents a source of danger. The Law also makes it possible to have a criminal transferred to a home for inebriates or to a labour settlement, if there is a prospect of educative methods being successful in combatting the criminal tendency. In the same way the Law provides that, in cases where the Court is bound to acquit the accused on account of insanity, it may order the accused to be kept in an asylum or home. The success of these measures for dealing with criminals is shown by the following figures: The year 1935 showed, in comparison to 1932, the following reduction in crime: Homicide 33.9%, robbery with violence 64.2%, arson 22.8%. (The reduction in the figures for larceny cannot be given as a basis for comparison since they have been affected by a number of amnesty laws.) Those who have had any experience of practical work in connection with the fight against crime can bear witness to the deterrent effect which these measures have on habitual criminals. The Supplementary Law of June 25, 1935, also contains a provision which, based on the idea of the national community, makes it obligatory on every individual citizen to render assistance in an emergency. Anyone who does not assist in cases of general emergency or accidents, although he was in a position to do so without endangering his own person, is liable to punishment.

Although these two supplementary laws have perhaps anticipated the most vital measures in the new Criminal Code, the latter will nevertheless contain so many innovations that we must give a short account of it here. The new code is above all a further step on the way towards the establishment of a pure principle of guilt. In doing so it takes account not only of the psychological connection between the criminal and his crime, but also ethical considerations. In future criminal law will hold that for guilt to be established it is necessary not only to demonstrate that the criminal knew what the results of a crime would be and intentionally agreed to them, or that the offence was brought about through a lack of reasonable care. It will be necessary to show also that the offender knew, or might have known, that he was doing wrong. A person may commit an act which has only just been made an offence by a newly promulgated law, or the circumstances may be so complicated that this may be a reason why he could not know he was doing wrong. It has always been considered unfair that such a person should be punished merely because he was conscious of what he was doing at the time of the offence. Thus an old woman of German nationality who moved from Switzerland in order to settle down in Germany and knew nothing of the foreign exchange regulations was condemned for not having registered a small foreign account, although there was no doubt as to her ignorance of the legal regulations. Since the jurisprudence of the future will regard crime not merely as an offence against the explicit provisions of the law, but also as an attack on the community, as an act directed against the life of the nation, it will be necessary to take into account whether an offender himself recognized, or could have recognized, this aspect of his offence. Judges will indeed have to investigate very carefully the offender's claim that he was unconscious of having done wrong, and the claim will certainly not be allowed if it refers to acts which do not accord with the fundamental views of the nation on right or wrong. The claim that a criminal did not know that stealing and murder are forbidden will obviously not be entertained, but in the above mentioned case of the old lady the accused would be acquitted, which would only be in harmony with sound ideas of justice. The demand that the punishment of an offender requires not only that the latter knew what he was doing, but also that he knew he was doing wrong, represents an important departure from the doctrine of guilt as incorporated in the criminal law of all European States. It means in fact that in criminal law justice and ethics are no longer fundamentally separate. If we realize that the individual no longer exists apart from the community, and therefore can no longer have a distinct, and perhaps different ethical code, but is, as member of the community, the representative of its ethical views, then we must admit that this change in the conception of criminal guilt follows inevitably. Attempted crime will also be treated differently. According to the law existing hitherto, this was punished only in reference to serious crimes and then to a lesser degree than for the crime actually committed. An attempt is distinguished from a crime actually committed by the fact that the purpose of the crime has not been completely attained. Since the coming criminal law concentrates on the intention to commit a crime it must punish any attempt to do so and only admits a mitigation of penalty when the non-accomplishment of the crime can be shown to be due to a low intensity of will on the part of the criminal.

The second part of the draft, which describes the separate penal offences, has also been extended to an important degree. The grouping has been carried out according to the importance of the object of the criminal act. First and foremost comes the protection of the people against crimes of treason, then comes the protection of national resources, of the nation's life (race and heredity, defensive power, labour power, national health), of the moral and spiritual ideals of the people (marriage and the family, morality and religious beliefs, respect for the dead, protection of animals), of commerce and national property, and further the maintenance of national institutions and order (leadership of the people, public order, justice) and the maintenance of honesty (offences against good faith, property, and criminal self-interest). In working out this new criminal law it was possible to draw on the results of decades of work done by learned jurists. But the fundamental provisions of former supplementary laws have also been incorporated in order to assure the uniformity of criminal law.

One of the most important parts of the new criminal code are the rules concerning penalties and the assessment of the penalties for each particular law. There has been no important change in the method of punishment. The future criminal law will also contain the death penalty, penal servitude and imprisonment. It provides, in addition, for fines, but makes these dependent on the financial circumstances of the individual, the daily income of the offender being taken as a basis for calculation. Penal arrest is abandoned. Imprisonment in a fortress as 'custodia honesta' is maintained. In laying down the separate penalties care has been taken in regard to punishments of extreme serverity, such as the death penalty, to provide the alternative of penal sevitude, so that the judge himself may have the possibility of commuting the death penalty in cases where the degree of culpability may not equal the objective wickedness of the crime. Above all the punishment inflicted in each individual case must depend on the actual guilt of the offender. In meting out punishment the judge must take into account the criminal intent, in cases of negligence the degree of carelessness and the indifference of the offender as regards the outcome of his offence, also the necessity of safeguarding the community, and the danger and injury caused by the offender, as well as his behaviour after the offence. Thus the law aims at imposing penalties which will correspond to each crime viewed as a whole, for only then can criminal law be an effective weapon for the protection of society. It is not intended to introduce the punishment of flogging, for the effects of this punishment in other countries have not been such as to recommend its use.

The recasting of criminal law will also lead to new rules for the trial of criminal cases. The great emphasis laid on the community in criminal law will imply an extensive participation of the lay element in the administration of justice. The preliminary proceedings, which aim at clearing up the facts of the crime, will be placed in the hands of the Public Prosecutor. In important points he will have to cooperate with a judge. In the main trial the judge, who independently administers justice in the name of the people, is entirely free from the influence of the public prosecutor, both as regards the conduct of the trial and the handling of the case. The establishment of special courts for individual groups of crime which are specially important and delicate, e. g. political offences, will be maintained as permanent institutions, since their utility has been proved. A special degree and special kind of expert knowledge is required in dealing with these crimes, so that they can only be entrusted to judges trained in this special sphere. But work on the rules for the conduct of trials has only just begun, so that it is not as yet possible to say anything final on this subject.

LABOUR

Since 1933 there has been an energetic development in all aspects of the law dealing with labour. Labour organization has also been reformed through the Organization of Labour Act (January 20, 1934). Connected with that measure is a revised Labour Courts Act, as well as an Act concerning the Introduction of the Work Book (February 26, 1935) which provides the authorities with the data necessary for a planned distribution of labour. Rules governing labour contracts have also been laid down. The Act for the Protection of Wages in Homework (June 8, 1933), and the Homework Law (March 23, 1934) the essential part of which protects the worker from a lowering of wages, but which also makes it possible to prohibit homework tending to endanger life, health, and morality, further, the Hours of Work Act (July 26, 1934), the Act concerning Hours of Work in Bakeries and Confectioner's Shops (June 29, 1936). The eight-hour day is prescribed as a general rule. In concerns dangerous to health the time of work must be reduced. In the sphere of labour protection we have regulations concerning work with compressed air (May 29, 1935), an Act regarding the Accomodation for Workers in the Building Trade (December 13, 1934), which provides for a healthy and adequate accomodation for workers (male and female) in coal mines, in roller and hammer works and in the glass industry (March 12, 1933). In addition to the reorganization of sickness, invalidity and accident insurance, social insurance as a whole has been reformed so as to ensure its efficient and economical working.

All these Acts can be easily fitted into the existing framework of this department of law, but merely to give their names does not tell us anything of the completely new attitude towards everything concerning labour law. The former labour law centred on the worker's associations and recognized these organizations for class-conflict as statutory corporations, thus giving them a place in the life of the State. But such associations are now completely at variance with the ideas embodied in the Labour Organization Law. Labour organization has undergone a fundamental change. The National Socialist State has not sought to make a compromise between the National Socialist and the capitalist organization of industry and labour. In place of the opposition of Labour and Capital, of employer and employed, the Labour Organization Act has set up the Works Community, which exists to serve the whole people. "To serve the highest interests of the community of the people they are not employers and employed, but labour deputies of the people." (Hitler at the Motor Exhibition, 1935). Work in every form is the fulfilment of a duty towards the community. For every German, work means the fulfilment of life's purpose. Therewith the nonsensical idea that manual work is on an inferior plane is finally refuted. The skilled worker at the boring machine is fulfilling a much more essential task than that of the clerk in the factory office, even though the latter may call himself a "brainworker". The value of any work done within the framework of the Folk-Community depends of its necessity for the life of the nation. The meaning of social honour lies in the fulfilment of this duty and in respect for the worker. Honour is the basis of our national life and the most precious possession of our people. It must, by its very nature, be all inclusive. It must penetrate every sphere of national life and be its basic principle. Community and Honour are inseparably bound together. It is therefore the foundation of the Works Community.

Labour is not regarded as being merely the physical capacity to perform certain tasks. Labour is an activity that is of value to the community. Labour as a whole is national labour, and each individual worker is only a member of the working Folk Community, helping to accomplish the task which the people as a whole have to fulfil. The laws of national life also require labour as a means of selection and of stimulating spiritual and moral forces. Labour is thus a community-forming factor. We cannot therefore consider labour and the circumstances and conditions under which it is carried out, matters such as the worker's safety, conditions of dismissal and holidays, working hours and wages, merely as subjects for private agreements which the community has to put up with, however harmful they may be. They must rather be regulated by the law which governs the life of the whole people, for they concern the whole community.

The work in each individual factory or business is therefore carried out for the common benefit of people and state, and its success or failure affects the fate of the whole nation. The position of the employer as leader of his business is subordinate to this task. His work in cooperation with the workers he employs is based not on mutual services rendered, but on the common work done for the nation. The employer's position as leader does not therefore mean that he is master in his own house and can do what he likes. It means rather that he is responsible for what his firm does for the community. The employer is bound to his workers by the fact that they are all participating in the labour of the nation. The essence of this cooperation lies in social honour, which means performances of duty, and respect for every kind of work. To offend against this principle of honour is to infringe the order of things embodied in the Labour Organization Act.

The form given to the Works Community necessitates that it should be self-governing. The organ of this self-government is the Mutual Trust Council, which consists of the leader of the firm and members elected by the workers. Its task is above all to assist in the drawing up of the works regulations, to see that suitable measures for protection against accidents are taken, and to strengthen mutual confidence.

The carrying out of this labour code is in the hands of the Labour Trustees who are appointed for each district. Their task is however not to use official means of compulsion to bring about the formation of Works Communities. A Community cannot be created by compulsion.

The Labour Trustee must, by using his personal influence, by education and advice of a general and particular nature, ensure that State compulsion is in general unnecessary. The activity of the Labour Trustee up to now has shown that although they have used, when necessary, the powers given them under the Act, they have avoided any serious interference which might have led to the failure of their efforts.

The Labour Trustees are supported in their work by the German Labour Front, which is the community of all working Germans. It is a social self-governing corporation. As such it took over the former social institutions of the workers and has extended and perfected them by means of a mighty organization. It further helps its members by improving the conditions under which they live and assists them in the event of unforeseen misfortunes. Since the organization includes employers as well as workers it can exercise a considerable influence on working conditions in the individual firms and on the formation of Works Communities in accordance with the principles laid down by the Labour Trustees. If there is deliberate and malicious opposition to the orders of the Labour Trustee, the latter may appeal to the Courts of Social Honour. Paragraph 36 of the Labour Organization Act gives the exhaustive list of actions which are punishable as offences against social honour. By establishing these courts the State has embarked on something entirely new. They have been entrusted with the task of elaborating through their own decisions a law of national labour. Misdemeanours enumerated in the Act are malicious exploitation of labour, offences against a person's honour, malicious endangering of industrial peace, breaches of general decrees issued by the Labour Trustee, and betrayal of commercial secrets by the members of the Labour Councils. But it is assumed that all such actions proceed from an asocial attitude of mind. The extent and effects of these penal regulations will be best shown by means of a few practical examples.

The Courts of Honour have passed sentences on account of malicious exploitation of labour for the following actions: the inadequate payment of work in violation of wage agreements, retention of wages, non-payment for overtime, excessive work, bad conditions of board and lodging, refusal of holidays, and breaches of important regulations for the avoidance of accidents. There is also the case of an employer who did not allow the workers to do their jobs in peace and quiet, but was continually bothering them and urging them on with abusive language.

An employer was condemned for an offence against honour because he refused to have the sick children of a worker taken to hospital in a neighbouring town in accordance with the doctor's instructions; he said he wished to spare his horses. His action in this case was not an insult to honour within the meaning of the Criminal Code, but an offence against the honour due to every member of the working community. In connection with the disturbance of industrial peace the following offences have been dealt with:—the provoking of labour disputes; demonstrations against the employer by misrepresentation; undermining of confidence in cooperation among the workers so as to disturb the proper working of the firm. In 1934, 64 actions were brought, in 1935 204, of which 164 were concluded by the end of the year.

The penalties which the Social Courts of Honour may impose are fines, reprimands and warnings. But they may also order removal of a worker from his place of work, or deprive an employer of his title of leader of the firm. In assessing the severity of the punishment, not merely the isolated action but the asocial attitude of the offender is to be considered. Of the 164 cases dealt with, 8 ended in acquittal, in 25 cases fines of under 100 Marks were imposed, in 45 cases fines of between 100 and 499 Marks, in four cases fines of between 500 and 999 Marks, and in four cases a fine of over 1000 Marks. Further, 21 reprimands and 19 warnings were issued. There has been one sentence of removal from the place of work, and in 9 cases the employer was deprived of his functions as leader of the firm.

If an offence is not only against social honour but against the community directly, the Labour Trustee can appeal to the ordinary courts, which may impose a fine or imprisonment.

In intimate union with the organisation of national work formed by the National Labour Act we find the planned distribution of labour throughout the whole country.

THE PEASANT AND THE LAND

In no sphere of law have such fundamental changes been made as in that regarding agriculture. Formerly part of the civil code had been devoted to this special department of national life. The changes which have taken place here are even more comprehensive and far-reaching than those brought about by the Labour Organization Act. They aim at the reorganization and preservation of the farming class as one of the chief sources of national strength, and to do this a new organization, the Reich Agricultural Estate, has been founded. With the same end in view, agricultural indebtedness has been generally reduced, and the farms are protected against distraint; further, a marketing system has been set up which assures agriculture a market for its products at a reasonable price and at the same time is a guarantee that the German people will be able to live from the products of their own soil. The organizational and economic regulations are very extensive. They have in many cases taken over the functions exercised formerly by private institutions for the fixing of prices. But this material aspect too is subordinate to the national aim of maintaining and developing a prosperous peasantry. This aim is of decisive importance for the future of the nation. The farmer linked up with the soil cultivated by him is the never-failing source of national strength.

The Heredity Farms Act is the keystone for the whole law regarding the farming class. It is the foundation of all legal measures in this portion of the German Statutes. It proceeds from the idea that the farmer's family is linked up with the soil through their work. The law takes the farm as a living cell in the folk organism. The Heredity Farms Law does not legislate for the soil alone but for all that lives from it and grows on it too. It takes fields, farm homesteads and cattle as a natural unit in the centre of which stands the farmer himself. This union is regarded as a permanent one. Therefore the farm shall remain to the descendants or relatives as an inheritance in the hands of free German peasants. For this reason the Act makes it impossible to change the normal inheritance in a will. In general the eldest son inherits the farm. Female issue inherit only when there is no male issue possessing the necessary qualification for taking over the farm. The economic position of the farm is secured by a prohibition against mortgages and sales. A farm can only be regarded as an hereditary farm when it is capable of supporting a family and cannot be larger than 300 acres. In this way the measure furnishes a guarantee for the future, that as large a number as possible of medium and small farms shall be spread over the whole country. Independent Courts, called Heredity Farm Courts, ensure that these measures are carried out.

German agriculture has been further reorganized by a system of land settlement. Planned settlement on the land serves above all to increase the density of population in the more thinly populated parts of Germany. It helps to strengthen the attachment of the people to the soil tilled by them, and it ensures that this soil shall yield sufficient food by reclaiming land from unfertile areas or by dividing up indebted estates not intensively cultivated and building new farms and villages on them. Each farm must have enough land attached to it to provide a livelihood for a family with several children. Variety in the size of farms is to be aimed at, and uniformity is to be strictly avoided. The most stable unit is the farm which can be run by the farmer and his family, and this farm is therefore specially favoured. But provision is also made for farm labourers since they are needed by the larger farms. And in accordance with local conditions artisans and institutions for common use (cooperative creameries for example) must also be provided.

But in order to put agricultural estates on a sound economic basis it was necessary to regulate indebtedness. The Act of June 1, 1933, makes it possible to reduce debts to a level in accordance with safety and to ensure their repayment from the yield without endangering the farmer's livelihood. There are two ways of doing this. On the one hand there is a procedure for reducing debts by which the creditor voluntarily grants a remission, making it possible to draw up a plan for paying off what is owed. On the other hand if a reduction of debts is necessary and the creditors are not willing to grant remissions, there is a procedure for compulsory adjustment. The debt regulation aims at freeing the owners of farms, woods and market gardens, who need relief from their debts to such an extent that, after paying for the upkeep of their families, they may pay off their debts according to the adjustment plan from the yield of their land. The plan for the abolition of debt is supplemented by protection from distraint for agriculture, so as to prevent property being confiscated and things beings auctioned which are necessary for the running of the farm.

The organization of the Reich Agricultural Estate is based upon the idea of self-government by corporation. The basic Act was promulgated on September 13, 1933, and a large number of supplementary decrees have ensured its proper application. Its aim is to bring together all the citizens of Germany who can be considered as belonging to one unit on account of their professional activity as farmers, as members of agricultural associations, as wholesale or retail dealers in agricultural products, as owners of land which can be used for agriculture, or as engaged in exploiting agricultural products. The Reich Agricultural Estate has been given the task of training its members to a full sense of their responsibility towards the people and to become the solid foundation on which the nation can grow and maintain itself. It watches over professional honour which here too is the basic element of the community. It also has to care for its members from a social and cultural point of view. Since the Decree of December 8, 1933, the Reich Agricultural Estate is directed by the Reich Farm Leader who has at his disposal an administrative staff. In all important questions he is advised by the Reich Farm Council. The Reich Agricultural Estate is divided into Regional Associations, District Associations and Local Associations, so that in spite of the central organization, attention is paid to local conditions. Self-administration is carried out through these bodies, every member of which serves in an honorary capacity.

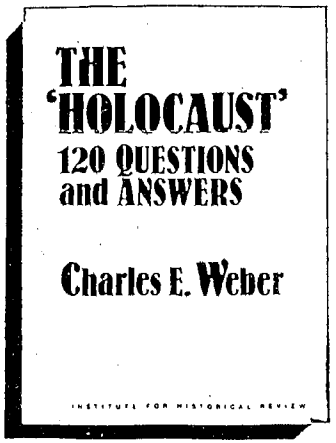
As a part of this professional organization the Reich Agricultural Estate is entrusted with the carrying out of the marketing scheme, the object of which is to guarantee the production of vital commodities, and on the other hand to protect the farmer from uncertainty as to whether he will be able to sell his produce. The marketing scheme provides a permanent market and at the same time ensures that the farms are properly and economically run. It regulates according to their nature and extent the utilization of agricultural products. These measures are not carried out exactly as in a planned economy in which orders and prohibitions tell the individual precisely what he is to do and what not to do. The method is rather to bring home to each single individual what the goal to be aimed at is, and to educate the rising generation to appreciate the tasks which have to be accomplished. Thus private initiative is in no way excluded.



HERE IS A BOOK in lucid question/answer format that tackles virtually all the myths and distortions propagated by the "Holocaust" Establishment–a book for young and old alike.

- Presents ideas and information not found in other books in this field.
- Short, well-organized and up-to-date on the latest ideas and research.
- Suitable for the classroom as a counterbalance to "Holocaust" studies.
- Gives a historical background of the Jewish problem in Europe, examines the motivations of various groups with regard to the Extermination thesis, and introduces the reader to the more detailed literature on the subject.
- Written by a former professor with a Ph.D. in an historical discipline whose training as a linguist gave him access to literature in various languages, and whose U.S. military intelligence experience in WWII included his residence in Europe during 1945-48 with assignments involving him in preparations for the Nuremberg Trials.

In the classroom; in debates; for the novice revisionist, the inquisitive and skeptical–nothing could be as useful as Dr. Weber's The "Holocaust"–120 Questions and Answers. 120 questions that rouse thought. 120 fully-referenced answers that blow the lid off the blackout. A book of this scope and format has been needed for a long time. Here you have it: easy-to-read, written and priced for wide distribution–and an answer to today's obsession with Holocaustiana.

THE "HOLOCAUST" —
FACT OR FICTION?

Were six million Jews really gassed ... or has a colossal hoax been perpetrated on the world?

Professor Butz has carefully investigated the alleged extermination of 6 million Jews during WW II and has written a book which thoroughly documents his startling findings. His book strips away the cover of fraud and deceit from this emotion-charged topic and lays bare the full and complete truth.

Dear George: 6 July 1984

Quite in line with some of your articles about the Big Spook in the sky, I noticed an apropos item in the May 1984 issue of Dr. Pierce's publication,"National Vanguard," that I felt compelled to pass on to you and your readers:

"Das Schwarze Korps, the SS newspaper founded and fostered by Reinhard Heydrich, in its issue of June 13, 1939: 'Who is there among us who does not, deep in his heart—provided he can still think with his blood—have a profound, strangely haunting sense of shame, when, walking through the German countryside, before the panorama perhaps of snow-covered Alpine mountaintops or in the midst of a somber Westphalian heath, he comes across an image of the crucified Jesus?

'The gods of our ancestors looked different. They were men, and each had a weapon in his hand, symbolizing the attitude to life that is inherent in our race: that of action, that of a man's responsibility to himself. How different the pale crucified one, expressing—by his passive attitude and bys his decided look of suffering, humility, and extreme self-surrender—qualities which contradict the fundamentally heroic attitude of our race.' "

But then, you could have expected the best from one of our finest! Sieg Heil!

Dear Mr. Dietz: 1 August 1984

Enclosed is my check for $30. (FRNs) as a donation for the Liberty Bell. Half of this is being donated by Mrs. P.S.

Thanks for printing the article by Jim Taylor. He was a guest on a Lancaster [CA] talk show. GREAT! It can be done if the host is at all reasonable.

Always enjoy the Liberty Bell. It is, in my opinion, a unique publication. Hope the donation helps at least a little.

Hang in there!

Dear Mr. Dietz: 17 September 1984

Until recently, Odinists in general have let go many snide remarks, distortions, and ignorant statements about their beliefs. At present, a discussion between the so-called 'Creators' and the leader of an Odinist group is raging. It is probably about time the Odinists themselves step forward to explain their beliefs and, being one, I would like to point out a few things to avoid further misconceptions.

Odinism is not dogmatic; we do not have a 'bible' or 'commandments' as have the 'Creators.' Odinism is a living, breathing religion; we believe that as soon as dogmatism comes in the door, spiritual growth goes out the window. Odinism is not a 'finished product;' there is no 'believe—or else' syndrome. This is why you will find Odinists with divergent opinions about a number of subjects and still remain true Odinists.

Neither is Odinism based on fear of a deity or of death as is, for example, Christianity. Odinism is not a religion you convert to on your deathbed; it is a religion for the living.

Odinists see the universe and nature as belonging to a timeless order in which both gods and men have their place and their function. The gods represent to us the mighty forces that keep the cosmos bound together under the power of destiny. Because man is part of nature, these powers also reside in him.

Modern Odinism is a continuation of the beliefs of our forefathers. However, we do not want to revive the Viking Age, particularly not in the way it is depicted by our opponents—brutal, superstitious, stupid. Rather, we want to bring back the honourable code of conduct as expressed in the Havamal which certainly contains tremendous amounts of wisdom about human nature and is an excellent guideline to follow for any person in the modern world.

The 'Creators' call the Norse gods 'spooks;' that is to miss the point completely; our gods represent various aspects of the natural forces and human characteristics (good and bad). These are expressed in the legends in which the gods appear in different situations, mostly as models to emulate, but occasionally explaining what not to do. The worthy Pontifex Maximus of the Creativity Church calls our gods 'absurdities' and our beliefs ridiculous nonsense.' That is is his privilege, but it shows that he has no understanding whatsoever of what Odinism means. It also shows him as a rude person who does not hesitate to insult the honest beliefs of his own kin. If we Odinists wanted to, we could pick 'Creativity' apart without much effort, but why do so? If some of our kinfolk are happy believing in the Pontifex Maximus, good for them! Odinists do not pontificate, so we have no leader with such a bombastic title, nor are our beliefs scientifically proven as the Pontifex claims 'Creativity is.'

It is worth noting that the Pontifex does not suggest cooperation between his followers and Odinists; we may join him, but he will not accept our beliefs as genuine; that makes it somewhat one-sided. Many of us have read his 'bible,' but as Odinist Ronald Hand has remarked, it leaves us cold. It is probably not easy for the 'Creators' to understand that there may be other beliefs within our folk group; Odinists are more tolerant and accept many variations. Maybe the 'Creators' would fare better if their 'Creation' was not quite as scientific as they claim, and their religion not quite as dogmatic as it seems!

If Ben Klassen's denigration of Odinist beliefs is made because he sees Odinism as threat to his 'Church,' I don't think he will have much to fear. The people attracted to a scientifically proven religion that has existed only about a dozen years would probably not become Odinists. Odinism speaks to the race soul of the Indo-European peoples; beliefs in the essence of Odinism have existed among the common folk from long before historic times and have been retained in many different ways right up to now, though during the last thousand years the veneer has been Christian. Modern Odinism is simply bringing back the old, durable beliefs in honour, self-respect, and tribal unity that were common among our ancestors of old. And when these concepts again rule as the code of conduct within the Folk, everything else will fall into place.

The following letter by Mr. Ben Klassen, Founder and Pontifex Maximus of the Church of the Creator, was, because of some abusive language and general intolerance toward White Man's Odinism contained therein, not scheduled to be published in the pages of Liberty Bell; however, upon Mr. Ronald Hand's urging, it is presented here in full and is followed by Mr. Hand's reply.

Dear Mr. Dietz: August 7, 1984

In the July issue of LIBERTY BELL, Mr. Ronald S. Hand, in answer to Rev. Carles C. Messick's letter of the same issue, makes a broadside attack on CREATIVITY, the White Racial religion of The Church of the Creator. Since I am the founder of this church, I believe I have a vested interest in answering these charges. In doing so I almost feel like a mosquito in a nudist colony, I hardly know where to begin. Since Mr. Hand makes so many ridiculous statements, he leaves himself wide open, and all I can say is—he asked for it.

In his attack, Mr. Hand uses (among others) two sleazy tactics at which Jews and Christians are especially adept: (a) he misrepresents our position and then attacks that false position (b) he attempts to discredit us through guilt by association and links us with reprehensible entities such as the Jews and the Hindus, when we have absolutely nothing in common with them.

So let us start with our position regarding Salubrious Living which is spelled out in considerable detail in our classic text of the same name and embodied in its 244 pages. I am sure that Mr. Hand has never read, since he seems completely ignorant of its contents. In the first place we are not vegetarians as Mr. Hand seems to think, but frugitarians, a considerable difference. If Mr. Hand does not understand that difference he is invited to educate himself at leisure by reading the book. I don't have the space to do so here. He will probably also find out that meat is suitable food for dogs and other carnivores, but highly unsuitable for humans. He might even find out that charcoal broiled meat is carcinogenous (cancer causing) and after he gets his facts straight, might even want to dispose of his much prized charcoal broiler that he so hates to give up.

The facts are that the wealth of advice given in Salubrious Living for living a healthier, happier and longer life is based on solid scientific facts, and has nothing to do with the primitive superstitious hocus-pocus of Hindus or the Jewish Leviticus with which Mr. Hand so surreptitiously seeks to associate us.

Furthermore, proper diet is only one of the 14 cardinal points that we list in "Salubrious Living" (see page 9) for creating our desired goal of a SOUND MIND in a SOUND BODY in a SOUND SOCIETY in a SOUND ENVIRONMENT.

Does Mr. Hand object to such goals? If so, that is mighty strange, since in his letter he roundly denounces and insults the White Race in scathing terms, such as, quote; "Untermenschen, race traitors, scum and worse." [Unfortunately, there ARE "Untermenschen," there ARE "race traitors," and there IS "scum and worse" among the White Race! Now, how do we dispose of these: before or after all the "Mud Races" have been 'taken care of?' – Editor] When we Creators have a well-planned, thoroughgoing program to upgrade the health, eugenics, and environment of our White Racial Comrades, he stupidly denounces that too, because, to his own detriment, he is totally ignorant of what we are talking about in Salubrious Living.

One final point and that is this: we do not INSIST that anyone HAS to follow the beneficial guidelines laid down, even to be a member of the church. We don't twist anyone's arm. We offer a set of constructive, scientifically proven guidelines for anyone to follow in order to live a healthier, happier and longer life. Whether they do so is each individuals own choice, but, again for the benefit of a better race and a White and Brighter World, we hope that every White man, woman and child will learn to practice a life style that is far superior to the drug and junk food infested world of today.

So much for Salubrious Living, which, although extremely important, is not the main thrust of our religious program, and was not even mentioned in "Nature's Eternal Religion," our first corner stone. Let us get down to the "spooky" business in which Mr. Hand seems to take such primitive delight. He says in Odinism "we do believe in God." He then immediately trips himself up and says, "But what God?" He is not sure. He then lists such absurdities as Thor, Odin, Tyr and Freya, all of which are presumably dead, and resting somewhere in Lower Slobbovia. Then there are the Baldurs and the Heimdalls sneaking around the fjords (somewhere) and oozing out of, and squeezing through the crevasses (somewhere). Supposedly, somehow, somewhere, they will finally come to our rescue. Big deal! But we Creators are not holding our breath waiting for such nonsense to materialize. How any rational, grown man can believe in, and spout such ridiculous nonsense is beyond me.

But, Mr. Hand says, we have to worship something, and why not spooks, they're good for us, we need them. Well, we Creators don't need any such idiotic and artificial props. If you need them, Mr. Hand, you had better see your Jewish psychiatrist. He will confuse you even more, and make you like it in the process.

Speaking of worship, Mr. Hand asks categorically: What God do we Creators worship? He then goes on to accuse us of worshipping our own White Race, which he next proceeds to roundly denounce, abuse and insult as viciously as would any Jew or nigger. I therefore want to set Mr. Hand straight on two points. (a) We Creators do not "worship" anything, not even the White Race, as he implies, and (b) to us the whole idea of "worship" is stupid, ridiculous and demeaning. it implies that the "worshipper" willfully places himself in an extremely inferior position in relation to some stupid abstract "Quantity X" that he or she has set up to worship. This may be something as ridiculous as a cow, a cat, a spookie, or a hot rock. He or she then proceeds to jabber some meaningless, yes, insane praise at said inanimate or imgaginary object, in order to completely humiliate himself or herself. To us the whole idea is primitive, repugnant and reflects a throwback to our primitive and barbaric stoneage ancestors. So when someone asks us—"if you don't worship God, what do you worship?" it reminds us of the patient in the doctors' clinic, who when told that a cancerous tumor would have to be cut out, asked, "But doctor, what are you going to replace it with?" No, Mr. Hand, we don't need spooks or anything else to worship, nor do we need a pacifier to suck on, either. You can have the whole messy passel, gratis and wholesale.

We now come to the Odinist admission that, well, yeah, we admit all this Norse mythology is hocus-pocus, but at least it is White, not Jewish hocus-pocus. Big deal! If we must deal in hokum at all, why not pick a higher grade of hocus-pocus, when the White Race has such an excellent selection to choose from? The Vikings were neither the first nor the best in that category. If I were to indulge in playing games with White spooks, why, I would choose the Greek or the Roman gods ten to one over the Viking's. Their stories are much richer in classic lore, mystique, wealth of characters and any other critique that may tickle your fancy. Compared to them, the Vikings were crude, brutish and bordering on the dense. In fact, on the intellectual level the Vikings were on a similar level to Hagar the Horrible as portrayed in the Sunday comics. They were, in fact, illiterate, and most of the Norse myths the Odinists bandy about today are only through the gratuity of being preserved in Christian writings. The Vikings, in turn, slaughtered the Christians wholesale, but in the end the latter conquered the Vikings [just as they conquered and destroyed the Roman Empire—so much for the "scum and worse" among the Jews and other "mud races" who imposed their beliefs in "spooks" on the glorious, but gullible, White Race! —Editor] by the insidious application of their Jewish B-bom (brain bomb). So what we have of all this Odinist hocus-pocus today is really only a more or less Christian recording or residue, and who needs more primitive hocus-pocus.

Mr. Hand claims the Odinists are not a "dead horse," nor a relic from a primitive past, but a "rising phoenix," because, see, we have several thousand already yet. Well, if he wants to play the numbers game, I am not impressed. It is no substitute for quality. "Where is the beef?" indeed, (his quote). There are any number of cults, religions and insanities that have far larger numbers than "several thousand." The Moonies have millions, Jehovah's Witness number in the millions, the Moslems number in the hundreds of millions, and the Christians claim to embrace 750 million "souls." So what are a paltry few thousand in comparison? And anyway, with all those billions of believers in the old spooks in the sky swindle, the bottom line still is that the world is in one hell of a mess [all, of course, brought about by "scum and worse" among the Jews and other "mud races," —or did THEY? -Editor] , is rapidly screeching towards a traumatic cataclysm, is still in the hands of the treacherous Jew, and Odin, Wodin, Blynken and Nod will do damn little, if anything, to save us. I would rather be a minority of one who was set on the right course than be a polyglot part of a multi-billion member cult that had its thinking all screwed up.

We need something much more realistic, tough, well planned, thoroughgoing and comprehensive than a rehash of a few primitive and warmed-up myths to do the job. In Creativity we have the whole ball of wax. Just as Adolf Hitler found it necessary to chuck overboard all the old political parties in Germany because they were inadequate to do the job, and devise a completely new philosophy and political party to cope with a major catastrophe, so too, we Creators find it necessary to devise a completely new philosophy and religion for the total White Race of the Planet Earth. In so doing, instead of rummaging around in the debris and garbage heap of old dead religions of the past, we instead go to the greatest teacher of them all—Mother Nature. Her laws are eternal, they are real, they have the innate wisdom of the eons embodied in them. There is our source, and there is our answer.

If Mr. Hand finds that being natural, logical, realistic, organized and deliberate leaves him "cold" and without purpose, I again suggest that he see his Jewish psychiatrist to confuse him further. Evidently there are some maladjusted people in this world, in fact millions of them, who are so hopelessly confused that they cannot face reality in a disintegrating world. So they seek an escape mechanism of some kind. Some resort to alcohol, some to hard drugs, some to the spooks in the sky fantasy. But it is no solution, and reality will have to be faced and problems have to be solved. To try to escape them with all these trick escape mechanisms does not solve them but makes the situation only more disastrous and the end of the line for such "escape" artists is usually similar to that of a John Belushi, or a David Kennedy.

We Creators do not seek to hide our heads in the sand, or on cloud nine in the sky. We are problem solvers and we have the answers, meaningful, comprehensive and realistic answers. Just as Adolf Hitler sought to unite the whole German nation under one political party, so we Creators seek to unite the total White Race on Planet Earth into one solid racial religion for the best interests of the White Race and the White Race alone. Just as Hitler succeeded in uniting all Germans under National Socialism, so we Creators believe (yes, we DO have faith) that we can and will unite the present 500 million White peoples on the face of the earth into one powerful, solid battering ram that will crush and demolish the narcotic poison of Judaism. We believe it because it is the only way for the White Race to go, and once the White Race is united there is no power on the face of the earth that will ever again be in a position to threaten its existence or survival.

At this point I would like to make a highly encouraging and optimistic observation. The White racial movement in America has now advanced far enough to win over and smash the Jewish establishment. It could do it now in 1984, if the different factions would unite and polarize under the banner of The Church of the Creator, the most comprehensive thoroughgoing, effective weapon it has to work with. Standing in the way is the hubris (overweening ego) of the leaders of the individual groups. They take the position that "if I didn't think of it first, I'm going to torpedo it, and to hell with the White Race," and I think Odinism is a prime example. But think of it! We could win now! Forget about wet-nursing your private little hubris! If we lose nobody will remember you anyway. But if we win, what a glorious white, bright world this would be. Yes, the White man knows how to govern the world, Mr. Hand, contrary to what you claim in your desultory appraisal of the White Race. The Romans already did so beautifully 2000 years ago, and Pax Romana with its 200 years of peace and prosperity was undoubtedly the finest epoch in the White Man's history. It lasted until Jewish Christianity came along and infected the White Man's mind with a running sore that has persisted to this day.

But we Creators are not nearly as much interested in that the White Race "govern" the world, as that the White Race POSSESS IT IN TOTAL. In an increasingly contaminated, poisoned, and polluted world of exploding mud races, we are now at a point of no return. Either the White Race inhabits it all and exclusively or it will be crushed, stifled and exterminated. It is now all or nothing, and we Creators want to make damn sure it is the White Race that survives. Succinctly, it is only the White Race that can reverse the avalanche, clean up the planet again and build a world worth living in.

But our program does not stop there. Through our program of Eugenic up-breeding we mean to advance the quality of life, health and happiness to levels never before even dreamed of by the Greeks and Romans, much less the brutish Vikings.

We further believe there is no real obstacle in accomplishing this lofty goal as far as the Jews and mud races are concerned [No, the Jews and other "mud races" which outnumber the White Race by, maybe, 12 to 1 are no obstacle, they present just a minor problem on the road to the lofty goal of the White Race's possession of the entire world.—Ed.) The real obstacle is the confused and cluttered thinking of the White Race itself, and the most pervasive clutter of all is the spooks in the sky obsession that contaminates the minds of so many of the White Race. [Now, if a few billion of Jews and other "mud races" present only a minor problem, why would we have to worry about not being able to overcome and convert a paltry, maybe 70 or 80%, of the 500 million members of the White Race, who are at least nominal Christians, to Creativity? There should be nothing to it to get that job done in a hurry! —Editor]

We do not find that our lofty goal of uniting the White Race in a powerful White racial religion as either "cold" or without purpose, as Mr. Hand seems to. (in fact, he reminds me of the nigger who said, 'boss, even if it's good, I don't like it.") We find the challenge exciting, exhilarating and the most intelligent and meaningful ever proposed in any religion, creed or philosophy. It sure beats the hell out of chasing non-existent spooks, be they Roman, Viking or Jewish.

Our members feel the same way. They are excited, filled with hope determination and purpose now that they have a meaningful, constructive goal in life. Let me quote to you just a small part of a four page letter I received just last week. It begins with, "... dear Inspirational Leader ...." and here are a few excerpts, "I have sworn an oath and have dedicated my entire being, heart and mind and what years of my life remaining to just those ends...." Referring to our basic books: "For it IS my Bible, it IS my belief and although you, sir, are the author, its every utterance reverberates throughout my very being as if it were I whose pen raced across the paper for fear of losing a word." There is more. You can read the full letter in the September issue of RACIAL LOYALTY. We have thousands of other letters in our file that reflect similar emotions and sentiments. Cold, Mr. Hand? If you need a spook to keep you warm, I again suggest you go and see your Jewish psychiatrist, or are you perhaps yourself part of the confusion creating apparatus that is inherent in the tribe of the Hidden Hand? I hope not.

In conclusion I say to Mr. Hand and all of our good White Racial Comrades—don't knock us, but instead, join with us. We are the best friend you have in a confused, crumbling and disintegrating world.

For a Whiter and Brighter World,
Creatively yours,
Ben Klassen, Pontifex Maximus
Church of the Creator
P.O. Box 400, Otto NC 28763

The following is Mr. Hand's reply to the Pontifex Maximus' letter:

Dear George: 2 August 1984

Thank you for forwarding to me a copy of Ben Klassen's letter so that I may make a good Odinist retort. But, before going any further, I might preface what I am about to say by stating that I am not so concerned about merely quibbling with the Pontifex (Pope of Creativity) Maximus, about his home-made dietary/political religion. Far more important to me is the survival of the White Race, not an elementary survival of plebes and peons, but of continuing White culture and political and economic power. If I address myself to these particulars, it will increasingly appear that the Pompus Magnum is merely trying to consolidate for himself a place in the sun, along with the guru Sun Myung Moon, or the Maharishi Mahash Yogi. The buck will be good, to be sure, but the cause of White Power will suffer. My reasons for this belief I shall outline in the remainder of this letter.

First of all, Klassen outrightly prevaricates when he accuses me of misrepresenting his position and then attacking that false position. All I did in my previous letter was to point out the utter impracticality of 'Salubrious Living' for either church dogma or political doctrine. What does Klassen expect of the superior White people? Does he expect them to give up all meat-eating, not to mention some vegetables, so as to eat only fruit and nuts? It may be that charbroiling meat causes cancer. It may be wise to be more careful not to burn the burgers, but, does that mean that persons who eat meat are in some way out of sorts with the Pontifex? Actually, let us imagine a hypothetical situation. Let's assume that several million of White people began to accept Klassen's meatless formulae for success and health. Will that rid the same people of cancer? What about other diseases? Is Klassen bent on killing cancer only or other diseases as well? In my simple opinion, Klassen has fallen afoul and is leaning on a false panacea, a cure-all for every malady. But, let us look again at his scheme. Let's once again suppose that every one of the White people accepted his religion. What would happen to the incomes of millions of White people presently engaged in farming, the meat industry, the food services business, etc., whom he is effectively putting out of business? There wouldn't be anymore livestock farmers, no more Burger Kings, McDonalds, Arby's, and the like. No more Steaks and Shakes, nor

Cork and Cleavers. All the Red Lobsters would have to shut down. Then, what would our new menus be like? Maybe apple tacos, peach burgers, and plum pies would be good for a while, but people would soon grow tired of such a menu. Imagine, once again, how cattle would be slaughtered only for their hides. What would happen to all the waste? On the other hand, it may be that Klassen would wish to keep cattle as pets, much as they do in India. For someone who says he has nothing to do with Hindus, the practical result is much the same, even if the reasons are dissimilar. Let's look at another one of his bloopers. He talks about our desired goal of a 'sound mind in a sound body in a sound society in a sound environment.' This is, indeed, a strange emphasis for an eugenicist. I thought as racists we believed in genes and chromosomes. Now we are back to diet and environment. If evolution is true, then we as humans will adjust biologically to our environment. What is he worried about? Maybe he is promising eternal life on earth? After all, he does not believe in spooks in the sky. Is that because he only believes in the earth spooks of Jews and foods? So much for now for 'Salubrious Living.'

And now to look at Thor and Odin, Baldur and Heimdall again, the Aryan gods of old who, as Klassen says, are oozing out of the fjords of Norway, or somewhere. If they are oozing out of anything, they are oozing out of our racial memory and they are making a strange but pronounced comeback. Furthermore, Odin and Thor ought to make us racially conscious of our need for both wisdom and power, for they are the archtypal symbols for it. And if the White Race is to expand, then by all means Freya will be the White Mother whose significance is to make child bearing fashionable once again. Then the White Race will expand. We don't worship these deities any more than Christians worship theirs, as a matter of fact, much less so. But, this is because we, as Odinists, are of the viewpoint of the Greek philosopher Euhemerus. He taught that the gods were mortal men who were elevated or apotheosized into gods by later generations who told the stories which later became myths and legends. If our thinking is all screwed up, then let Klassen tell me where in I am wrong, or Euhemerus the Greek, since he likes the Greeks so well. Now, I must say George, that Klassen claims that his is an all new philosophy that does not rummage through the garbage heap of history to salvage some of the pieces and relics of old religions. That is, with one or two exceptions, of course. After all, vegetarianism, oops! I mean frugitarianism, is all new stuff to him. Klassen does not owe anything to Seventh Day Adventism, or Theosophy, or Spiritualism, or Occultism. No, not much. I say, beans on him. After all, "Beans, beans, the musical fruit, the more you eat, the more you toot, the more you toot the better you feel, let's have beans for every meal. Ha! Ha! I have proved, after the logic of Klassen's, that beans are a fruit and good for the Aryan. Again, Klassen says that the church of the creator learns from the greatest teacher of them all, Mother Nature. But, what is mother's name? Could it be Freya? No, she is a Nordic god, so we had better call her after Klassen's favorite Latin and greek originals. How about Demeter? Yes, Demeter. This would jive real well with the corn belt here in Indiana. The seed corn brand Demeter would be just ideal for seeding the plains which have been rid of the live stock. Then, with all the surplus corn meal we could give away to the Hispanics as a typical giveaway, we could assist in the survival, expansion, and advancement of the Hispanics. Not a bad idea, if you are a Jew infiltrator, or just a plain traitor, isn't it?

Now, is it really the hubris of the White people that will deter a white awakening, and White unity? Klassen seems to thinks so. Will Odinism torpedo the White man's chance at victory? No, but Klassen's brand of organization will. He has another panacea. He thinks that, if every White person would join his 'church,' the problems would just go away. What wishful thinking!

He says he has "the whole program," which he compares to a ball of wax. Well, I think the latter is a better description of what he calls his "whole program." Then, as nearly all Jewish provocateurs do, he injects a bit of dogma that makes the better part of the program detestable, or self-destructive. He has it that the White Race must conquer and possess the whole earth or have none of it. That is not a realistic plan for the expansion of the White Race, that is sheer and unadulterated nonsense bordering on insanity, eventually, but surely, leading his followers down the primrose path to their destruction. I would have Klassen know that we would be doing well if we got the Jews where they belong. Then the other problems could be worked out in due time. Besides, there are many noble people in this world who are not Aryan. It may be the idea of Klassen's young, uninformed, and easily-led followers who follow any Pied Piper with (to them) nice-sounding, radical ideas, but it surely is not my idea, and I am convinced not the idea of any realist, of expanding the White Race by exterminating all the other human races which outnumber the White Race by 12 to 1. If nothing else, there might be just a slight problem as far as logistics are concerned. It is Klassen's Jewish way of thinking, perhaps borrowed from the book of Zephania, to rid the world of all non-White people. Indeed, if Klassen would try to eliminate all Jewish names from the dictionary, names like Benjamin as in Benjamin Klassen, he would be far more successful than trying to rid the world of meat and human flesh.

DUMP THE CHURCH OF THE CREATOR!

Sincerely,
Ronald Hand

Christian Obscurantism

In foisting its other-worldly obsessions upon our Folk, Christianity perpetrates distortions and untruths which corrode the Indo-Germanic spirit. Christianity maintains it is the Religion of Love. Christians even go as far as to claim that they 'introduced' the idea of Love Thy Neighbor. This is categorically untrue. This kind of love is inborn; it is perfectly natural for all people to love their own kith and kin. If that were not true, our ancestors could not possibly have survived the era in which they lived as hunters and gatherers. Christianity thus usurps a human trait that we all have from Nature.

Christianity professes a concern for the 'poorest of the poor,' the downtrodden, the wretched incompetents and similar creatures. Regularly the Church implores the better-offs to help the helpsless and the rich to give their money to the poor, preferably, of course, by way of the Church. What some can't (or won't) accomplish should be handed to them by those who are achievement-oriented. Presenting human failures as models is contrary to Nature! Nature from which we stem, and which has existed for countless millions of years, operates on the principle 'To the Victor Belong the Spoils.'

Nietzsche identified Christianity as the religion that says 'No' to life. It idealizes such destructive tendencies as withdrawal from the world, resistance of natural drives and the abasement of genuine spiritual impulses. Thus it is a negative religion, an 'un-divine' religion, one that does not speak to our senses.

As the gospels themselves tell us, the first 'converts' to Jesus of Nazareth were thieves, sinners, and scorners. Jesus himself is reported to have said that sinners who believe in him will get to heaven sooner than the just.

The unwelcome harvest of the Original Sin theory is that it nourishes evil tendencies in people. If someone tells a person 'You are stained with Original Sin, everything you do and all your good works cannot blot out that stain—just believe in Jesus!—then the person would be discouraged to lead a decent and productive life. In fact, why should he? After all, according to Christians, the ONLY determining factor is 'belief in Jesus' and his 'redemption.' Whatever moral fiber may still be present among us, is present not because of Christianity, but in spite of it.

The philosopher Soren Kierkegaard called Christianity 'Satan's Invention:' "... in order to be a Christian, one must abandon oneself, jump into the unknown, and with faith deal with the irrational."

To this day, especially in the southern states of the Bible Belt, Christians actually initiate legal proceedings against the teachings of evolution. Despite all the overwhelming evidence of evolution, Christians insist on believing in the creation magic 'because the Bible tells me so.'

Some 2300 years ago, a Greek thinker, Empedokles, outlined a theory on elements and suggested the possibility of an evolution process which differed very little from that advanced by Darwin just over 100 years ago. Regrettably, a 'Dark Age' of Christianity intervened the lifespans of these two men. "As a result of ideas of a nomadic goat herder from Palestine, we lost one and one-half thousand years in our mental development," wrote a famous author of several books on environmental protection. Preventing a return of these dark ages is our mission!

All Indo-Germanic religions have always preached achievement, a search for knowledge, and have offered their people natural models. Prominent, heroic, and distinguished people will always live in the memory of our Nordic Folk. Among Christians, striving for knowledge and heroic accomplishment has been condemned. Already in the Old Testament the so-called First Parents were chased out of Paradise because they desired knowledge and wisdom. Most certainly this would not have been done by a Germanic god since it is a Germanic trait to help one's offspring to gain wisdom and knowledge. Only with these skills can one successfully lead a good and wholesome life. One should look at Nature, study it, observe how it works; then one will appreciate what we are saying. People—Nordic as well as others—have an inborn desire to learn. The Christian effort at stifling this desire, promising a happy after-life if we will only put up with ignorance and poverty now, has been the downfall of many societies for the past 2000 years.

Let us therefore re-dedicate ourselves to our Nordic religious values, and by our work of enlightenment and by our living example, may we banish the blight of Christian obscurantism! —W.H.

SOME QUOTABLE QUOTES FROM AMERICA'S DECLINE

On the 18th Amendment (Prohibition): "Very few Americans were sufficiently sane to perceive that they had repudiated the American conception of government and had replaced it with the legal principle of the 'dictatorship of the proletariat,' which was the theoretical justification of the Jews' revolution in Russia."

FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION

The editor-publisher of Liberty Bell does not necessarily agree with each and every article in this magazine, nor does he subscribe to all conclusions arrived at by various writers; however, he does endeavor to permit the exposure of ideas suppressed by the controlled news media of this country.

It is, therefore, in the best tradition of America and of free men everywhere that Liberty Bell strives to give free reign to ideas, for ultimately it is ideas which rule the world and determine both the content and structure of culture.

We believe that we can and will change our society for the better. We declare our long-held view that no institution or government created by men, for men, is inviolable, incorruptible, and not subject to evolution, change or replacement by the will of the people.

To this we dedicate our lives and our work. No effort will be spared and no idea will be allowed to go unexpressed if we think it will benefit the Thinking People, not only of America, but the entire world.

Truth sometimes appears in the strangest places. It may even occur in statements made by Jews when they are in an especially exhilarated mood.

The Atlanta Journal and Constitution on 4 March 1984 featured, in an article by one Randy Schultz, the exultation of our domestic enemies when they elected a Jew to the municipal government of Palm Beach. They estimated that about half of the population of the once exclusive island is already composed of Jews, whence it follows, of course, that they will soon stink the place up, as they have done in the once decent towns of Miami Beach and Fort Lauderdale, obeying the strange compulsion that was most clearly described by Samuel Roth in his invaluable book, Jews Must Live, an Account of the Persecution of the World by Israel on All the Frontiers of Civilization.[1] Roth was an honest Jew who, having been swindled too often by his fellow Jews and told that he must grin and bear it for the sake of racial solidarity against the hated goyim, finally defected from his race and described its fixed habits on the basis of his inside knowledge of his own species. We owe gratitude to his memory.

The article in the jewspaper naturally goes on to censure the perversity of lowly Aryans, who, though wealthy enough to live in Palm Beach, are still Aryans and don't delight in their masters' stench. And while joyously celebrating the progress made in breaking into the Everglades Club, the Breakers, and other places in which the Aryan curs try to crawl away from the supervising eyes of God's Master Race, the happy Jews let slip one fact: "by one count, 23 million Jews came to the United States between 1880 and 1920."

1. Samuel Roth's book was published by the Golden Hind Press in New York City, and is now extremely rare (guess why!). Around 1964, about half of this book of 319 pages was reproduced photographically by a "right wing" organization that took care to omit all the pages and passages that would have displeased those of its members who expected to hob-nob with Jesus ben Yahweh after they were buried. This truncation of Roth's work has been reprinted several times and is certainly well worth reading in itself; copies may be obtained from Liberty Bell Publications. I have long hoped, however, that some American publisher will reprint the whole of this excellent, authoritative, and indispensable study, which should be required reading in every honest course in ethnology.

That is a figure you should memorize, together with the dates, so that you can recall it whenever you see official statistics that report there are only about seven million of God's specially-created Masterpieces in North America and about twice that many in the whole world. In its early days, Instauration carried an article that noted there was a difference of about one million in the number of Jews in the United States as reported by different Jewish groups to reassure nervous goyim. Several readers, who wanted to find some element of truth in the Jews' figures, suggested that by "population" the Jews meant only male Jews who were the heads of families and members of orthodox synagogues.

Well, so now we know, thanks to their ebullience over their victory on Palm Beach Island, that twenty-three million swarmed into what was then our country between 1880 and 1920, and, of course, we may be sure they multiplied fast as soon as they fixed their mandibles in the hides of their stupid Aryan prey. And if we wish to estimate the total now upon us, we must, of course, add the swarms who arrived before 1880 and after 1920.

We may be sure that Jews reached what became American territory as soon as there were goyim on whom to practice usury, but it seems that the first record of them dates from 1654, when a party of twenty-four or more arrived in New Amsterdam and naturally tried to swindle the gullible owner of the ship who had brought them, whom they had promised to pay for their passage on arrival. They were followed by an unknown number of their compatriots and made so much trouble that the governor of the Dutch colony, Peter Stuyvesant, tried to exclude the aliens. He was overruled and reprimanded, however, by his superiors, the owners of the Dutch West Indies Company, many of whom were wealthy Jews in Holland, and he was ordered to suspend laws disadvantageous to Jews on the curious grounds that (a) the poor Jews were persecuted in the lands from which they came, and (b) so large a part of the West Indies Company was owned by Jews. Thus was another Promised Land opened to the international race and, appropriately enough, on the site of the huge concrete jungle they have made into New Jerusalem-on-the-Hudson. By 1656, a Jew named Asser Levy was buying up parts of what is now the state of New York as far as Albany and perhaps beyond, and engaged in constant litigation in the courts, where, the Jews noted with particular satisfaction, he invariably won his lawsuits. Judicial corruption is not a recent innovation.[2]

Wherever our race established itself in North America, its parasites promptly followed. They usually infiltrated in small groups. The first mass movement seems to have occurred in 1847 when a Jew bearing the common name of Castro led a small swarm of 5000 into Texas, where the alien oecist is now commemorated by Castro County, south of Amarillo, and Castroville, west of San Antonio.

Even if we had accurate statistics on the immigration of professed Jews before 1880, it would still be impossible to estimate with any confidence the total number of Jews in a given territory at any time. They are a hybrid race with an amazing ability, yet unexplained by the science of genetics, to assimilate the physical characteristics of the people among whom they have established a colony and to resemble so closely Chinese or Aryans as to be indistinguishable from them in appearance. They also have a racial capacity that makes them cultural chameleons. In one of his books, Douglas Reed reported his observation of Jewish business men who travelled between Germany and Italy and were Germans north of the Brenner Pass and Italians south of it, changing from one personality to the other as easily as a man changes his neckties.

Most of us, I am sure, have had acquaintances or colleagues whom we assumed to be members of our race, often for a fairly long period of time, until we were with them in convivial circumstances and their tongues were loosened by alcohol or they indiscreetly formed a cluster with other Jews and exhibited the characteristics of their race. Often we are as amazed as was the congregation of a fairly well-known

2. Although it is only marginal to the Jewish problem, this is a point of some importance, if you want to think about social realities. The great Italian historian, statesman, and political philosopher, Guicciardini (1483-1540) suggested that the existing system of lawyers and courts be replaced by an arrangement by which the contesting litigants met and threw dice, with the decision going to the man who threw the highest number. That, he said, would be a great improvement, since a just decision would be rendered in half of all lawsuits. He did not, however, suggest a means of preventing the use of loaded dice by the persons who usually won in the courts under the existing system.

Protestant theologian, Nicolas Antoine, when he suffered some kind of nervous breakdown and announced that he was a Jew. He boasted he had even managed to mock his audiences by actually reciting Jewish formulae when they thought he was pronouncing the words of Christian sacraments or sermons. That was near Geneva in the Seventeenth Century and it was never established whether he was a Jew who had been smitten with some irrational impulse to tell the truth or was an European whose theological studies had shown him that the "Old Testament" was incompatible with the "New" and had opted for the former, to the distress of his conscience.

In December 1979 the periodical Instauration published the following very significant letter from a subscriber:

> The writer of a letter in your August issue estimates the number of Jews in our country at "twenty million or more." He is probably right. I grew up in the 1930s in a small town in Minnesota that had a population of four to five thousand. When I went east to a graduate school, one of my professors was an amiable Jewish scholar, whom I came to know fairly well. In a conversation one day I remarked that I had spent my childhood in a town in which there were no Jews. He smiled patronizingly. "They were there," he said, "but you didn't know it."

The estimate of twenty million, to which the writer refers, was, of course, much too low, if, as the Jews have now disclosed, twenty-three million swarmed in between 1880 and 1920.

Even the extent of Jewish influence over a society is not a measure of their numbers, for their race instinctively uses and intensifies existing weaknesses in the people whose country they have invaded. One clear indication of the growth of Jewish influence in the United States is their success in arousing the American itch to meddle sanctimoniously in other peoples' business, a trait that was brought to us by the Puritans as part of their essentially Judaic cult. In 1840, the American government in Washington had the effrontery to try to tell the Turks how "justice and humanity" required them to treat the Jews lodged in their country. By 1851, this insufferable arrogance had become so overweening that Washington actually began to harass the Swiss diplomatically to teach that nation how to behave with due reverence toward the Jews who had chosen to eat on it.

The Jews have always derived great advantages from the two religions they gave to the goyim, Christianity for the Aryans and Islam for the Semites, and the religions furthermore have usually, though not always, protected them from the resentment of the populations they were exploiting. Dissidence between the many reciprocally antagonistic sects into which those religions naturally divided themselves provided further opportunities for profit and manipulation.[3]

Of all the religions that have addled the minds of our race, none have been more mischievous than the jumble of widely divergent sects that the British lump together under the rubric 'Dissenters.' They are characterized by what Dr. Samuel Johnson (in his biography of Akenside) perceptively defined as "a zeal which sometimes disguises from the world, and not rarely from the mind which it possesses, an envious desire of plundering wealth or degrading greatness." Those proletarian cults, nurtured in urban slums, had a charm much greater than the appeal of crack-pots' discoveries of what the Bible really meant. They provided piety as a cover for skullduggery, and righteousness to mask envy and festering malice that yearns to humiliate and destroy all that is above its own baseness. This made it possible for rabble-rousers, egged on and partly financed by the Jews, to incite the venomous hatred of the prosperity and culture of the Southern planters, disguised as righteous indignation that black anthropoids were made useful as slaves. The ranting and lying of the Abolitionists made possible the formation of the Republican Party, which was

3. It may be worthy of remark that Lebanon, which was made an "independent nation" in 1920 in accordance with the principles of Woodrow Wilson's nightmare, must have been designed as a source of perpetual trouble. Its people are almost all Semites, more or less mongrelized. Of the many religious sects, which hate each other cordially, fifteen were large enough to be guaranteed places in the government by the "nation's" constitution, which also provided that the President must always be some kind of Christian, while the Premier was some kind of Moslem. Of the fifteen major sects, the more important are: Maronite Christians, Sunnite Moslems, Shi'ite Moslems, Greek Orthodox Christians, Druses, and Greek Uniate Catholics. The Druses are the most virile element in the biological compost heap; their fanaticism, no more absurd than the others, is a bizarre mish-mash in which Arnold Toynbee, in one of his silliest moments, saw "the pearl of great price for which a frustrated world is seeking." French troops and administrators maintained a semblance of order until they were finally withdrawn in 1946. The Jews in Israel began harassing Lebanon two years later. When the United States began to soften up Lebanon for eventual conquest by the Jews in 1958, the marines were ostensibly sent in to help the President at that time, Chamoun, whom the Americans helped in their usual way, i.e., by overthrowing his government and installing his enemies in power.

dominated and largely financed by many Jews, of whom the most important were the eight Seligman brothers, who popped into the United States in the 1830s and scattered over its territory from New York to San Francisco, but always operated secretly as a financial unit. (Beginning as vendors of cheap clothing in small towns, they were so industrious that by 1879 they and their friends, the Rothschilds, held almost the whole of the bonded indebtedness of the United States; that will show you how talented the eight Jew boys were.) They selected as their instrument a backwoods politician named Abraham Lincoln.[4] And so, with the aid of their compatriots in the South, they succeeded in precipitating an invasion of the South, and rubbed their hands in glee as they saw Aryans slaughter Aryans and destroy the wealth of the South, reducing its civilized inhabitants to penury and opening the ruined land to the hordes of Jews who swarmed in to prey upon white and black alike, while their compatriots in the North exulted in the first government in Washington that was massively corrupt and was plundered on a scale that presaged the blessings we now enjoy.[5]

4. This is not the place to attempt an evaluation of the character of Lincoln. It will suffice to note that he intended to ship the niggers out of the United States, to Africa, if necessary, but preferably to islands in the Carribean and Central America, to reduce the cost of transportation. He actually did obtain from Congress an appropriation that enabled him to make a beginning by shipping 5000 to Haiti. While racially sound, this policy, as he seems not to have perceived, would have entailed a complete transformation of Southern agriculture, for it was no more possible to raise cotton without niggers than it was to raise wheat without horses. Lincoln conducted the war of aggression on the basis of a determination, perhaps sincere, to "save the Union" by denying the Confederacy the right that the American colonies had exercised when they dissolved the Union with the mother country, a union that was far more binding, both legally and morally. The colonies complained of some taxation, which was trifling in comparison with the economic exploitation of the South by the greedy Yankees before 1860. There is much to be said for Lincoln as a man, having regard to the circumstances of his early life, but the abject adulation of him is simply part of the massive brain-washing that has been administered to children in the schools for more than a century to justify the horrors of what is mendaciously called a Civil War. I cannot here consider the Jews' claim, which seems to have been first made in 1865 and was recently revived, that Lincoln was himself a crypto-Jew. It seems most unlikely.

5. It should be remembered that before the Republican Party came to power, 'corruption,' in the Federal government was limited to giving the comparatively few positions in Federal employment to one's friends and

The rich Jews put up the money to get that delightful war under way, but we should, I think, mention an especially "idealistic" Jew, Carl Schurz, who was one of the most energetic campaign orators for Lincoln and is said to have contributed greatly to his election in 1860. Schurz was rewarded with an appointment as a General in the Northern army of invasion, and when the South was ruined, he distinguished himself for his idealistic effort to promote legislation that would make it a felony and Federal offense for a white woman to refuse to marry a nigger who tapped her on the shoulder and said, "Come on, you bitch." The law failed of enactment, even with a provision that a white woman whose attorneys could convince a Federal court that she had some valid reason for refusing the ennobling copulation could escape prison, but it will be seen that Schurz was a man ahead of his time and a pioneer in "civil rights" legislation more advanced than any that has thus far been enacted by the Congress.

This will give you the measure of the Jews' influence by 1860, but while we may be sure that they were already numerous in our country, it does not permit us to estimate their numbers.

We may be sure that between 1860 and 1880 God's migratory tribe flocked into their new Promised Land, many of them, no doubt, disguised as Englishmen, Germans, , Frenchmen, or other Aryans, but again we have no secure basis for estimating their numbers.

From 1880 to 1920, we have the Jews' count of 23,000,000, our first precise statistic. They doubtless continued to trickle in from 1920 to 1932, when the great influx began as snivelling Aryans welcomed "refugees" from Germany, where the wicked Germans were trying to recover control of their own country. If all of the famous six million, who arose from their ashes after Hitler incinerated them, did not stream into the United States, we may be sure that millions of their cousins did, and again we political supporters, who, in office, naturally favored their friends. The massive looting of the Federal treasury began with the Republican triumph. Typically, the Seligmans loaned money to the Federal government so that it could buy from them shoddy merchandise at vastly inflated prices for the "war effort." Unscrupulous Americans were, of course, permitted to join in the looting, thus ensuring their complicity. It seems unlikely that Jewish business methods, whether practiced by the aliens or by renegade Aryans, reached at any time during the Nineteenth Century their present refinement, by which, as was recently disclosed even in the press, the Army pays $3000 for a tool it could buy at the local hardware store for $1.98.

have no statistics. It will be recalled that at the time of the last census, the Jews forbade their American subjects to ascertain even the number of them that admitted they were Jews, and while the Jews themselves doubtless kept a fairly accurate count, they have not yet disclosed it. Perhaps, as they become more confident and arrogant in their ownership of this Promised Land, they will, in some moment of expansive glee, disclose it. So all that you can do now is make a guess by trying to extrapolate from the one figure they have disclosed.

In an article first published in two British periodicals, Spearhead and New Nation, in 1980 I estimated that there were, throughout the world, "from thirty to sixty million" Jews who were actively or passively coöperating in putting over such hoaxes as the "Holocaust" and "Anne Frank's Diary" on the stupid goyim. In the light of the disclosure at Palm Beach it now appears that I should have said "at least sixty million."

Such racial cohesion against other races is simply proof that the Jews are justified in their fanatical faith in their enormous racial superiority. From a strictly biological standpoint, the only test of the relative superiority of any species is its ability to survive and expand at the expense of other species. So far as we can predict now on the basis of present facts, instead of hopes and a sentimental Narcissism, Aryans are incapable of coping with such a race and are likely to realize what seems to be a subconscious death-wish, which could be the racial psyche's perception that our species, like the dwindling mountain gorillas, is biologically obsolete. Of course, it may be that our people will be rewarded for their righteousness when their ghosts float up to their Jewish Saviour in the clouds and are given a pat on the head and an all-day sucker in recognition of their humanitarian piety.

In The Enemy of Our Enemies (pp. 114f., n.63) I mentioned an amusing early version of the Jews' Holohoax, concocted before they decided which version of their Big Lie they would vociferously promote to bamboozle the Aryan boobs, whom they both hate and despise. It was Dr. Stefan Szende's Der letzte Jude aus Polen, published at Zurich in 1944. I did not then know that the Yiddish excretion had been translated into English under a changed title, and I owe to a friend photocopies made from the copy in the Library of Congress.

Reproduced on the following pages are the title-page of the book and the pages that describe the marvellous machinery that the wicked Germans used to slay millions of God's Masterpieces. If you know anything about mechanical engineering and electricity, you will enjoy the funny story, so read it for yourself.

I really do not know why the Jews decided to discard that tale and substitute the wild fiction about the famous "gas chambers" when they had their American serfs perpetrate the foul murders at Nuremberg to teach the world what happens to the lower animals that disobey the masters Yahweh set over them. It can't be that they thought to make the preposterous story more plausible by replacing electrical impossibilities with chemical impossibilities. Their contempt for the Aryan curs is so great that they never take the trouble to make their hoaxes even superficially plausible.

It is simply a racial characteristic of the Jewish mind that it will not take the small amount of care that would be required to make the stories they throw at the goyim at least as believable as fiction published in our magazines of adventure stories.

Take, for example, the slop called "Anne Frank's Diary," which is said to make some feeble-minded Aryans snivel at its pathos. It is simply full of the most glaring inconsistencies. In that tale we are told that a band of poor, persecuted Jews had to hide from the terrible Gestapo in a whole series of rooms that formed a secret [!] part of the house, to which the entrance was through a secret door concealed behind a hinged bookcase. And we are expected to believe that those diabolical Germans couldn't guess how many rooms there were in a house of quite moderate size, and did not become curious when the postman on his rounds brought mail for those Jews in hiding, including lessons from a university in which some of them had enrolled for correspondence courses! On one page, we are told that in their pitiable plight the poor Jews are so terrified that they almost smother a sick Jewess, lest her coughs be overheard by the ubiquitous Gestapo, and a few pages later we are told that when those Jews are having a high old time, they not only scream and shout at one another, but even fire off a revolver! And the dread Gestapo, ever prowling about the fold in which God's precious lambs are hiding, can't hear the uproar or even the shots from the revolver!

Belzec was a little place to the north of Rawa-Ruska, just on the 1939 Russo-German frontier. Immediately this frontier line had been agreed on, the Russians had begun to erect fortifications on a big scale. When the German troops crossed the frontier in June, 1941, the fortifications were still incomplete.

It was from these half-finished Russian fortifications that the Nazis made their slaughter-house in which millions of Jews were exterminated.

To exterminate 5 million people is an enormous task, and even in our age of technical perfection it needs a lot of preparing and organizing, and there are many problems to be faced by those planning to carry it out. Tens of thousands, even hundreds of thousands, of Jews had been taken to "Pjaski." Further tens of thousands, even hundreds of thousands had died as a result of ill-treatment, starvation and disease. But there were still millions left and they all had to be killed in accordance with the orders of the Fuehrer.

Even the effective killing of bed-bugs or lice on a large scale demands a certain technique. However, no one can doubt that the Germans are a highly talented people in all technical matters. Amongst them there were highly efficient engineers of death. These men were given their instructions by the Gestapo, and they set to work to solve the technical problems to which the mass slaughter of millions of defenseless men, women and children gives rise. They solved the problem. They solved it brilliantly. Their Fuehrer, Adolf Hitler, and Himmler, the head of the Gestapo, must be well satisfied with them and their work.

Months of planning and building operations were necessary, but the Germans are a patient people and the objective was worth the time spent on achieving it. The extermination of millions of Jews with the very latest modern technical means —what an enticing aim! Hundreds of thousands of labor hours were expended. Tens of thousands of tons of valuable materials were used in the process. But at last, in the spring of 1942, the scientific slaughter-house at Belzec was ready.

The mass-killing installation at Belzec occupies an area almost five miles across. This area is surrounded by barbed wire and every other modern device for keeping prisoners in and others out. No one is permitted to come near the place except properly authorized persons or those who will never leave the place alive. But despite all these precautions there were one or two people who saw the inside of Belzec and nevertheless succeeded in escaping. Despair and desperation makes a man ingenious.

Specially chosen S.S. men guard the Belzec killing plant. They are men without nerves. There is much to do in a slaughter-house and it gives sadists great pleasure to compel their victims to do as much of it as possible. For instance, the clothes and the belongings of the millions of victims had to be collected and sorted out. For this purpose the S.S. chose certain Jews out of each transport that arrived. These Jews were not spared, of course. It was merely that their execution was postponed. Two such Jews actually succeeded in making their escape. They escaped into the Ghetto which still existed in Rawa-Ruska at the time. In Rawa-Ruska they reported the details of the technically perfected slaughter going on in Belzec.

As far as I know, no Jew ever succeeded in escaping from Belzec and reaching neutral or Allied territory. The two Jews who made their escape from Belzec to Rawa-Ruska in the summer of 1942 were probably killed subsequently when the Ghetto there was liquidated, but a number of people who heard the evidence of these two fugitives from Belzec did escape. The following description of the Belzec slaughter-house comes from them.

The trains coming into Belzec loaded with Jews were driven into a tunnel in the underground premises of the execution building. There the Jews were unloaded and ordered to divest themselves of all their things. In 1942 Jews arriving at Belzec came dressed and carrying all sorts of belongings with them. Fully loaded trains from Germany, Austria, Czechoslovakia, Belgium, Holland, France and the Balkan States arrived in Belzec, and they were all treated in the same way. These Jews were told to take all their things with them, as they were going to be "settled" in the East. Thus tens of thousands of Jews arrived, bringing all sorts of property with them, typewriters, sewing machines, crockery, silver and so on.

Everything was taken away from them. The goods seized in this way were carefully sorted out, listed and ticketed and subsequently used for the benefit of the master race. It was to spare the staff at Belzec this tremendous task, which, of course, hindered them in their real job, that later on all Jews were sent to Belzec naked.

When trainloads of naked Jews arrived they were herded into a great hall capable of holding several thousand people. This hall had no windows and its flooring was of metal. Once the Jews were all inside, the floor of this hall sank like a lift into a great tank of water which lay below it until the Jews were up to their waists in water. Then a powerful electric current was sent into the metal flooring and within a few seconds all the Jews, thousands at a time, were dead.

The metal flooring then rose again and the water drained away. The corpses of the slaughtered Jews were now heaped all over the floor. A different current was then switched on and the metal flooring rapidly became red hot, so that the corpses were incinerated as in a crematorium and only ash was left.

The floor was then tipped up and the ashes slid out into prepared receptacles. The smoke of the process was carried away by great factory chimneys.

That was the whole procedure. As soon as it was completed, it could start up again. New batches of Jews were constantly being driven into the tunnels. The individual trains brought between 3,000 and 5,000 Jews at a time, and there were days on which the Belzec line saw between twenty and thirty such trains arrive.

Modern industrial and engineering technique in Nazi hands triumphed over all difficulties. The problem of how to slaughter millions of people rapidly and effectively was solved.

The underground slaughter-house spread a terrible stench around the neighborhood, and sometimes whole districts were covered with the foul-smelling smoke from the burning human bodies.

When we read "Anne Frank's Diary" we lose sight of the lie in sheer disgust at the insulting negligence of the Jew who threw such garbage in the face of Aryans. I have mentioned but two of the preposterous internal contradictions; for more, read the stuff (if you can stand it) or see Ditlieb Felderer's Anne Frank's Diary—a Hoax (Torrance, Calfornia, 1979).

We are dealing with what is simply a characteristic of the Jewish mentality. Consider, as another example, the silly story, which the murderous "judges" at Nuremberg professed to believe, about how the horrid Germans packed crowds of God's precious darlings into rooms and then exterminated them with the exhaust of the diesel motors of trucks drawn up for that purpose. Now if you or I or any Aryan had been trying to put over a lie like that, and even if we knew somehow that only very stupid people would read it, we would, at the very least, have first ascertained whether it is feasible to asphyxiate anyone with the fumes of diesel motors, which, of course, differ greatly from the gasoline motors of ordinary automobiles, which do produce carbon monoxide in lethal quantities. And I think we would also have gone to a library and read a few issues of German newspapers published during the period in question, just to be sure of the general background of our tale. What is really funny—almost hilarious—about the shoddy Jewish hoax is that if its perpetrators had not begrudged the few hours that we would spend in elementary preparation for such a story, they would have found a way to concoct a lie that was plausible on the face of it. See Friedrich P. Berg's clear demonstration of the opportunity the Jews missed; his excellent article, "The Diesel Gas Chambers: Myth Within a Myth," is in the Spring 1984 issue of the Journal of Historical Review.

I suppose we cannot really understand the mental processes of that strange, predatory race, so the crudity of their hoaxes is puzzling. Is it from sheer feckless insolence that they tell such preposterous tales, or do they intentionally make them unbelievable to enforce a lesson that brains of Aryan curs must freeze when their masters speak, and that if a Jew tells an Aryan that two and two makes seven, the animal must at least pretend to believe it? Or do they assume that they have so rotted the Aryan mind with poisonous superstitions that Aryans will actually believe whatever they are told by Yahweh's supermen? Or is it that the Jewish mind cannot reason when it is convulsed by a paroxysm of hatred of our race?

The last question is worthy of consideration. The Jews'

Talmud was written for Jews and only for Jews, and incidentally contains a provision that nasty Aryans who learn to read it should be killed. Now the Talmud contains (Midrash Rabbah) an ostensibly historical account of the atrocities perpetrated by the diabolical Romans at the time of the Jewish revolt that was led by a christ named Bar Kokhba in 132 of the Christian Era. The Jews who read that Midrash were told, on the authority of named Rabbis, that in the town of Bethar, which had a total area about equivalent to five of our city blocks, the awful Romans slew no less than 800,000,000 (eight hundred million) of God's Chosen; that the precious blood thus shed was so deep in the street that the Romans' horses were immersed to their nostrils; and that the sacred gore became a raging torrent that rushed down forty miles to the Mediterranean, dislodging boulders from its path and staining the waters of the sea crimson for four miles from shore.

Now to our minds—if we are so "anti-Semitic" as to question the word of great Rabbis—it seems strange that the five square blocks of Bethar housed (in comfort and luxury, we are told) eight times as many Jews as the total population of the entire Roman Empire at that time, and a quick calculation will show that those 800,000,000 godly Jews cannot have been larger than our grasshoppers.* But, so far as we can tell, the pious Jews who read their holy book never made that calculation, although they would not have missed the least fraction in computing usury. They evidently believed that story and we can only suppose that their minds went into a spasm of hatred for the accursed goyim and never questioned the arithmetic.

The tale of Bethar is, of course, just one of the "Holocausts" that the Jews invent from time to time to show how God's Own are persecuted by the lower races, but what makes it significant is that it was invented, not to make stupid Aryans snivel and feel guilty, but to excite other Jews, the educated Jews, who alone could read the Talmud. It suggests that when Jews are in a paroxysm of their hatred of other races, and especially our race, they enter a mental state that we should identify as insanity in one of our own people.

* The calculation is confirmed by other details in the story; for example, the 64,000,000 schoolchildren of Bethar attended numerous schools attached to the 400 synagogues. Given the area of the town, a synagogue cannot have been larger than one of the dolls' houses that are commonly given to little girls today, and since 160,000 children were attached to that synagogue, and the ratio of children to adults in the town's population was 1:11½, there must have been 1,840,000 adults to attend that synagogue. So many grasshoppers could not fit into such a space, so perhaps the Jews in Bethar were not larger than lice or, at the most, bedbugs.

That deduction may seem startling to some readers, but how otherwise can they explain a recent manifestation of the Jewish mentality, set forth in the German Bildzeitung for 17 May 1984? In an article in that publication, widely circulated in Germany, the Jews, foaming at the mouth in rage that Walter Rauff, a "Nazi" guilty of not having venerated the perfect race that Yahweh specially created to rule all others, had not been tortured and murdered by their American dogs at Nuremberg, and had escaped to live out his life and die a natural death in Chile, screeched that Rauff alone was responsible for the death of 250,000,000 of God's Darlings. Now the figure given, 250,000,000, is considerably more than the total population, men, women, and children, and including Jews and other aliens, that resided in 1939 in all of Western Europe: Germany (including Austria), England, Scotland, Wales, Ireland, France, Italy, Spain, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Switzerland, and even Czecho-Slovakia. And if Rauff was himself responsible for shedding the holy ichor in the veins of two hundred and fifty million of God's Own, then, since there are still many other "Nazis" to be hunted down by the Jews and their packs of Aryan hounds, and hundreds, at least, have already been murdered for similar crimes, even a computer would squeal, if it were asked to compute the total number of Yahweh's precious children whom all the Germans exterminated—and then to compute the number of planets the size of the earth that would have been needed to hold all of them, assuming they were larger than the Jews of Bethar.

I submit that no mind that we would regard as sane could have set the number of Rauff's victims at 250,000,000, even if it was in a passion of rage and hatred. If you do not believe that the Jewish mentality operates in ways beyond our comprehension, you must opt for the only alternative, that Jewish contempt for Aryans is indeed infinite.

It distresses me to add that for such contempt the Jews have ample justification. The cringing Aryan dogs who rule Germany today are trying to bite all Germans who are intelligent enough to question the Jews' Big Lie, their Holohoax, and dare to say so. For the rulers of Germany, contemptible as they are, one can imagine some apology, but what conceivable excuse can be made for the Canadians?

The terrorism of the Canadian Government's vile prosecution of James Keegstra in Alberta was described by John Tyndall in an article reprinted in Liberty Bell, July 1984. In Toronto, Ernst Zündel has been protected from disabling injuries by the police who escort him through mobs of Jews howling for his blood as he is taken to court, where he must stand trial for the heinous crime of doubting what Jews want their dogs to believe. And I learn from David McCalden's Newsletter, that on 6 September the Royal Canadian Mounted Police raided the library of the University of Calgary and confiscated a copy of Dr. Arthur Butz's irrefragable Hoax of the Twentieth Century. The Aryan serfs of the Canadian Government must be taught that facts are what Jews say they are, and that if a Jew tells an Aryan to wag his tail, the Aryan had better grow a tail in a hurry or suffer the consequences.

Such are the actions of the creatures who now govern Canada, a land which, my older readers may remember, once had a population of which the great majority was Anglo-Saxon. As the gentleman who writes under the name of General R. Never reiterates, "A people deserve what they permit." It follows inescapably that the Anglo-Saxons of Canada are responsible for the degradation and squalor in which they now exist. And it is no excuse for them that they tax themselves about $900,000,000 a year to subsidize the Canadian Broadcasting System, which means that every man, woman, and child pays almost $40 a year to have Jewish slime smeared in their faces.

I do hope that the pages from Szende's book reproduced above are widely circulated in Canada. They contain a version of the "Holocaust" hoax that the Jews are not currently pushing, but they are nevertheless a tale told by a Jew, which must therefore be believed by Canadians. It will be amusing to watch the Royal Canadian Mounted Police as they raid all the libraries in Canada and burn all the textbooks of electrical engineering. In fact, I am not sure that if Canada is to be purged of the abomination of "anti-Semitism," it will not be necessary to destroy all generating plants and electrical appliances in Canada. So long as white Canadians are permitted to use electricity, some criminally-minded Canadian might experiment with it and come to doubt the story that he is racially obliged to believe.

The newsletter of the Southern National Party for Summer, 1984, features an anonymous article purportedly written by an American refugee who has found asylum in Ireland.

The author, evidently a Southerner who in some undisclosed way seriously annoyed the rulers of the United States, says he was visited by representatives of a Federal agency that must be either the Federal Bureau of Intimidation or the Conspirators' Intelligence Agency, both of which, insofar as they are distinguishable now, maintain squads of well-trained perjurers and assassins to promote "democracy." They brought him his passport and warned him to exile himself from the United States and never return to his native land. He says, "If I declined their generous invitation to get the hell out of Dodge, then my allotted span on this mortal coil* was apt to be short. 'We could very easily get a tip, anonymously, of course, that you had an illegal weapon or something in your apartment,' were their precise words, 'We'd kick in the door, find what we are looking for, and then all it would take is one night in the federal holding facility in .....(the state capitol) and a carton of cigarettes to some bullpen nigger, and you'd get a

* I need not remark that if the anonymous author wrote 'on' instead of 'in,' he misread his Shakespeare and did not read enough of him. When Hamlet says, "When we have shuffled off this mortal coil," he means, 'When we have rid ourselves of the turmoil and confusion of life.' That is the normal meaning of 'coil' in Shakespeare, e.g., Much Ado About Nothing (III.iii.92): "for the wedding being there to-morrow, there's a great coil [i.e., confusion and bustle in the house] to-night." –Incidentally, if you have read G. Gordon Liddy's novel, Out of Control (New York, 1979; paperback, 1980), you will have recognized it as the kind of story in which the protagonist has the adventures the author wishes he could have had. Some episodes are somewhat fantastic, but the author was intimately acquainted with governmental operations, and the hero's session with operatives from the C.I.A. (pp. 281f. of the paperback) is realistic, although the hero's escape from them is not. The men from the C.I.A. politely avoid "disturbing the taxpayers" by inducing "natural" deaths from a heart-attack with cyanide, which their "gun" injects directly into the veins. In circumstances in which it can be used, this device for spreading "democracy" is more efficient than the weapon invented by the Soviets (unless they got it from the United States) that uses cyanide gas and has to be used in the open air. For a diagram of that ingenious mechanism, see Karl Anders, Mord auf Befehl (Tübingen, 1963; a condensed English translation, Murder to Order, complete with diagrams, was published in London in 1965 and distributed in this country by the Boniface Press, then in Philadelphia). The C.I.A.'s instrument for administering social justice is simpler: it consists of a tube that contains a hypodermic syringe with a specially strong needle that is driven home by a powerful spring when the trigger is released.

TRANSLATOR'S INTRODUCTION

Three articles translated from the series, Forschungen zur Judenfrage (1937 ff.) (Studies on the Jewish Problem), have now appeared in the Liberty Bell, viz., the issues of August-September, 1983, August, 1984 and September, 1984. All three of these articles were concerned with the racial and biological aspects of the Jewish question. In the following article from Volume I of the Forschungen zur Judenfrage (1937) by the philosopher Max Wundt we now turn our attention to another aspect of the Jewish question, the influence of Jews on European literature, an influence that became considerable during the course of the eighteenth century. Max Wundt (1879-1963) held academic positions in Marburg, Jena and Tübingen.

One of the best-known of the German dramas of the eighteenth century is Nathan der Weise (Nathan the Wise) by Gotthold Ephraim Lessing (1729-1781). Lessing lived in an age in which traditional religion was being questioned and independent human reason was being considered ever more strongly to be the appropriate basis of wisdom and morality. Lessing's adherence to the ideals of the Age of Enlightenment is reflected in his essay, Die Erziehung des Menschengeschlechts (The Education of the Human Race), published in 1780, in which Lessing examines the motivations for morality during the development of mankind, from an earlier fear of divine punishment (New Testament) and finally to a morality based on independent human reason. Like other Rationalists of his day, Lessing was attracted to the fable as a means of teaching morality. Three volumes containing Lessing's fables and his commentary on this genre appeared in 1759.

The parable of the three rings as symbols of the Jewish, Islamic and Christian faiths was used by Lessing as the central didactic part of his drama, Nathan der Weise, which was published in 1779. The parable is told by Nathan to Saladin, an historical person who was sultan of Egypt and Syria and who lived 1138-1193. In this parable, a father who had three sons whom he loved equally has to decide to which son he will leave a ring that had been passed down through generations of his family and which had the magic power of making its owner endearing to God and man. The father has indistinguishable copies made of the ring. After his death, the three sons, who have inherited the rings, go to a judge, who forgoes making a decision as to which ring is the original one and says that only the passage of time will determine that.

Lessing's Nathan der Weise, with its polemical plea for tolerance of Jews, has doubtless proved to be the most influential of his rather many dramas. During the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries the legal emancipation of Jews progressed rapidly in many German-speaking states.[1]

One of Lessing's earliest dramas was a short comedy, Die Juden, published in 1749, in which mistaken identities form a basis for a plea for tolerance of Jews. In later years, Lessing was a friend of the popular Jewish philosopher, Moses Mendelsohn (1729-1786), the grandfather of the composer Felix Mendelsohn-Bartholdy.[2] Although Lessing was the son of a prominent Protestant pastor in Saxony, his portrayal of the representatives of Christianity in Nathan der Weise is generally unsympathetic, while the hero of the drama, a wealthy Jewish merchant, is portrayed as wise and generous. The setting of the play is the time of the Crusades in the Near East, where Islamic, Jewish and Christian groups come into contact with each other. The immediate origin of the ring parable is one of the novelle of Giovanni Boccaccio (1313-1375), the Florentine poet and Humanist. In the following article, however, Max Wundt traces its origins back to an event of the earlier Middle Ages which some students of Jewish history claim to have had an important effect on the racial makeup of European Jews.[3]

Shakespeare's central Jewish figure in his Merchant of Venice forms a stark contrast to Lessing's Nathan. Shakespeare's play depicting a greedy, merciless, Aryan-hating, wealthy Jew was written around 1596. England had expelled its Jews in 1290 and few Jews were present in the England of Shakespeare's time. Shakespeare thus chose an Italian setting for his play rather than his own country, although it is conjectured that Shakespeare wrote the Merchant of Venice while influenced by a popular hatred of Jews intensified by a plot to poison Queen Elizabeth I by her Jewish physician, Roderigo Lopez, who was hanged in 1594 after his plot was discovered.[4]

Lessing's Nathan der Weise was written nearly two centuries later than The Merchant of Venice and typifies a changed, much more tolerant attitude toward Jews that had come about during the Age of Englightenment. This much more tolerant attitude toward Jews paved the way for the great power which Jews have subsequently amassed in Europe and later in the United States.

NATHAN THE WISE OR THE AGE OF ENLIGHTENMENT AND JEWS

by
Max Wundt

Those who do research on the race question tell us that, although the influence of Jewish blood in Germany was cercertainly the strongest during the past one-hundred years, in some cases it goes back much further, since individual Jews, in fact, attained a high respect as early as the Age of Absolutism and even as early as the Middle Ages and were then in the position to mix their blood with Germanic blood. A similar situation prevails as far as intellectual influence was concerned. It, too, certainly grew to the enormous extent which it reached only during the past hundred years and especially the last fifty years. However, in some ways this influence already manifested itself much earlier and these earlier influences are indeed not unimportant for the understanding of the development of the German intellect in its relation to Jews.

Such an early streak in the tissue not only of the German intellect, but also of the European intellect in general, will be pointed out in this short report.

From Lessing's Nathan the Wise we are all familiar with the question about the value of the various religions and the story of the three rings. Lessing himself gave his source for it, a novella by Boccaccio (I,3). But at most this story has the purpose of admonishing people to be modest so that they do not presume themselves capable of any final judgement concerning the truth of religion and so that they might come together on a certain ground of general humanity beyond the limits of different religions. On the other hand, in spite of the Jewish speaker, not a word is mentioned to the effect that this humanity finds its purest expression just in Jews. However, this feature is most familiar to us in Lessing's Nathan; the Jew is quite in the foreground, he is the noblest human being, the wise man, and for that reason most capable of propagating the teachings of pure humanity.

This favoring of Judaism in the comparison of the religions is no accident. After all, the idea of contrasting their representatives and having them discuss the advantages of their faiths goes back to an old tradition which has its origins in Jewish circles. In medieval Spain, where Christianity, Islam and Jewry collided,
p. 137 such a comparison must have imposed itself especially readily, and in particular on the Jew who, being dispersed amongst the others, could compare himself with them everywhere, saw himself hated and scorned and yet felt himself to be the member of a chosen race. Here the theme of such a comparison confronts us for the first time, and to be specific in the form of a defence of Judaism with the intention, of course, of presenting the Jewish religion as the best and true one.

The Castilian Jew and religious poet Judah Halevi [ca. 1085-1141] introduced this theme into literature in his al-Khazari, a work composed around 1140. He proceeds from an historical event which took place in the eighth century in the Khazar Kingdom on the Caspian Sea. There the king had converted to Judaism, and indeed after he had requested a Christian, a Mohammedan and a Jew to discuss the value of their faiths, as the legend went. When none could convince the other, the king sent them home, but then questioned the Christian and the Moslem in secret as to what religion they would prefer other than their own. Both declared in favor of the Jewish religion. The king thus believed that the advantage of the Jewish religion was proved and converted to it.

Judah Halevi shapes this story in his work. However, while he has a Christian and a Moslem, to whom he adds a philosopher as a representative of heathendom, present their religions only briefly, there follows an extensive presentation of the Jewish religion. It is supposed to be proved the best one, which is revealed most directly by God to his chosen people. It is supposedly the "core and jewel" of the human race and after it essentially nothing new has been added.

No one will reproach the old Jew for defending his faith with such eloquent words and we would not need to become further excited about these tales of the distant past if the book, al-Khazari, had not influenced the intellect of the European nations at an important point of their development.

The frightful and so often cruel battles which were fought as early as the Middle Ages between Christianity and Islam and then among Christian nations themselves in the wake of the Reformation and Counter-Reformation awakened at an early time a longing for a common religion in which the enemies could unite. It was not the worst minds of these centuries that struggled for this objective. They believed that it would have to be possible to find a so-called "natural religion" that would extend beyond all limits of the specific doctrinal structures, that God had placed naturally in the hearts of men and that was therefore common to all. From such a spirit arose, for example, the beautiful writing of the man to whom is often attributed the beginning of truly German philosophy, the writing of Nikolaus von Kues concerning peace or agreement in faith (de pace seu concordantia fidei, composed between 1453 and 1464). He, too, depicts a religious conversation in which, however, divine wisdom itself instructs the representatives of the various nations. In this connection Nikolaus speaks on the basis of German feeling inasmuch as he seeks to prove that Platonic-Christian mysticism to be true which he took over from Master Eckhardt and which indeed was destined to form the basis of the Weltanschauung for the Germanic nations. In p. 138 this work not the slightest value was placed on agreement with the Jews; on the contrary, in a number of passages a distinct distance is taken from them.

However, the idea of a natural religion did not gain acceptance in this form, but rather in a quite different one. The striving of the nations for peace and agreement in religion is certainly not peculiar. However, the fact that the Jewish religion offered itself as such as common ground, on which even the Christian denominations in particular could unite, may certainly be designated as peculiar.

In fact, the shape of the natural religion which was destined to gain recognition we first find in the work by Jean Bodin [ca. 1529-1596], which was composed soon after 1590, the Colloquium heptaplomeres. The author, a politician and famous writer, played a somewhat vacillating role in the complexities of the Huguenot Wars. In his works he displayed a decided preference for Jewry and a precise knowledge of Jewish literature, which he can have obtained only in close association with Jewish scholars.[1] For that reason he was considered a half-Jew, even at an early time: a conjecture which, however, is not confirmed by the latest investigation of his family (E. Pasquier, Revue d'histoire de l'église de France, Volume 19, 1933, pp. 457-462). He had the highest respect for the Jewish intellect. After all, he declares expressly that he prefers by far Moses' authority over all the writings and opinions of all philosophers (Methodus cap. 8, p. 324: "Ac tanti est apud me Mosis unius auctoritas, ut omnibus omnium philosophorum scriptis ac sententiis longe anteponam").

The Colloquium heptaplomeres, the sevenfold conversation, so-called because there are seven participants, takes up Judah Halevi's old theme once more. Representatives of the various religions converse in Venice about the value of their faiths. There are seven, in contrast to the four in Halevi, because the Christian faith is represented by three speakers, a Catholic, a Lutheran and a Calvinist; in addition to the philosopher a special representative of the heathen religion is introduced, while there are also the Jew and the Moslem.

Details of the conversation cannot be discussed here. For our purposes the following features should be pointed out. The representative of Judaism, Solomon, is placed very much in the foreground. His is the intellectual head of the gathering and advocates his faith with a decisive superiority in contrast to the others. Christianity is unfavorably treated in the case of all its representatives; its characteristic doctrines are subjected to sharp criticism, in the case of which the Jew usually has the last word. The participants attempt to find the best religion to which they can all adhere because it is not confined to any specific doctrines. The philosopher Toralba praises it as the religion of nature which God imparted to human beings at the time of their origin and next to which all positive confessions of faith are supposedly useless. For that reason the oldest religion must be the best one. The Jewish religion must, supposedly, be closest to this oldest religion not only as a matter of time but also of essence. For that reason Solomon vividly agrees with
p. 139 Toralba and attempts successfully to demonstrate the agreement of the Jewish religion. The later religions have supposedly only added useless or false elements. In fact, the content of this actual religion, as it is understood here, simply turns out to be the basic ideas of the Jewish religion; strict monotheism, honoring God by adherence to his laws and retribution in the present life and afterlife. It is in keeping with this that the gathering breaks up accompanied by the sounds of a Jewish psalm.

The author of the Heptaplomeres was too cautious to have his work printed. It did not appear in print until the middle of the nineteenth century. However, it was distributed in numerous manuscripts and its frequent mention by later authors proves that it was known to everyone and caused a tremendous excitement. Hence, it is no wonder that the views put forth in it had a strong effect in the subsequent period and finally during the Age of Enlightenment became almost the common property of the educated people in the form of deism, natural religion or rational Christianity. These educated people were longing to get away from the quarrels of the theologians which were unproductive and so disastrous in their consequences. Many were aware that this deism was connected with Jewry. A Prussian plan of reformation of 1790 provided for calling the Jews deists and Hippel [East-Prussian author; 1741-1796] occasionally differentiates between strict Jews and "nice Jews or deists"[1]. Heine [Jewish poet; 1797-1856], who certainly was in a position to know, declares in his salon that the deists are all Jews in the final analysis.

From time immemorial Germanic faith sought the inner bliss of the God-filled life. Deism, like the Jewish religion, knows only the superficially legal relation between man and God. God appears as the ruler of the world who demands obedience to His laws and hands out punishments and reward here and in the life hereafter. He keeps account of all men's activities in order, finally, to close their accounts with a credit or debit.[2]

Moses Mendelsohn, who was one of the chief representatives of deism in Germany, Lessing's friend and the prototype of Nathan the Wise, belongs in this context. To anyone who judges Mendelsohn simply on the basis of his moral-philosophical and aesthetic writings he seems to belong almost totally to the spirit of the philosophy of that time, which in most cases likewise discussed individual problems closely related to man in an enlightened manner. Moreover, in his proofs of the basic tenets of deism, the existence of God and the immortality of the soul he conforms completely to this world of ideas. However, one gets a rather different picture when one reads his writings concerning Judaism. Then one sees that he by no means simply had the philanthropical intention of protecting the nations from the wrath of bellicose theologians but that he was also pursuing quite differently and definitely Jewish objectives with his deism. His work, Jerusalem, oder über religiöse Macht und Judentum [Jerusalem, or Concerning Religous Power and Jewry] (1783), in particular, can be recommended for reading.

Here Mendelsohn makes no pretense whatsoever that the natural religion which he advocates is essentially in keeping with the Jewish religion (especially Vol. II, pp. 30 ff.). The articles of
p. 140 faith of the Jewish catechism, he states expressly, are rather in keeping with those of Herbert of Cherbury, the well-known English advocate of rational religion. In this connection, the fact that the content of the Jewish religion, as he says himself, is not actually doctrine but mainly law, serves a good purpose for him. Thus, he gains for the Jews a quite advantageous position which they have subsequently frequently taken. He demands freedom of thought and designates with some scorn all the more profound teachings which are not immediately obvious from simple reasoning as superstition. But such free thought that he demands from others he is by no means inclined to tolerate with regard to his own religion. Whoever is born as a Jew should adhere to the law to its full extent; only contemplation, not action, is permitted (pp. 127 ff.). From the outset thus, the Jewish religion is secured against all attacks of the Age of Enlightenment. The Jewish religion allegedly contains nothing in the way of doctrines to which natural logic would not lead. However, thinking must not disturb the prescriptions for action which certainly go far beyond the bounds of that which is comprehensible by reason in Jewish law.

Thus, the Jew becomes intolerant as soon as things touch on his faith. He demands tolerance but does not reciprocate it. Government should exclude from its borders not only atheism but also superstition and fanaticism (pp. 68 ff.). That which Mendelsohn subsumes under superstition in this connection can be more or less imagined; it might be rather broad areas of the Christian religion recognized by the state. Moreover, at the same time it is hinted with modesty (pp. 69 ff.) that the state should "favor with a wise moderation" only those doctrines "on which its true happiness is based," namely the doctrines about God, Providence and life in the hereafter, thus those to which he also adheres as a Jew. Thus, that position for the Jewish religion is sought with which we have now become sufficiently well acquainted and in keeping with which this religion, amongst all others, is the only one which is protected from any attack.

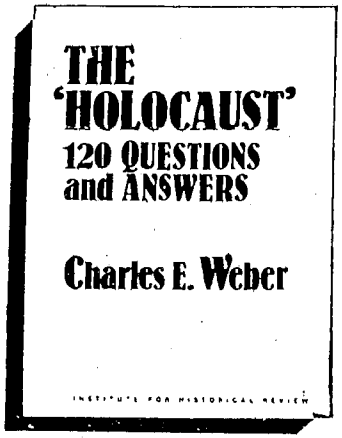
Obviously it would be premature—and this should be emphasized in conclusion— to consider the whole Age of Enlightenment simply to be the invention of Jews on account of this Jewish influence on the shaping of deism. In the period which we call the Age of Enlightenment there were also very healthy and truly German forces in action for which we shall again have complete understanding today. In natural law ideas of German law were revived; in the longing for a common faith, by which religious dissention could be overcome, we shall likewise not fail to see the nationalistic motivation. It must indeed be pointed out that this German Age of Enlightenmet, which was not a simple appendage of the European Age of Enlightenment, but in many ways an independent intellectual force, is still quite unrecognized as a result of the prevailing orientation of our writing on the history of philosophy.

But the nemesis of German intellectual history did not remain absent: the Jewish influence. It forced the German movement away from its healthy orientation and brought about effects which were, in the final analysis, not a blessing but a curse for us. This is the case because this influence prevented the peculiarly German element from coming into its own and increased the uncertainty of the Germans about their own nature.



HERE IS A BOOK in lucid question/answer format that tackles virtually all the myths and distortions propagated by the "Holocaust" Establishment—a book for young and old alike.

- Presents ideas and information not found in other books in this field.
- Short, well-organized and up-to-date on the latest ideas and research.
- Suitable for the classroom as a counterbalance to "Holocaust" studies.
- Gives a historical background of the Jewish problem in Europe, examines the motivations of various groups with regard to the Extermination thesis, and introduces the reader to the more detailed literature on the subject.
- Written by a former professor with a Ph.D. in an historical discipline whose training as a linguist gave him access to literature in various languages, and whose U.S. military intelligence experience in WWII included his residence in Europe during 1945-48 with assignments involving him in preparations for the Nuremberg Trials.

In the classroom; in debates; for the novice revisionist, the inquisitive and skeptical—nothing could be as useful as Dr. Weber's The "Holocaust"—120 Questions and Answers. 120 questions that rouse thought. 120 fully-referenced answers that blow the lid off the blackout. A book of this scope and format has been needed for a long time. Here you have it: easy-to-read, written and priced for wide distribution—and an answer to today's obsession with Holocaustiana.

sharpened toothbrush in your ribs in the shower.' "

The writer says he thought of defying the ukase from Washington, but his visitors warned him that if he mentioned their visit, they would produce "innumerable witnesses" who would "prove that they were hundreds of miles away at the time." He accordingly understood that he was only a lowly American white man in a country that the American imbeciles gave away to their enemies decades ago. He got together what money he could raise and eventually found in Ireland a refuge from the terrorism of America's rulers.

There are, naturally, no means of verifying this story. One can only say that to persons who have some knowledge of the clandestine operations of the Federal government, there is nothing in the story that is in the least implausible. It is as though a man were to tell you that he went downtown last week and had a steak in a good restaurant. He may or may not be telling the truth, but there is nothing improbable in his story. There is nothing in what he said that would give you any reason for doubting it.

The October issue of Liberty Bell includes (pp. 10f.) an open letter to the publishers of the Encyclopaedia Judaica from Robert D. James, professionally know as "Bobby Fischer."* He won the official World Championship in Chess in 1972, the first and only American to hold the official title. He successfully defended his title in subsequent years and still holds it, according to the devotees of chess who regard as illegal the imposition of rules obviously designed to place him at a disadvantage and which he refused to accept.

In his letter, Fischer protests the Jews' listing him as a Jew in their new encyclopaedia. He says, "I am not today, nor have I ever been a Jew, and, as matter of fact, I am uncircumcized." He accuses the publishers of "fraudulently misrepresenting me to be a Jew, and dishonestly using my name and reputation as a kind of advertising gimmick to improve the image of your religion (Judaism)." He does not speak from a racial standpoint.

The Jews, of course, try to kidnap every man who has attained distinction. Most recently, they have tried to annex Abraham Lincoln, whose race, they say, is established by the fact that a Jew said that another Jew told him that Lincoln privately told him that he (Lincoln) was one of the Chosen Ones. Whatever one's opinion of Lincoln, one may doubt this latest revelation, since it has not yet been made a criminal offense in the United States to doubt what Jews choose to tell their chosen serfs.

Fischer's open letter was accompanied by a small booklet, I Was Tortured in the Pasadena Jailhouse, which he published in 1982 and which is still available from him (P.O. Box 50307, Pasadena, California; $1.00). He says he was seized by police on the street at two o'clock in the afternoon of Tuesday, 26 May 1981, confined naked in a cell at almost freezing temperature, denied water to drink, and subjected to other forms of mental and physical torture by the scoff-law police until he was released on Thursday, 28 May.

The account is quite credible, since Fischer claims that he does not belong to God's Master Race, and is not a nigger, mestizo, Asiatic, degenerate, or other creature that Americans love and cherish. What could Fischer expect in the second largest "metropolitan district" in the United States, second only to New Jerusalem-on-the-Hudson? As an American, a white man, he was only a member of the people who have made themselves the most despised and degraded species of mammals on earth, since they take pride in having all the vermin in the whole world eat and excrete on them. Americans believe in "civil rights" for everyone but themselves, and should not complain at being taken at their own valuation.

If you are interested in observing the terminal phase of the history of the United States (whatever government you may expect or hope to see established on its territory), you should not overlook the gradual and systematic conversion of the police forces throughout the country. Eventually, of course, we shall see the attainment of "social justice" in the form of police forces composed entirely of niggers, who will teach the cringing white curs that they should have kept a country of their own, when they had one. In the meantime, while white men must still be recruited, "social scientists" see to it that preference is given to persons who either have innate inclinations to sadism or can be easily brutalized by such techniques as "sensitivity training" (on which see Ed Dieckmann, Jr.'s The Secret of Jonestown, which I cited in Is There Intelligent Life on Earth?). The purpose, of course, is to produce an active hostility between white Americans and the persons they supposedly hire to protect themselves. There was a good example in Louisville, Kentucky, a little while ago, when white policemen joyously beat up white Americans who had the mistaken idea that they hadn't been born to serve niggers at the command of their Jewish owners. Such police will serve admirably when the time comes to establish "human rights" in the United States by open terror, as was done in the less gradual take-over of Russia in 1917-1918.

In the meantime, some progress can be made by sheer incompetence. I have a report of a recent incident in a small mid-western city, still partly civilized. A dear nigger held up the cashier of a motor inn at gun point. While the poor disadvantaged fellow was still making his escape with the loot through back alleys, the police arrived with exemplary celerity, in the form of a lone female, who was naturally disinclined to venture out into the dark. In fact, if we are to observe that Equality of the Sexes which the Jews think good for us, there must be no sexual discrimination among police officers, and none, whether male or female by an anatomical distinction that has not yet been outlawed by a "Constitutional" amendment, should be expected to take the risk of encountering persons who might resort to rude behavior. In this instance, the Amazon did not even call for assistance: she spent her time grilling the owner and his manager to ascertain their full names, age, place of birth, names of parents, present and past residence, marital status, and other vital statistics that she deemed relevant to the armed robbery.* There are still some reactionaries in that town, probably "Nazis" yet unsuppressed, and the incident at the motor lodge gave them the impression that the police force they employ was not all that it should be.

* The incident included an amusing illustration of the progress of feminism. The robber escaped only a few moments before the arrival of the copess, and while she was conducting her grilling of the manager, the owner of the inn tried repeatedly to point out that the nigger had escaped into a region in which he could almost certainly be apprehended by prompt action on the part of the police, if she summoned assistance at once. He was ignored and when she turned to him to collect more vital statistics, he finally refused to state the place and date of his birth, which he judged irrelevant to the armed robbery, and he pointed out that her zeal in collecting statistics had permitted the robber to make his escape. The modern Hippolyata was piqued by such insubordination on the part of a lowly property owner, whose function was to pay taxes to provide her salary, so when he was home and in bed, she telephoned him at 2:30 A.M. to tell him triumphantly that she had learned the date of his birth by telephoning the state capital. Girls will be girls, won't they?

by
Allan Callahan

Of all the factors that have led to the atrocious racial situation in the U.S. today, none is more important than the guilt complex built up in the minds of White Americans over Negro slavery. This came about because of the currently popular notion that the Black slave trade can be blamed entirely on "Whitey" and that to "make it up" to the Negro we should clutch him to our bosom and integrate him completely into our society.

At the outset it should be pointed out that before the Industrial Revolution began, around 1775, slavery was widely practiced in numerous areas of the world. Until the advent of the machine, there were only two kinds of useful power—man power and animal power. Sometimes the man power was furnished by free men and sometimes by slaves, and nowhere was slavery more prevelant than in the Negro homeland—Africa.

It is maintained by some that the Machine Age actually did away with slavery, and not any "pangs of conscience" on the part of mankind, and they may very well be right. But it is a paradox that in one case, at least, a machine helped promote slavery, rather than retard it. This was the cotton gin, invented by Eli Whitney in 1793. Up until that time it took one man ten hours to extract one pound of lint from three pounds of seeds. Cotton growing had been in a slump but the new invention made it much more profitable, and resulted in a fantastic boom in the raising of the crop, and thus created the need for more slaves.

The trade in Negro slaves began in 1441 and lasted over 400 years. The first slaves to reach British America arrived in 1620, when a dutch ship sold part of its cargo to the tobacco growers in Jamestown, Virginia. It was common for the slaves to be first procured in the interior of Africa by native chieftains, traded to Arab slavers and then taken to the coast where they were exchanged again for Western commodities. The native chieftains would engage in forays, sometimes even among their own subjects, a favorite method of capture being to set fire to a village by night and seizing the fleeing inhabitants when they tried to escape.

Regarding the treatment of Black slaves once they reached the United States, abolitionists like Thaddeus Stevens, William Lloyd Garrison, and Jonathan Walker spread horror stories about it, but the truth is that the slaves were valuable property, costing from around $500 to $2,000 each, and it did not pay to abuse them. If a farmer's bull tears up a fence, he does not kill it, nor does a horse breeder, recovering one of his horses that ran away, whip the animal to death because it tried to escape. Punishments for disobedience, and a few deaths, did occasionally occur, but they were the exception rather than the rule. As for food, a study in 1879 showed that slaves had a "quite substantial diet" which exceeded that of free men by over 10%. The food was simple but wholesome, and the slave quarters were much like the cabins of pioneer Whites. They had good medical attention and were forced to keep regular habits, with the result that the health of the Negroes under slavery was better than it was after emancipation, and their mortality rate, up until the Civil War, was less than that of the White population of the South. Slaves were often rewarded for extra production with cash, goods or unscheduled holidays, and those with good records given bonuses and promotions.

The Black slaves of White Southerners fared much better than did those taken to South America by the Spanish and Portuguese. Most American slaves were not opposed to slavery, and even aided and abetted it. In their own homeland in Africa they had often been slaves, or had a status not much better than that of a slave. On Southern plantations the more able among them ran the field operations by serving as foremen or overseers, while 7% were used as domestic servants and 12% trained to be semi-skilled craftsmen.

The rate of increase of American slaves proves that they were well treated, in general, rather than mistreated. Some 330,000 were brought here originally, and they had increased to over a million by 1880. By the close of the Civil War, Negroes in the U.S. numbered about 4½ million, and most of this was due to natural increase, rather than by new blood being brought in. Great Britain abolished the slave trade in 1808, and we did so immediately afterward. Other nations began to jump on the bandwagon, so that the traffic in slaves by overseas routes was vastly reduced in the next two decades, and ceased to exist, at least as far as Europe and America were concerned, with the signing of the Ashburton Treaty in 1842. So, when we consider that Blacks in America more than quadrupled in 65 years, we have to come to the conclusion that they were well cared for in the South. In fact, their reproduction during this period was so great that it hardly has any counterpart in history!

In his native land, on the other hand, the African often had it much tougher, and the death rate from malnutrition and disease was far higher. He was also more or less in danger of being a victim of some of the atrocious mass murders committed by his own chiefs, which were well recorded by White settlers and missionaries in Africa. Sometimes these were performed as sacrifices to a tribal god or at the death of a tribal leader; at other times they were done simply as entertainment for the local chieftain and henchmen. These fiendish practices were sometimes used by the early White slavers as justification for their trade, as they felt they were saving the natives from brutal and early deaths. At any rate, the slaves in America led saver lives than did their brethren back in the Dark Continent, and also enjoyed more comforts, bad as their lot may sometimes have been. In fact, they enjoyed higher standards of living than do many Blacks in Africa today.

Most Southerners did not own slaves, and of those who did, 20% had only one slave and 44% owned three or less. Just before the Civil War, there were 2,292 owners with 100 slaves or more, and 88 who owned 300 or more. Only one family owned more than 1,000 slaves in 1860.

Slaves fared best of all on the small plantations. Here the owners had personal contact with them, and treated them about as well as some employers treat their workers today. Smaller slave owners seldom broke up a family, because it was not good economics in their cases. The hotter regions of the deep South had the largest plantations. These were agribusiness types of operations with huge plantings of cotton, sugar cane, etc. The owners here had little personal contact with their slaves and were thus not as much concerned about their treatment. The work was harder and more regimented, and often a hardnosed Black foreman was in charge. If a slave proved himself to be too lazy or uncooperative to do ordinary work around a farm or small plantation, he was sometimes put on the auction block and sold to one of the larger plantations. Blacks with much intelligence or ability were considered too valuable to do the routine work in the huge cotton and cane fields.

It was these large agribusiness types of operations that produced the most runaway slaves. But the owners themselves usually did not have the time or inclination to look for them, so professional slave catchers came into being, operating somewhat along the lines of the bounty hunters of the Old West; except, of course, that they did not kill the slaves they captured.

It is popular today for fiction writers to depict the Southern plantations as hotbeds of miscegenation, with the owner's fair-haired daughter lusting over the Black field hand, or his dissolute son crawling in bed with a Black house servant. In truth, such things were not common, and the average Southerner was no more immoral than his Yankee cousin up North. Most slave owners were men of family, and too proud to stoop to race-mixing. Their sons and daughters were also not inclined to disgrace their families by breeding with Negroes. The plantations didn't produce hordes of mulattoes; they were the product of cities and towns. Here the free Negroes congregated. Washington, D.C. in 1850 had 42.18 mulattoes to every 100 Blacks. By 1860 the following cities showed these percentages of mulattoes to the total number of Negroes:

48.9% in New Orleans; 11% in the rest of Louisiana;
18.1% in Savannah; 8.2% in the rest of Georgia;
25.2% in Charleston; 5.5% in the rest of So. Carolina.

On the farms and plantations, Negroes were valued for the work they could produce and not because of sexual attraction. If a White man had bought a woman slave for the purpose of concubinage, he would have been socially ostracized.

It should be realized that most Negro slaves in America had no feeling against slavery, and that there were Black slave owners in the South who were just as pro-slavery as any White slave owner. And while the White nations had given up slavery long before the 19th century was out, it was widely practiced in various Negro societies in Africa well up into modern times, and there are still occasional reports of it being practiced there even now.

There is no reason for any White man or woman today to feel guilty about slavery, and as for the descendants of these slaves who now reside here, if they fell wronged, would they want us to right this wrong by sending them back to their ancestral homeland? How many Blacks in America would trade places with the average modern Black in Africa?

While it is true that a small percentage of Whites in America did benefit economically from Negro slavery, this has been overwhelmingly offset by all the negative effects that have come down upon us. We now have on our hands a race problem of staggering proportions. Steadily the negroid gene-pool grows, like a spreading cancer. It is a problem that our White politicians should face, but they dare not face it. □

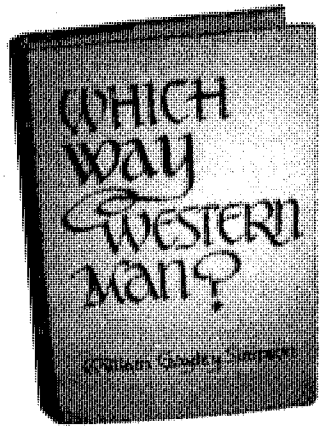
Survival manual for the White race



William Gayley Simpson has spent a lifetime of keen observation, careful analysis, and deep reflection developing the principal thesis of his book: that the single, undying purpose of all human activity should be the ennobling of man. In support of this thesis he looks at the foundations of Western Society, at the structure of our government, at the effects of technology and industrialization on man, at the roles of the sexes, at economics, and at race. The book goes to the roots of the problems facing the White race today, and it shows the ways in which White society must be changed if the race is to survive. WHICH WAY WESTERN MAN? is an encyclopedic work whose conclusions can be ignored by no one with a sense of responsibility to the future. Letters to the Editor

Dear George: 3 November 1984

Thought you might be interested in the enclosed effort, as you seem to be involved in the dialogue.

Hope all is going well with you! I'll not forget that bit of Americana which you once utilized, and I thought very appropriately: "Let George do it!" I wish it were not an American habit, but unfortunately it is a customary attitude, stemming in part, I suppose, from too many years of good living, too much ease and wealth with not enough basic discipline in character and responsibility.

I heard an interesting remark out here, and perhaps timely too: 'I'll vote for the Nazis before I'll vote Democrat!' At least, perhaps, you will grant, Americans have not been cheated by The Enemy of their old sense of humor.

Best regards to you.
Sincerely,
Richard S. Hoehler

The following is Mr. Richard Hoehler's 'effort,' which is presented here unedited and in its entirety:

Mr. Ben Klassen
P.O. Box 400
Otto, North Carolina 28763

Dear Mr. Klassen:

As you may be aware, I fully enjoy reading your "publication" This last issue was, in my opinion, superb!

It would be an easy matter to write ten pages of commentary on the substance and ramifications of your particular judgment. You certainly have a great talent for rational clarity and pungent phrasing. As a literary philosopher, of course, I take a somewhat different view than many of those ideas expressed in your paper, yet because of this slight difference of apprehension, it would require pages to explain "why." Some of these variations of interpretation are simple, some are quite subtle, requiring more education than most of our present day intellectuals enjoy.

A number of the questions or positions you deprecate, should not be depreciated; also there are criticisms of you, which I have encountered, and which are (frankly and with good will) criticisms of your attitude which are significant. One fellow I know claims you are "too Jewish" for his taste! Curiously enough, an objective observer could point out certain features of your stand which are, both historically or culturally, Jewish in flavor: As Santayana once pointed out, when The Jew comes in, all other gods of the people must be exterminated from the round of daily experience, all other gods but The One True Almighty God (of Jewry of course). Now precisely how does this criticism apply to you, Mr. Ben Klassen? On lesser levels also one may find evidence. Sarcasm and cynicism are prime Jewish psychological weapons, well based on their inherent truncations of mind, short-circuiting of appreciative awareness of even their hosting cultures. But I suppose we should recall Nietzsche when he said: 'Beware in fighting with monsters, lest yourself become a monster!' That is to say: In dealing with the Levantine monstrosity, we tend to take on those same qualities, just as a nurse, in treating a disease, might well succumb to the disease in question. Other items: The emphasis on Dietary Salvation is pure Jewish brain-rot, neuroticism raised to highest power, and I fail to see why we Aryans should concern ourselves with dietary rules. As Emerson put it: A good mind can nourish himself on a broth of boiled shoes, if need be! Still another curious point: Are you aware that paging-backwards is almost a typical left-handed Jewish style? In following your articles "backwards," I was slightly reminded of reading, for one case, a Wall Street Journal, among things.

There is also another strange attitude, which, as a philosopher, I tend to view as an expression of "monotheism." This distortion of humanistic thought is difficult to put into a few words, but let me hack it for a moment. Monotheism (versus polytheism) presumes that all things are explained by One Thing, a primary Semitic error in judgment which has caused more bloodshed and confusion in Western Civilization than any other singular dogma over the centuries. One deduction from monotheism: The assumption that all men are identical in their reason and outlook (hence 'children of God,' 'brothers under the sun,' 'comrades'), identical in their culture and values, in their level of attainment and their temperamental preferences. Most men (unlike yourself, and unlike myself) most are not rationally inclined, that is one reason the "emotional Levantine" has played such havoc in The West, for these primitives appeal steadily and incessantly to the basest level of our White Folk, and thus make headway with them. This is the human picture. Now, when those Odinists or others critize you for being "intellectual" rather than emotive or sentimental, they are not speaking without empirical reason. Our people, right down to their best roots, are SENTIMENTAL in quality; they crave an emotional embracement of "ideas." Yet for you and I to disregard these facts of human experience does not place us "above" the mob, it merely indicates our deficient understanding of humanity as it is realistically constituted. I do not know this man, Ronald S. Hand, but his statements are certainly valid: "The strength of Creativity is its poignant factualism, its matter-of-factness, its loquacious logic, and its stymying criticism. Its weakness is its coldness and emotional dryness. It doesn't go to our own soul, to answer our heart's cry. It remains heady and cerebral."

From my own experience with Odinists—I know Else, and have communicated several times with the Pope of Odinism (!), Dr. Wilhelm Kusserow; and I was impressed by their revulsion from NS ethics; they wished to steer clear of politics, of neo-Nazism, if you will. These people also have high levels of intelligence, please do not disregard that fact, Mr. Klassen, but I myself am willing to credit their intelligence and prudent judgment on this matter of avoiding politics. They very probably have good reasons for their stand, just as I feel I have better reasons for not forgetting the absolute genius of Adolf Hitler. But because I disagree on this one point, I am certainly not prepared to rudely insult Mrs. Christensen or Dr. Kusserow; frankly, I love and admire them both, as they are seeking to employ their best mind to help solve some of the most difficult problems of our age.

Among those of us with superior intelligence and background, it is recognized that you yourself Mr. Klassen certainly enjoy the economy of excellent phrasing of complex truths. If you will permit me, here is one of your gems of political summary:

"When Hitler tackled the Jewish-Marxist mess in post-War Germany he did not dredge up some ancient political party that was a relic and failure from the past, but instead constructed a completely new, hard-hitting political creed and program that fit the needs of the times and with it he did the job that needed to be done."

If I were a simple-hearted Christian, I should add: "Amen!"

But I am not a simple Christian. I have read another fellow's book on the Third Reich whose name is John Bradley, evidently English, and his summary of Hitler was a shade more brilliant (in certain respects) than your own beautifully accurate judgment. Examine his way of phrasing the matter:

"Apart from the Fuehrer's activity quite a lot seemed to be happening in Nazi Germany, but no one could say who was in charge, for obviously Hiter could not do nor be responsible for everything. This fact then serves to illuminate the Nazi revolution: It stirred up the people and many changes occurred spontaneously in an uncontrolled manner, the Nazi Party in a sense jumping on the bandwagon. Hitler for personal and power reasons wanted this type of development, providing it did not exceed certain limits. In contrast to Communist parties, he did not want a huge bureaucracy to initiate and administer changes; therefore institutional chaos was the order of the day and he suffered it gladly."

I wonder how many people can understand that given and quite extraordinary statement of truth by John Bradley? However I quote the item at length not only as a fine complement to your own good summary, but for several contemporary reasons as well: It explains the profound cultural depth of the NS-revolution, why sixty or seventy million people willingly endorsed that philosophy of being, quite as it demonstrates the TRUE Leadership Principle (which is not dictation but encouragement within operational limits), just as it explains a great deal of present Republican politics surrounding President Reagan, a diversely based rationale any intelligent man should immediately spot at once. As one minor example, I have known a dozen Republican businessmen who have "extreme" dissatisfaction with bureaucratic dictation of business in this country 'one hundred sixty state regulations controlling the production of one hamburger!'—and they have waited for years to destroy this monstrous dictatorship by petty mediocritists, servants, legalists and trivial mentalities. As one major example: Hitler was, in essence, an embodiment of The Leadership Principle; so, respecting President Reagan, you can take it from there!

Some of your other propositions, however, are not as well braced with historical validity. May I tender some personal experience?

I have associated with Jews for years, and have heard their comments on any number of delicate issues. Thus I was much disturbed by your comments, such as the following: "Compared to them [Greco-Roman gods] the Vikings were crude, brutish and bordering on the dense. In fact, on the intellectual level the Vikings were on a similar level to Hagar the Horrible as portrayed in the Sunday comics..." How often, in my painful if cultural associations with Jewry, have I had too endure: 'Yes, Hoehler, who do you think you are, another Siegfried?' (A main writer for the largest Denver daily, as I recall) 'Your ancestors bloodied up Europe, and ran around with blue paint smeared over their bodies...' presumedly while their noble Jewish scholarly priest ancestors in the Middle East deeply studied Talmudic scrolls! Yet this sort of self-flatting comedy, because imposed by Jewish perversion through Jewish media, has become a widespread prejudice. Historians are slowly but surely dissipating this type of attitude toward our Vikings. They actually engaged in far more trade than plunder, their coins have been found along the most out-of-the-way river basins you could geographically imagine, by scholars interested in pursuing this factual type of matter. Their boats were not only practical vessels, but works of art. Excavations have revealed that the Germanics had iron technology and mining operations centuries before others, certainly long before they have been credited with such techniques. The beauty of the Aryan northern men and women was superior to anything on earth, save the Grecian Ideals. Some persons believe our contemporary "cult of beauty" is just American—actually it was an obsession among the upper class German-Viking group, as you may learn in "Das Nibelungen Lied." Also other accounts reflect parallel matters: One Semitic Arabian, who accompanied Viking commercial traders, remarked about 'the tall Aryans, who were like overhanging palm trees,' thus a race of tall men in startling contrast to the squat, dark and ugly Semitic peoples of north African deserts.

I could go on. But just recently I have made a "value-study" inherent in "Das Nibelungenlied" Saga, written about the 12th Century, on 9th Century happenings, and to assume those people had nothing beyond barbaric values, is to assume falsehood. I speak here as a philosopher, and thus announce Truth, beyond all those half-witted Jewish dissipations of pure culture. The Enemy of our Western Civilization may be permitted, at least temporarily, to laugh at our ancestors, running about Europe with blue painted bodies, Vikings who were dull and brutish—need I remind you that our people created the exuberance of fugal music (beyond the neuroticism of primitive whining songs), our own people who fashioned from stone great cathedrals in idealization of the forest vaultings of the northern woods—the Gothics, dear Sir—grand facts which cannot much longer sustain ridicule, except at a very high price.

This material is submitted for the interest of a series of bright intellectuals on The Right side of things: Ben Klassen, George Dietz, Ronald Hand, Carles Messick, Else Christensen, Richard Butler, Donald Clerkin, Robert Miles, Wilmot Robertson, et al. Let this list be extended infinitely!

Best wishes,

Dear Mr. Dietz: 12 June 1984

Herewith my subscription renewal plus $10 donation. Wish I could afford more; you certainly deserve it. I so enjoy reading your publication. Apart from Spearhead, an English publication, yours is the only other that I know of in this world which comes anywhere near "telling the Truth." I am 77 years young and have had much time to consider the White man's racial situation. I believe we are now in some kind of political recess. Television has taken control of the minds of millions of people throughout the world, but this situation cannot last, masses of people will become revolted by the degenerative effect of TV and will sooner or later seek an alternate to this Jewish monopoly. History has proved that people survive and even improve as the result of suffering. The only maddening thing for people like ourselves is the tiresome waiting game, our lives tend to go by while the lowest mental creatures awake to exactly what is taking place. One day in the not too distant future, laws will per force come into effect banning all Jews and non-nationals from the news media. As things stand today, Jewish control of the media is stifling and degenerating world society with its pro race-mixing policies and promotion. All societies must work towards completely removing these people from any involvement whatsoever with our news media. The Jews claim they are not a race; that may be so, but they certainly act like some pernicious disease on world society and without doubt will have to be removed as soon as possible. The prelude to this will first be the scrapping of Christianity and all other meaningless man-made religions; secondly, the word democracy will have to be deleted as another meaningless item of nonsense. The great Nation of Aryan man as a world entity will have to be brought together. I think that perhaps Liberty Bell could help along these lines? However, many thanks for your personal efforts and good articles published in your publication. Long may you continue.

Sincerely yours,
J.G.L. Australia

Dear Mr. Dietz: 6 July 1984

I have read some of your stuff. It ALL fits RIGHT in my mind. We think alike, Mr. Dietz. You can bet your last Red-Fed funny-dollar that I will subscribe to your Liberty Bell... I really enjoyed Mr. Daniel Edward's letter about the Holyhoax and the lace-pantied Sickies polluting our Christian pulpits. WHERE ARE THE MEN? Your fighting spirit shows unmistakably that they ARE out there. We have got to keep seeking, to find, to join and to fight with the resolve and the ferocity of a bitch wolverine with an unfed litter that hasn't eaten for a week.

Dear George: 8 July 1984

I recently discovered the value of one of the books you handle. Makers of Civilization in Race and History, by Waddell, at first seemed to be a heavy, slow reading, ponderous book dealing with the royal dynasties of Sumer, Egypt, and India and Babylonia. The purpose of the book, Waddell explains, is to show that the ancient Aryans of India kept intact a long list of the great kings of the Orient predating Aryan invasions of the Indus Valley. This list compares uncannily well with the various lists of the kings of Sumer, Egypt and Asia Minor. The point is that a true historical chronology can be obtained through such a comparison. Also, the defective tendency of Assyriologists to semitize nearly all their findings in the Mesopotamian region is corrected. Waddell asserts that Aryans, who are the Sumerians, early Egyptians and Hittites, continued to rule the Orient until about 1200 B.C. At this time the Aryan racial elements began emigrating to various points north and west into Europe, colonizing and populating regions with a superior climate, and neglected the Persian Golf and Mesopotamia to the proliferating Semites with their gory and bloody religion. The Aryans, of course, moved into Northern India also and with them they took their holy list of the dynastic kings of the Orient. What is significant is that most European myths can be traced to the first great leaders of the Sumerian Civilization (the first of all civilizations). Thus the myth of Arthur, Odin with the discovery of the Runes, St. George killing the Dragon, and Adam (Ada) being the first civilized man, are historically rooted in Aryan genes and tradition. Waddell's profound knowledge of Assyriology is worthy of more than I can comment upon. But, he demonstrates a great familiarity with all of the terms of that dicipline as well as a working knowledge of several of the ancient languages. I recommend this book to persons who enjoy reading about ancient history.

Sincerely,
Ronald Hand

Dear George: 10 July 1984

Objective minds would welcome some facts that appeared in the latest issue (109) of Matt Koehl's publication "White Power" under the caption "Mistaken Identity" from which I quote in full:

"Why would anyone want to be a Jew—or a Hebrew, or an Israelite? Believe it or not, a number of good Aryans have actually decided they want to be the Chosen People. They refer to themselves as the "true Israel," and denounce the real Jews as impostors. Confusing?

Unfortunately, "Israel Identity", as it is called, is a sad case of mistaken identity and muddled thinking. Here are some of its basic fallacies:

(1) According to "Israel Identity" theology, we are descended from Semitic-speaking ancestors who lived 2,500 years ago. Yet for at least 5,000 years, all Aryans have spoken an Indo-European or other language completely different from the Semitic tongues.

(2) We are supposed to be descended from Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. Yet at the time of Abraham, c.1800 B.C., our non-Levantine, proto-Teutonic, proto-Kelt and other Aryan ancestors were already settled in well-defined areas of Northern Europe. They were nowhere near the Middle East!

(3) According to "Israel Identity," America is actually the lost tribe of Manasseh. Other "lost tribes" include England (Ephraim), Germany (Judah), Holland (Zebulon), and Denmark (Dan), among others. Now, if American Whites are descended from these various "lost tribes" of Europe, how can they possibly stem from a tribe (Manasseh) which has no European connection?

One could go on to cite the ancient Aryan sagas and legends of Northern Europe as revealing an outlook and ethos contrasting sharply with that reflected in the Old Testament, with its tales of pathological cruelty, sex, filth, and depravity.

One could also point to the word Hebrew/Habiru itself, which translates as thief, swindler, cutthroat—hardly a worthy description for an Aryan people. The simple fact is that "Israel-Identity" is absurd. It is a contradiction in terms. One cannot be an Aryan and a Semite at the same time. In the critical struggle in which we are engaged, we cannot afford any confusion as to who we are. Our true identity is that of Aryans, not Jews, Hebrews, Israelites or anything else as ridiculous."

So much for "Israel Identity."

Heil Hitler!

During World War II, Dr. Oliver was Director of Research in a highly secret agency of the War Department, and was cited for outstanding service to his country.

One of the very few academicians who has been outspoken in his opposition to the progressive defacement of our civilization, Dr. Oliver has long insisted that the fate of his countrymen hangs on their willingness to subordinate their doctrinal differences to the tough but idealistic solidarity which is the prerequisite of a Majority resurgence.

SOME QUOTABLE QUOTES FROM AMERICA'S DECLINE

On the 18th Amendment (Prohibition): "Very few Americans were sufficiently sane to perceive that they had repudiated the American conception of government and had replaced it with the legal principle of the 'dictatorship of the proletariat,' which was the theoretical justification of the Jews' revolution in Russia."

FREEDOM OF SPEECH—FREEDOM OF THOUGHT
FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION

The editor-publisher of Liberty Bell does not necessarily agree with each and every article in this magazine, nor does he subscribe to all conclusions arrived at by various writers; however, he does endeavor to permit the exposure of ideas suppressed by the controlled news media of this country.

It is, therefore, in the best tradition of America and of free men everywhere that Liberty Bell strives to give free reign to ideas, for ultimately it is ideas which rule the world and determine both the content and structure of culture.

We believe that we can and will change our society for the better. We declare our long-held view that no institution or government created by men, for men, is inviolable, incorruptible, and not subject to evolution, change or replacement by the will of the people.

To this we dedicate our lives and our work. No effort will be spared and no idea will be allowed to go unexpressed if we think it will benefit the Thinking People, not only of America, but the entire world.

Revilo P. Oliver

When, after a flourish from the orchestra, an actor, bedight in a kimono and his face glistening with grease paint, appears on the stage and sings, "A wand'ring minstrel I," we know very well that he is not a minstrel, is not Nanki-Poo, is not even Japanese, but we never think of him as a liar. When a president of the United States exhibits his phiz on the boob-tube and asseverates that he is going to "fight inflation" or "protect American interests" somewhere, we, unless very naive, know that he is just reciting from his script and wooing the boobs with a politician's jabber, so we don't think of him as lying, although we may wish that he would perform in the manner of a Gilbert-and-Sullivan musical, and so be entertaining instead of boring.

We still distinguish, however, between what an actor says on the stage and what he says off-stage, and when he appears in propria persona and professes to report what he has personally seen or experienced, we expect him to be truthful—or, at least, plausible. Some of us, therefore, were a little shocked when old Reagan, in a private conference with some of his Jewish patrons, solemnly asserted that he was a witness to the truth of their fictitious Holohoax because he had been an Army photographer in Germany in 1945 and had seen with his own bright eyes the awful wickedness of the Germans, who had exterminated so many millions of God's Darlings. Some of us were disappointed that he lied; more were disappointed that he lied so brazenly, when he knew full well that the records, available to everyone, showed that he was never in Germany or even abroad while he was in the Army, and that he fought the war in Hollywood, where he manufactured "morale" for the men at the front, while preserving his own precious skin from the risk of abrasions.

Now there is in politics, as such things go in a "democracy," a curious phenomenon that we may call the "me too" rule, although it is just a special case of the old axiom, "monkey see, monkey do." When one aspirant to a place in the cast of the extravaganza performed in Washington makes some claim that seems to please his audience, the others who are trying out for the play immediately claim they can do it, only better. A recent example of that is particularly amusing.

Quite a few hopefuls are currently excited by a promotion called the "Populist Party," which will collect a fairly large sum of money, obtain a place on the ballot in perhaps a third of the states, and will in those states obtain from 2% to 8% of the votes—possibly 10% in a few districts—and could conceivably affect in one or more states the choice between the two competitors for the job as leading mouthpiece in future productions in the White House theatre.

The "Populist" candidate for that exalted rôle is one Robert "Bob" Richards, whose ingenuity advanced him from humble origins in the Mid-West through various corporate positions to the status in which he is said to make his home on a little plot of 6400 acres near Waco, Texas, while not running businesses in Minneapolis. I have before me a newsletter which purports to quote from a press conference given by Richards, which was broadcast on Thursday, 5 July 1984, at 11 P.M. Pacific Time, over a local television system in California. I naturally have no means of being certain that Richards actually made the statements attributed to him in the newsletter, but I do know, from long observation, how politicians, even small ones, behave.

According to the newsletter, Richards made the three following statements, which are quoted verbatim:

(1) "I believe all people and all races are equal."

(2) "Bring three and one-half million Jews from Israel and put them into Texas and they would turn Texas into a paradise."

(3) "I don't believe in Liberty Lobby's anti-Holocaust position. I know the furnaces were a fact, I was there. I know."

Passing over the first two assertions, mind-boggling if we suppose them to have been meant by the speaker, we may note that the Liberty Lobby, thus denounced in the third, has been, through its weekly publication, Spotlight, Richards' principal sponsor and has given him most of the publicity he has enjoyed, so that it received a politician's normal thanks to his non-professional supporters.

Richards' statement sounds, of course, as though he were claiming to have been peering from a mouse hole while the awful Germans shoveled God's Own into the ovens, but we may charitably suppose that he really was in the Army in Europe, was shown some of the small ovens used to cremate the bodies of prisoners who died of disease, and did not have intelligence enough to take pencil and paper and calculate how many corpses could have been disposed of in those few ovens and how many decades would have been required to cremate all the Jews that thereafter rose from their ashes and crawled into the United States. But whatever the explanation, it is obvious that Richards was playing the game of "me too" with old Ronnie. That's what always happens in the national hullabaloo that gives many innocents the impression that their opinions count in a "democracy."

Not long ago, I noticed that the ham actor in the White House was trying to entertain his audience by reciting some moral indignation about the wicked Soviets. From time to time, one hears the same patter from dithering "Liberals" and high-pressure Jesus-hucksters, often with reference to the Gulag Archipelago or some more recent work by Solzhenitsyn.

The boobs, of course, squeak a bit in horror at the wickedness of the Soviets, but they do not think, perhaps because they know they are not supposed to remember that it was they who created the present régime in Russia when they permitted that most loathsome of anthropoids known to history, Franklin Delano Roosevelt, to send crazed hordes of them into Europe to punish the Germans for not worshipping Yahweh's Master Race and to save the Soviet barbarism from the only nation that was sufficiently civilized and alert to try to preserve Aryan civilization. Americans, and Americans only, must bear the full gravamen of guilt for the Suicide of the West, and they will be estopped from justly complaining when they experience all the admired qualities of undisguised Soviet rule in their own country.

When I noticed a report of Reagan's drivel in a newspaper, it occurred to me that readers of Liberty Bell might be interested in a passage from Gregory Klimov's The Terror Machine, the Inside Story of the Soviet Administration in Germany (New York, Praeger, 1953). Klimov was, of course, an officer in the Russian army, and recounted only what he had himself observed.

> Whenever Russian people hear mention of the words 'lend-lease' they think of cans piled up like mountains. These cans were to be found in the wildest and loneliest parts of the famous Bryansk forest, in the marshes of Leningrad, wherever the Soviet army passed.
> Russia is undoubtedly a very rich agricultural country, with inexhaustible natural resources. Yet from 1942 to 1945 that country lived and fought exclusively on American products. We officers were all convinced that we could have held out without American tanks and planes, but we could have died of starvation without the American food. Ninety percent of the meat, fats, and sugar consumed in the Soviet army was of American origin, and almost the same can be said of life in the rear. Even the beans and the white flour were American. The one article of Soviet origin was the black bread—apart, of course, from water . . . . After the war it was said that the Kremlin had provided itself with American foodstuffs for many five-year plans ahead.

For more details, see Klimov's book.

That passage will remind most readers of one aspect of the treason by which the American nitwits began industriously to dig their future graves. And it, like a thousand other facts, will illuminate the sickening hypocrisy of the homunculi who now bleat about the wickedness of the Soviets and never mention the responsibility for it that the Americans assumed when they obeyed their Jewish masters. The same hypocrisy appeared when it was thought expedient to distract the boobs' attention by staging an invasion of the bump in the Caribbean called Grenada, and the old hoofer in the White House jabbered about saving the niggers in Grenada from the wicked Communists in Cuba, although most of my readers are old enough to remember that the Americans established a Jewish or half-Jewish thief and murderer named Castro in Cuba and feeble-minded intellectuals believed the leading jewspaper in New York when it asseverated that the filthy Communist was "the George Washington of Cuba." Of course, as I have often remarked, well-trained intellectuals will believe anything, provided that it isn't true, but even so, I think it odd that they can never remember what they believed a year or two ago.

Roosevelt, who began the active, though prudently gradual, imposition of the Communist terror on the American boobs, is incidentally an interesting problem in characterization. The Jewish (Delano) part of him was, of course, loyal to its race, while the White part of him was the foulest traitor the world has ever known. So is it right to call the composite creature a traitor or was it merely a Jew varnished with some Aryan blood?

I have received five numbers, May to September, of a little tabloid that should interest you, if you read Spanish and want to know what the United States looks like to a candid observer in South America. It is Temple, edited and published by Dr. Gastón Ortiz Acha, Unión 1087, 501, Lima, Perú.

In my Introduction to the Contemporary History of Latin America, a little book I wrote in 1961, I called attention to the existence in Latin America of an intelligent and cultured minority to whom the United States could appeal and with confidence, if our government were interested in preventing the Communist take-over of all of the Western Hemisphere south of the Rio Grande. That civilized minority, which, when I wrote, still retained considerable power, even in nations in which the masses were of the lowest biological grade, would be reliable and courageous allies of the United States, if this country were to begin to oppose the Bolsheviks. They would be firm allies, I pointed out, not because they had any sentimental admiration for our country or for us, and certainly not because their heads were filled with putrid mush about "human rights" and similar nonsense, but because they wished to preserve their own Hispanic civilization and would value us as potent allies, were we to take a stand against our implacable enemies, who are also theirs.

I took as a prime illustration of my point an eminent Peruvian scholar and diplomat, Francisco García Calderón, whose book was available in a good English translation, Latin America: Its Rise and Progress (London, 1913). I take it that Dr. Ortiz represents the dwindling but still courageous minority that we could still have enlisted as allies when I wrote in 1961.

It is now 1984, and much has changed in the seventy years since García Calderón's book was published in English. He wrote, of course, before the act of Western folly called the First World War and the Jewish capture of the Russian Empire. Dr. Ortiz is writing after the Suicide of the West in 1945 and the emergence of the United States as the leading Jewish satrapy, which has been given by its masters the mission of delivering to them the entire world, in conformity with their covenant with Yahweh.

Like all intelligent Latin Americans, Dr. Ortiz sees clearly that the one and sole purpose of American intervention in El Salvador is to establish there, as in Cuba, a solid Communist base for conquest of the adjacent regions, including, of course, Mexico. Intelligent Latin Americans are not deceived by the silly squawking about "fighting Communism" that comes from professional liars in Washington and the press, nor yet by the raving of the Marxist fantoches in the colleges and clergy, who have been set to sobbing about the "downtrodden masses" in El Salvador to disguise the real purpose of the operation, just as the same zombies were turned out a few years ago to howl about American "imperialism" in Vietnam for the purpose of concealing the real purpose of that intervention, which was, of course, to ensure the killing or crippling of many white Americans, to suck more money from the dumb brutes who pay taxes, to arrange a spectacular defeat to disgrace the United States in the eyes of the peoples who still retained some respect for us, and eventually to flood our country with Oriental "refugees," who will help beat the American boobs into the pens prepared for them. In the time of Vietnam, the rioting zombies performed well the task given them, that of making it easy to call "pro-Communist" any American who objected to the Communist operation, and of convincing the boobs that Washington really was trying to oppose the Communists in the territory that Washington had delivered to them a few years before by betraying the French, who had been so foolish as to trust Americans.

The conversion of El Salvador and Nicaragua into a Cuba in Central America is a much smaller operation, and Americans are now sunk much farther in a despairing or mindless apathy, so it has not been thought necessary to send swarms of zombies out of our brain-addling establishments to "demonstrate" and set up a smoke screen for Washington. No one cares now.

Dr. Ortiz in Lima can speak with a candor that Americans dare not attempt. He roundly says (I translate, of course), "The Congress of the United States is a political dungheap; the great majority of its members are hirelings, renegades, and traitors, who are deluding the public of that country; they have delivered their souls to the Communistic Jewish Satan; they are degenerates and imbeciles." And he adds that that is the best that one can say about "those vermin." As you see, Dr. Ortiz does not mince words or resort to euphemisms. And he has a special article on the sinister regent of the House of Representatives, "Tip" O'Neill, whom he identifies as an especially loathsome traitor to his country, his race, and his civilization.

Dr. Ortiz knows, of course, that "Communism" is just a name for one phase of the Jews' offensive against Western Civilization and the race that created it. He also knows that the Jews have occupied the United States and now virtually own it, although they are only now beginning to show their dominion openly. But he tries to see some glimmering of hope in the night of our despair.

We are all prone to the systematic error that Francis Bacon included among the idola fori in his analysis of human fallibility. We tend to project into other societies the customs and institutions of our own, except where we have noticed conspicuous differences. So please do not laugh at Dr. Ortiz for making an assumption about the United States no worse than assumptions you probably make every day about some aspect of life in Italy, France, Germany, England, or Ireland about which you have no specific information. Dr. Ortiz knows that the future of the Western Hemisphere depends on the United States. He knows that he can hope for nothing from the actors who do their turns on the stage in the White House. He knows that he can hope for nothing from the fetid nest of embezzlers, counterfeiters, thieves, and traitors called the Congress of the United States.[1] He knows that he can hope for

1. The Congress enacted the "Social Security" system primarily to assign numbers to their future serfs and tighten the noose around the stupid creatures' necks, but the scheme was originally placed on a fairly sound actuarial basis, such as insurance companies are by law compelled to use, and a few years later the Congress embezzled the funds that had been accumulated and used them principally to subsidize rioting and crime to cow the very persons whose contributions they were stealing. The Congressmen are confederates or employees of the great counterfeiting ring called the Federal Reserve, in whose interest they forbade their American subjects to have money, forcing them to use pieces of worthless paper instead, and then forcing their victims to pay outrageous usury for the trash. In their greed, the Congressmen are systematically inflating the scrap paper they have substituted for money, and they are thus stealing each year a part of every American's property as surely as though they obtained it by the less despicable means of sticking a gat in their victim's face and telling him to hand over. As traitors, they stripped the Americans of their Panama Canal and handed it over to eventual control by the Soviet. They have sanctioned every scheme for reducing the United States to military impotence and for importing as "refugees" hordes of racial enemies who will be irregular troops for our enemies when the time comes for open terrorism, and they have harassed the bovine Americans with many devices, such as the swindle called an "energy crisis." They have enslaved American taxpayers to the Jews' Israel, and, although there are, no doubt, a few Americans who survive in the Congress by remaining silent on matters of prime importance, the Congress as a whole consists of Jews and nothing from the populace, whose opinions have been moulded by the Jews and their hirelings in the liepapers, the boob-tubes, the pulpits, and the schools. He does think that Americans retain a will-to-live, but believes they are hopelessly deceived. Where then can he see hope?

In Latin American countries, the officer class of the Armed Forces has traditionally been drawn from the class of educated gentlemen, and in many countries the Army has intervened to prevent anarchy and a Bolshevik take-over. There was a time when the United States had a military tradition of patriotism and honor. So, says Dr. Ortiz, it is time for the Armed Forces to execute a coup d'état in the United States!

I asked you not to laugh. Dr. Ortiz has noticed, for example, that we have a mighty battleship that was recently used to murder thousands of unarmed civilians to please our Jewish masters, but he does not know that the New Jersey could carry out its mission only because the niggers on board did not object. That, of course, is simply a typical example of what has happened to the Armed Forces, including even the Air Force, in which the Jews are now gradually eliminating officers who are suspected of loyalty to the American people. The boobs have made their country a sitting duck for any invasion, even one from Cuba, to say nothing of the one from Mexico that is being planned. The United States has a lot of expensive military equipment, but no one to operate it in a crisis. Armed Forces consist of fighting men, and these we no longer have.

One must feel a deep sympathy for Dr. Ortiz and the Peruvians whom he represents. One wishes we could hold out some hope to them. But they are doomed, as we are. Future historians, if there are any, will note that when the hordes of crazed Americans destroyed Germany in a holy war to please the Jews, they consummated the Suicide of the West and ineluctably destroyed their own nation. As Gibbon said of the Romans, "they themselves decreed their fall."

There is another aspect of Dr. Ortiz's Temple that deserves notice. Like some Americans even today, he is a conservative shabbat goyim, and, for all practical purposes, it represents, not the American people who imagine they chose its members, but the international power that has occupied the country that the Americans did not have intelligence enough to keep for themselves.

when there is no longer anything substantial to conserve. He takes a position which is essentially that of patriotic Frenchmen in the time of Charles Maurras, i.e., he hopes to preserve existing institutions that have become mere hollow shells, by making them solid again. Since well-established religions at one time promoted social stability, he hopes for a recrudescence of an "idealistic" belief in the Christians' god and in a Divine Plan. He places his hopes and his faith in religion, which, for Peru, means, of course, Roman Catholicism, and he does so although he explicitly admits that "the Catholic Church, from the Pope to the lowest monklet, has been bought by the Jews' Synagogue."

I am sorry to say that in the sincerity of his desperate hopes Dr. Ortiz has fallen into the trap in which embittered conservatives so often fall, that of letting their emotions dictate statements for which there is no basis in fact. Since he thinks belief in a supernatural creator of our species is requisite, he tries to dispose of uncongenial facts by iidentifying; those who recognize them as enemies and then traducing them. He even goes so far as to call Charles Darwin a Jew! For that allegation, there is no evidence whatsoever and it is patently improbable in itself. One need scarcely remark that the name Darwin does not occur at all in Wilfried Euler's Das Eindringen jüdischen Blutes in die englische Oberschicht.[2]

Dr. Ortiz's conservatism is a political position for which I have always had a deep sympathy, but his admission about his own church suffices to show how utterly unrealistic it has become. If we are to think rationally about the present and the problematical future of our race, we must accept facts, however little they may accord with our sentimental predilections. Dr. Ortiz should ponder the real implications of biological evolution, which are concisely set forth by John Thornton Bannerman, "Marx, Darwin, and the Scientific Ideology," in Liberty Bell, July 1983. The hard facts of biology, not a hankering after imaginary gods, are the only effective answer to Communism, which is just another superstition devised by the Jews to facilitate their surreptitious conquest of the world. That is why the Jews' mouthpieces in Washington regularly claim to have been

2. Euler's work is a section of the great work of German scholarship, Forschungen zur Judenfrage, on which see Dr. Charles Weber's article in Liberty Bell, August-September 1983, "Racial Biology of the Jews," pp. i, 23-24. Euler's study is in Volume VI of that compilation. Cf. my comments in Liberty Bell, November 1983, pp. 1-4.

"born again" and call for a "revival of faith;" why the Congress Dr. Ortiz despises proclaimed a "Year of the Bible" in open violation of the Constitution that has not yet been officially rescinded; why the Jews so enthusiastically use their boob-tubes to promote salvation-hucksters, "creation scientists," and the other shysters who prey upon ignorance and credulity to excite a tidal wave of wild superstition to extinguish what little capacity for rational thought the schools have left in the minds of their victims.

An item in the Cleveland Plain Dealer informs me that the godly folk of Lorain County (west of Cleveland) have organized and are going to fire off, on the appointed Day of Prayer, a barrage of simultaneous prayers, not only from 300 churches, but also from the barrooms, bowling alleys, and other places where the pious may be at the appointed time. They want old Yahweh to bless Lorain County and especially to do something about its unemployment, which has reached 10.4%. Well, good Christians have been supplicating Yahweh for about two thousand years, and he hasn't heard them yet, but if he's up there and was just having a good snooze on a cloud, it may be that all those sound waves from Lorain County may wake him up and get him busy at last. If that happens, it will be interesting to see whether he will be able to do anything with the gang in Washington that created most of the unemployment by forcing a shut-down of the steel plants and other industries in the county so that the American boobs will be forced to buy what steel and machinery they can still afford from foreign producers to promote "international understanding" and the "one world" that Yahweh's Chosen want.

According to a letter that came to hand a short time ago, the once profitable pineapple plantations in Hawaii are being destroyed by their owners, who are trying to replace them with other crops. They are being forced to do this by the dictatorship in Washington, which has decreed that the American boobs must get their pineapples from Brazil, Central America, and especially Africa—not from Hawaii. That may seem odd when you remember that Hawaii was made a state so that the United States would have a horde of Polynesian, Oriental, and mongrel "citizens," but you will understand when you learn that most of the pineapple plantations are owned by white Americans, members of the only species of mammals that ever voluntarily degraded itself to serfdom and eventual extinction. If Yahweh's fans in Lorain County get some action from the Lord of Hosts, the white men who are being impoverished in Hawaii might try the same method of getting his attention. But when I remember that fierce old Yahweh promised the Jews (Exodus, 23.27) that he will destroy all the nations they invade, I am afraid Americans, whether in Lorain County or Hawaii, haven't much chance of getting him to change his mind.

As I write, a new book by Dr. Kamal Salibi of the American University in Beirut has not yet been published in this country, and I owe notice of it to Der Spiegel, which will publish portions of it in German translation, and to an article by Jim Muir of the Sunday Times, an English newspaper in Beirut. The title of the book states its thesis, The Bible Came from Arabia. According to the press, Dr. Salibi offers evidence that the well-known tale about David and Solomon in the Jew book is derived from events that took place "in the fertile coastal hills of western Arabia, now the Saudi provinces of Asir and the Southern Hejaz."

That is not at all surprising. Everyone knows the Jewish legend about the imaginary wealth of "Solomon" and the fabulous prosperity that inspired a queen of Saba (corrupted to "Sheba" in the Bible) to visit the big Sheeny in Jerusalem and become converted from some more reasonable religion to the worship of Yahweh. The tale was picked up by Mahomet in the Koran (sūrah 27), since he naturally had a special interest in it, and further adorned by Arabian fancy, reaching its finest literary expression in Gerard de Nerval's Histoire de la Reine du Matin et de Soliman, Prince des Génies.

These legends have their source in historical fact, the great prosperity of the kingdom of Saba, which flourished in the southwestern corner of the Arabian peninsula from the ninth century B.C. or earlier to shortly before A.D. 570. The Sabaeans (who were almost certainly Homer's Aethiopians) were a white race of Mediterranian stock; see their faces in the sculptures preserved in the great museum at Vienna, many of which are photographed in David H. Muller's Südarabische Altertumer (Vienna, 1899). They spoke a Semitic language, Sabaean, also called Southern Arabian, now known from the many inscriptions that have preserved most of what is now certainly known of their history. The language differs greatly from the Arabic of the Koran, from which were derived all the dialects of Arabic now spoken by Semitic peoples. (Jews, of course, are not Semites; they are a hybrid race which contains a large Semitic admixture, and Hebrew is a dialect they formed from the language of Canaan, often called Old Phoenician.)

For a very concise outline of Sabaean history, see Professor Philip K. Hitti's History of the Arabs (London, 1964). The prosperity of the Sabaeans, which is reflected in the Classical name of their country, Arabia Felix, depended on their ocean-borne commerce, their monopoly of many products, such as frankincense, and their agriculture, made possible by irrigation from artificial lakes, especially that formed by the famous dyke of Ma'rib, of which the extensive remains have been again studied by archaeologists in the present decade.

The final collapse of Sabaean civilization coincided with the ruin of the dyke of Ma'rib, after which much of the land became desiccated and desolate. The cause was one of the emphatic lessons of history that American nitwits are determined to disregard. At the height of their prosperity, the Sabaeans invaded and conquered the region of Africa opposite their land and enslaved the native Blacks, who had some vestiges of culture left from the conquest of Nubia by the Egyptians long before. The conquering Sabaeans, however, in the ignorance that preceded the development of biological science, fecklessly committed the crime of miscegenation, producing mongrels and eventually giving to the territory in Africa the appellation, "Land of Bastards," Abyssinia (now changed to Ethiopia). They were infected by Christianity in the Fourth Century,* and the Christian lust to plunder and save souls probably contributed a fanatical zeal when the mongrels, taking advantage of civil war in the Sabaean kingdom, invaded and conquered their mother country in the Sixth Century. They ruined it, of course, and naturally neglected maintenance of the dyke of Ma'rib, which finally broke sometime between 542 and 570, and was famed thereafter as a cause, rather than a consequence, of the disastrous end of Sabaean culture. The territory, much of which is now known as Yemen (al-Yaman), was occupied by an expedition from Sassanian Persia, and it is said that the devastated land was in such chaos by 575 that a corps of 800 disciplined Persian troops sufficed to send the mongrels scuttling back to Africa.

* Quite a few Christian gospels are now preserved only in translations from Greek into Geez ("Old Ethiopic"). Whether the translations were made directly from the Greek or from Coptic or Arabic or Syrian intermediaries is a much disputed question.

It would not be at all remarkable if the Jews picked up stories from Arabia Felix as a basis for some of their tales in the "Old Testament," just as they derived the story about Noah and his ark from a Sumerian myth that reached them through a Babylonian adaptation of it. And the actual prosperity of the Sabaeans could have suggested the tale about the riches and power of Solomon. But if the reports in the press are not misleading, Professor Salibi goes much farther and argues that the Biblical Israel was Saba, whence it would seem to follow that the Sabaeans were Jews!

Now it is true that the race of migratory parasites did get into Arabia at a comparatively early date. It is probable that, as Professor H. W. F. Saggs observes in The Greatness That Was Babylon (New York, 1962; paperback, 1968), Jews were established in the strategic oases along the trade routes by the last King of Babylon, Nabonidus, when he led an expedition into the Arabian peninsula that reached modern Medina and the Red Sea. The Jews naturally showed their gratitude to their benefactor in their normal manner, by spreading subversion in Babylonia and eventually betraying his capital to the Persians under Cyrus the Great in 538 B.C. It is also true that the Sabaean kingdom in the centuries preceding its collapse was swarming with Jews, who doubtless worked hard to incite dissension and civil war, as they normally do in all territories which they have infiltrated, but there is no reason to suppose the Jews were more than parasites on the Sabaeans, as they are on the Americans today. If Salibi goes so far as to make Saba ancient Israel, he is indulging in wild fantasy.

I mention all this now because Jim Muir, whom I mentioned above, suggests that, on the basis of Salibi's theory, the Jews may claim Saudi Arabia as their "homeland" too. Whether the Jews would adopt such a justification may be doubted, but it is certain that they intend to occupy and destroy Saudi Arabia, a kingdom they particularly hate because it contains the most nearly pure Semites to be found in the world after that race was dispersed and diluted by Islam, the Jews' religion for Arabs. For this purpose, the Jews will naturally use their American subjects as they are now using the nominally American C.I.A. and the Shi'ites (the Moslem heresy now dominant in Iran) to excite trouble in Saudi territory. It is not unlikely that the attacks on tankers in the Persian Gulf and the presence of American naval vessels to protect them may be a planned preliminary to the sinking of American ships, which will provide a pretext for rushing American forces to "help" the Saudis in much the same way as the mongrels from Abyssinia came to "help" one faction in Sabaean territory and then occupied it. If a large-scale expeditionary force is desired and the Americans show a lack of enthusiasm for another war to serve the Jews, the fake "energy crisis" could be made severe enough to pep them up. And the gang in Washington would have no trouble at all in arranging a "crisis" that would be proclaimed by their mouthpiece, whether Reagan or another stooge, to invoke the rule by open terrorism in the Soviet manner for which all preparations have now been made, including a whole sheaf of Executive Orders that have been printed in the Federal Register and thus made law, and reprinted by various starveling "right-wing" and "Nazi" organizations that imagine that the boobs in the United States still possess some organ that is capable of thinking. Of course, the Aryan sheep, now grazing contentedly under the eyes of their Jewish shepherds, will never read such unpleasant things, and when they feel the Executive Orders in domestic counterparts of the Gulag Archipelago, the sheep will bleat mindlessly and wonder what happened.

I have been sent a very interesting booklet, The 5th Kingdom, written and published by Elmer Arthur (4902 N.E. Thirtieth Avenue, Portland, Oregon). Properly considered, it is more significant than most of the books that are today spewed in such horrendous quantity from the presses of the great publishing houses in New Jerusalem-on-the-Hudson.

Mr. Arthur is a student of the Bible, in the commonly accepted meaning of that term. He has read it many times in English, knows its contents thoroughly, and accepts without doubt the stories in it as veracious. Innumerable individuals have done that. Mr. Arthur, however, has done much more. He not only read and believed the texts: he understood them and thought about them. That is indeed remarkable.

In addition to his Bible in the form in which it is now commonly circulated in English, Mr. Arthur has read and studied one small collection of writings of comparable age and authority in translations that were made in the Nineteenth Century, republished at various times, and are now issued by Crown Publishers under the title, The Forgotten Books of Eden: Lost Books of the Old Testament.

This, so far as I can determine from the booklet, is the extent of Mr. Arthur's studies. He may never even have heard of Marcion, Manichaeus, and the leaders of quite a few other early Christian sects that had numerous adherents and flourishing congregations in many parts of the Roman Empire until the gang called The Fathers of the Church got control of the government and could use its military power to suppress competition in the salvation-business.

It was characteristic of those early sects that they, like all men of sound judgement and unperverted instincts, were revolted by the "Old Testament" and its record of foul crimes perpetrated by Yahweh on behalf of his Chosen People of brigands and marauders. They accordingly concluded, as did Marcion, that Yahweh was an inferior and renegade god, a mere demiurge, or forthrightly identified the Jews' god with Satan, the supreme god of pure evil. They, however, had their own "New Testaments" and believed Jesus to be an emanation of a far different and superior god, a good and righteous god, who would eventually destroy the author of evil and all his army of superhuman and human devils. They were thus Christians and properly so called themselves, since they, like many followers of the religion after them, believed that the personal name of the protagonist of the "New Testament" stories had been Jesus Christ, much as a man might today be named Jim Jones.

Mr. Arthur has been more consistent and logical than those early Christians and, on the basis of the texts he had before him, thought the problem through and reached the necessary conclusion that Yahweh, Jesus & Co., Inc. are a single and indivisible corporation. Believing in the veracity of predictions made in the scriptures, he believes that the three gods of incorporated evil, with their Chosen earthlings, will inflict on civilized mankind all the sadistic horrors described in the Apocalypse and that thereafter Jesus and his band of Jew boys will reign over the devastated earth for a thousand years. But Mr. Arthur has had visions and offers us a message of hope. After "God Almighty, the Lord Jesus Christ, and the Holy Ghost," together with "all their followers that will number into the millions," have had their thousand years of de-depraved fun, the "True Divine White Holy Spirit" will arise and destroy the whole shebang. He will purify the earth with celestial fire at a temperature of 1,000,000°F., reducing God Almighty & Co., and their millions of evil spirits to "ashes that will be carried away by the winds." And, needless to say, "there will be left not one Jew or Jewess, not one nigger, male or female, nor any of the Mud Races," and the planet will be cleansed of that pollution. A "remnant of the Great White Race" will survive, however, and inherit an earth now purged of its vermin and made fit for civilized life at last.

Such is the glorious future promised us by a man who has understood the Bible in which he believes.

I have just got around to reading the second volume of the University of Cincinnati's Classical Studies, which contains the second series of lectures in memory of Louise Taft Semple, a gracious lady, accomplished hostess, generous patron of scholarship, and highly intelligent woman, whom Classicists of my generation will always remember. It contains a contribution by Professor E. A. Havelock that touches upon a fact of great importance when we try to determine the distinctive characteristics of the mentality of our race.

Most "survey" courses in colleges include a brief statement that our alphabet was borrowed by the Greeks from the Phoenicians, who are therefore to be credited with one of the epochal inventions in the history of civilization. That is a drastic oversimplification of the history of writing, and it is also misleading at a crucial point.

Phoenician was a language of the group known as Western Semitic, and Old Phoenician is a name generally given to the language of Canaan, which the Jews learned when they invaded that country and from which they formed a dialect called Hebrew, much as they debased German into Yiddish. The Phoenician alphabet was the alphabet of the Semitic languages and had letters only for consonants. Vowels were not represented in writing.

The Greeks, it is true, borrowed and stylized the Phoenician alphabet, but they used some of the letters to represent vowels.[1] That was the crucial invention. That made possible literacy as we know it today. It made possible what Havelock calls the "democratization" of knowledge. Reading and writing became skills that anyone of average intelligence could easily acquire, and literacy was no longer the jealously guarded province of experts, who usually had vested interests in religions. What was even more important, it became possible at last to write a word in such a way that it could not be mistaken for an entirely different word.

1. Mycenaean Greek was written in a complicated syllabic script which may, or may not, have been entirely lost during the Dark Age that followed the collapse of the Mycenaean civilization. The date at which the Greeks borrowed and perfected the Phoenician alphabet is uncertain; deductions drawn from a lack of evidence are necessarily hypothetical and unverifiable. The history of writing throughout the world is intricate and I must not digress here.

Perpend the magnitude of the change that permitted precision in writing. You can form a rough idea of it by considering what written English would be like, if it were written in a Semitic alphabet. The letters SN, for example, would stand for a wide variety of words of quite different meaning: 'soon,' 'sun,' 'son,' 'sin,' 'sane,' 'seen,' 'sine,' etc. The meaning of SN in a given instance could be determined only from the context. It might be followed by RS, which could stand for 'rose,' 'Rosa,' 'rise,' 'rouse,' 'arise,' 'arose,' 'arouse,' 'ruse,' 'erase,' 'iris,' 'Eros,' 'ours,' etc. Only a few of the possible meanings of SN and RS would fit together, and if the two words are preceded or followed by, say, half a dozen others, it will generally be found that all eight can combine to give only one intelligible meaning or, at the most, two. English written in consonants would be a little harder than most Semitic languages, which are much more limited in morphology and structure, and so are ill adapted to the expression of either literature that is more than rudimentary, or philosophic thought.

It is, of course, easy to tamper with the meaning of texts written with only consonants. Even R. H. Pfeiffer, who is an enthusiastic admirer of his race's "Old Testament" and would assign to parts of it impossibly early dates, admits in his Introduction to it (London, Harper, 1948) that the consonantal text was easily perverted by assuming different vowel-sounds and so corrupted to suit the theological interests of the 'experts' who expounded it orally or copied it to fit the axe they were grinding. It was particularly easy to change proper names. In the English example I gave above, if RS were written to designate the god Eros, a feminist could interpret the text as referring to the goddess Iris or to a woman named Rose! And what poor layman could argue with an 'expert' in such matters?

I stress this linguistic detail here because I have had occasion more than once in these pages to point out that the names dishonestly differentiated as 'Jesus' and 'Joshua' in most English Bibles are really one and the same name.[2] And we know this, not because the spelling in Hebrew is YHWS', which could stand for quite a variety of pronunciations, but because the name, wherever it occurs in the "Old Testament," is uniformly represented in the Septuagint by the Greek form that yields 'Jesus' in English.

I think it also noteworthy that an Aryan people refused to be content with an alphabet that not only obstructed clear thought and ready comprehension, but also lent itself to all sorts of ambiguities and mystifications.

In Illinois this November a judge simply ordered the unfortunate owners of property in Chicago to be fleeced by special taxation to meet the demands of the gangsters who operate the public boob-hatcheries. In the same state the notoriously corrupt legislature authorized the rackets called "community colleges" to exact a huge extra tax from the property-owning serfs just by demanding it. There was no protest. On the contrary, the legislator who invented that theft was promoted to the Congress of the United States by the imbecile voters.

In 1776, a large faction among the British colonists revolted against their mother country. Their principal grievance was that the Parliament in London had imposed on them mild and almost trivial taxes without their consent. They could not foresee how cheerfully their spavined and degenerate descendants would acquiesce in the real slavery into which they are being progressively herded—and which, sad to say, is all they deserve.

2. The dishonesty goes back to the Jews, who wanted to change the pronunciation of the extremely popular personal name to differentiate the hero of their tradition about the conquest of Canaan from his late namesake, the self-appointed christ who had failed in his attempted revolution and whose cult they sold to the goyim as Christianity.

THE JEWISH PROBLEM And Aryan Survival In The United States

RATIONAL AND IRRATIONAL APPROACHES TO THE JEWISH QUESTION

by
Charles E. Weber, Ph.D.

The prominent German National Socialist legal scholar, Professor Johann von Leers, wrote in his book, 14 Jahre Judenrepublik [14 Years of the Jewish Republic, i.e., the Weimar Republic, published in 1933], that the National Socialists had never struggled against Jews for the purpose of destroying them. He even wished that Jews could have a felicitous national development in some area other than Europe. (These sentiments have a close parallel with those of Abraham Lincoln in regard to the American Negro problem, since Lincoln envisaged the eventual repatriation of Negroes.) Leers further remarked that hatred of Jews for its own sake is stupid and actually barbaric in the final analysis and that National Socialist opposition to Jews had as its purpose the protection of the German people from intellectual, economic and political enslavement by Jews. Leers even put in a good word for the basic idea of Zionism, with its objective of a secular national existence of Jews amongst other nations of the world, with the provision that a Jewish state should not pose a threat of attempts at international dominance.[1]

Now, a half century after these words appeared in print, Americans might do well to ponder them in an American context. The United States now has by far the largest Jewish population of all nations in the world and its Jews are by far the most powerful.

Down through the centuries Jews have been in frequent and often very bitter conflict with their host populations. During the millenia of the Diaspora, Jews have accumulated remarkable skills for the purpose of dominating their host populations. We might view the destructive Russian Revolution of 1917 as the most outstanding and tragic application of these skills. Jewish skills in dominating their host populations have consisted of shrewd financial manipulations, gaining influence in princely courts and, more recently, gaining control of mass media and thus obtaining inordinate power over the elected officials of "democratic" states. However, Jews have had to leave one area of the world after the other when their host populations could stand their oppression no longer.

In the present-day United States Jews play a prominent rôle in sabotaging of the family life and reproductive activities of their predominantly Aryan host population by creating tensions between the sexes ("women's liberation") and popularizing abortion and homosexuality. (Perhaps they are motivated by jealousy to some extent, since the Jews' own reproductive rates are presently very low in the United States and were declining rapidly in Europe during the late 19th and early 20th centuries.) Jews have skilfully weakened the racial and cultural sense of identity of Aryan Americans by creating a sense of guilt in them with regard to their relations with other races, notably by constantly publicizing the so-called "Holocaust" and vigorously promoting Negro organizations and interests. American television networks, including so-called "public television," which are clearly dominated by Jews, are constantly transmitting drama programs in which Aryans are portrayed as depraved and immoral, while members of racial minorities are rarely thus portrayed.[2] Not only have Jews achieved a gross overrepresentation in the learned professions such as law and medicine (especially the psychiatric branch of medicine, in which exploitation of patients and fraud are so readily possible,) but they are now coming into prominence in scholarly and academic circles. (A man of Jewish origin is now Librarian of Congress.[3]) Jews played a large role in the shameful surrender of the American canal which had been built through Panama, an outstanding achievement of almost exclusively Aryan military officers, engineers and health officials, completed seven decades ago.

The various types of power which Jews have amassed in the United States is all the more amazing because there was only a tiny Jewish element in the United States as recently as one-hundred years ago, approximately ½ of 1% of the U.S. population. Massive Jewish migration from Europe, especially from Eastern Europe, commenced in the 1880s as a result of pogroms (riots) against Jews in lands under the Czar's crown during the reigns of Alexander III (1881-1894) and Nicholas II (1894-1917). Hostility to Jews in central and western Europe after 1918, by no means confined to Germany, served as a further stimulus for Jewish migration to the United States.[4]

2. I recently watched closely the nine-part (!) series on "public" television, Heritage: Civilization and the Jew. The series was effectively presented and narrated by the articulate Abba Eban, former ambassador from the Jewish state in Palestine to the United States and the United Nations. Naturally, Eban's presentation was an attempt to put the historical rôle of the Jews in its best light. The series went back as far as the sixth century B.C., or "before the common era," as Eban put it. Not only was there a gross distortion of the rôle of the Jews in world history, but an avoidance of the mention of some of the ugliest of Jewish influences. In Eban's version of Jewish history, the Jews could do no wrong. Persecution of Jews was presented as simply the product of the evil psyches of a wide variety of host populations. I watched the series with anger, frustration and above all jealousy of Jewish control of the powerful medium which I, as a taxpayer, am being forced to support. How wonderful it would be if "public" television were to present a similarly laudatory series on some great Aryan nation, such as the Germans or Italians and their accomplishments!

3. Wall Street Journal, 9 November, 1984

4. In 1818 the United States was still nearly devoid of Jews, whose number has been estimated at about 3,000 for that year. By 1880 their number had risen to 230,000, thus about ½ of 1% of the U.S. population at that time. In 1880 about 3.3% of the Jewish population of the entire world lived in the United States, while 88.4% lived in Europe. By 1937, 30% of the Jewish population of the entire world lived in the United States. Today the Jewish percentage of the U.S. population is generally given at around 3%, but there are some reasons for higher estimates if all persons of Jewish or partly Jewish descent are counted without regard to present religious affiliation. According to Abba Eban, about one-third of the Jews who marry in the United States are currently marrying non-Jews. For a penetrating, lucid statistical analysis of the Jewish population of the world in the late 1930s, including detailed information on their former occupational and social distributions in Germany and Austria, see the article by Friedrich Burgdörfer, "Die Juden in Deutschland und in der Welt" in Forschungen zur Judenfrage, Volume III (1938), pp. 152-198.

Jewish solidarity in confrontation with host populations and perhaps even genetically determined physical and mental characteristics give Jews a tremendous advantage in the struggle for power in an urbanized civilization. The big city has been the preferred habitat of Jews for many centuries. (One need only think of the large Jewish population of Alexandria in ancient times.) It is only relatively recently, however, that the bulk of the American Aryan population has come to dwell in cities. Formerly most Aryans were engaged in agriculture or at least lived in a rural environment, but the mechanization of agriculture has changed that. The Jew is thus competing with the Aryan in an environment to which the former had long become accustomed in the course of centuries and even millenia, while the bulk of the Aryan population lives in an environment which is relatively new to it. At present less than 5% of the American population is directly engaged in agriculture. It is difficult to overestimate the significance of this fact for American life.

Two-thousand years, the approximate length of time in which Jews have lived in the Diaspora, represent about 100 generations. From a biological point of view alone that number of generations affords the possibility of the development of rather distinct physical and mental characteristics within a relatively exclusive population group. Although man has existed for some hundreds of thousands of years in forms more or less analogous to modern man, we must not underestimate the genetic changes which can take place within a mere 2,000 years. I recall that when I viewed the Roman ruins in Trier (near the Luxembourg-German border) a guide pointed out to me that Romans must have been much shorter than we modern men on the average because we had to stoop to go through the doorways of the ruins of the thermal bathhouses. Even if Jews have somewhat diverse ancient racial roots,[5] during the long centuries since the beginning of the Diaspora Jew have developed distinct genetic characteristics as a group and tribal ways of surviving in the urbanized environments scattered throughout the world, primarily living off the productive capacities of their host populations in a manner somewhat analogous to that of certain strains of mice and rats.

In view of the genetically determined characteristics of Jews

we must be hesitant to seek a solution to the Jewish problem through biological assimilation. Such assimilation would permanently alter the racial basis of American civilization, even if the cultural aspects of American life have already been altered to some extent by the presence of large numbers of Jews, especially since around the turn of the century. The Jewish rôle in film-making and more recently television can hardly be overestimated in their influence on American cultural life. Jews are also heavily involved in musical performance, the art market and publishing.

Gradually Aryan Americans are becoming aware of their plight. Their psychological and intellectual reactions to it are of a varied nature, but often enough these reactions are irrational, unproductive and even harmful to themselves. Jews often contend that hostility toward them ("anti-Semitism") is a product of a scapegoat mentality by which all blame for difficulties of the community at large are shifted onto a racial or cultural minority. Obviously, such an explanation for the widespread hostility toward Jews is self-serving, but it is not completely unfounded. Often the scapegoat thesis has been a product of oversimplification of the Jewish problem in the minds of Aryans and thus a product of intellectual laziness. The scapegoat mentality can actually be harmful to Aryans because it serves as a substitute for vigorous, well-informed thought about the Jewish question.

We Americans who are presently becoming so keenly aware of the stranglehold which Jews have on our country should not have any all too charitable notions about the role of National Socialism. After all, the National Socialists redistributed the burden of central and eastern European Jewry onto Americans, Palestinians and others whose governments betrayed them by accepting large waves of Jewish immigration, even if most of the participants in the Évian Conference of 1938 on Jewish refugees were quite pusillanimous about accepting Jewish immigrants, a fact which showed up their hypocrisy in rebuking Germany for its economic and cultural restrictions on its Jews at that time. On the other hand, we must credit the National Socialist government for conducting intensive studies on the Jewish problem from historical, economic, theological and biological perspectives. National Socialist thinking on the final solution to the Jewish problem had some strong similarities to the Zionist thinking which had been developing since the late 19th century, notably under the leadership of Theodor Herzl, who was born in Budapest in 1860 and who died in Austria in 1904. Zionism, by the way, was primarily an eastern, no western, European movement.

There are many rational and quite legal measures which Aryan Americans can take in order to protect themselves and their race from the effects and influences of Jews who are living in their midst.

One measure to keep the learned professions from being overrun by Jews is simple; seeking the professional services of only members of one's own racial group. In the economic field the obvious measure is patronizing only merchants of one's own racial group. These measures are not only entirely legal, but they are also essentially only a reciprocation of the loyalty which Jews have toward their own group. In order to confine his use of professional services and his purchases to Aryan professional people and merchants, the Aryan must protect himself by developing skills at recognizing the physical and mental characteristics of Jews. Important sources of information on the physical and mental characteristics of Jews are contained in the important book by John R. Baker, Race (Oxford University Press, 1974, pp. 232-247) and in the articles by Otmar von Verschuer and Eugen Fischer published in the Liberty Bell issues of August-Sepember, 1983, August, 1984 and September, 1984.

Aryans must equip themselves with knowledge about the Jewish problem and the ramified aspects of Jewish control of their lives. We Aryans desperately need a research institute which would investigate the Jewish question on a scientific and scholarly basis. Its investigations and research should be in various fields; history, sociology, criminology, political science, economics, theology, law, psychology, physical anthropology and other fields. Henry Ford's efforts in the early 1920s to investigate the Jewish problem as it existed at that time were an admirable pioneering effort along these lines and many of the fruits of Ford's efforts are still quite pertinent to the present situation. Another notable effort along these lines, perhaps the most notable effort ever made, was that by the Reichsinstitut für Geschichte des neuen Deutschlands, which published scientific and scholarly studies of the Jewish question which encompassed a variety of fields; physical anthropology, theology, history, literary studies, economics, law, musicology and archaeology. These studies were published in various forms, but most notably in a series, Forschungen zur Judenfrage (Research on the Jewish Question), which extended from 1937 to 1943. The end of the tragic, fratricidal Second World War, of course, brought an end to the publication of these valuable studies. The series of volumes which the Reichsinstitut published is now rare. Only a few of the more than fifty articles which the series contains are available in English translation, although many of these articles would be of great importance to American and other English-speaking students of the Jewish problem.

Another measure which Aryans can readily undertake in their defence is identification of themselves. Symbols of religious affiliation, such as a cross or fish, can be used in advertising to aid in this identification. Advertising by Aryan merchants in periodicals which defend them can also be an aid in identification. As the fraction of Aryans in the population becomes ever smaller, ethnic identification becomes ever more important to Aryan survival in an increasingly hostile climate. Aryans must learn to evaluate political candidates for public office in terms of their subservience to Jewish interests at the cost of Aryan well-being. Politicians' attitudes toward the use of money earned by taxpayers for the subsidizing of the Jewish state in Palestine can serve as a convenient yardstick.

One very important thing which Aryans can do to benefit their own racial group is to subscribe to periodicals which advocate the welfare of Aryans. Those with the appropriate talents can also write for such periodicals. Even if the subscriber can read only part of the periodicals, he can pass them on. The very act of subscribing to such periodicals in itself is an important aspect of supporting them. The larger the circulation of such periodicals, the lower their costs in relation to the numbers printed. Larger circulations can also increase their power to attract the efforts of talented authors.

To survive in an increasingly hostile environment, Aryans must be strongly concerned with educational affairs. Having an influence on the choice of textbooks is of crucial importance. All too many publishers of textbooks are now Jewish or are controlled by Jews. Aryans must be on guard against their influences on impressionable minds.

Jews play a large role in publishing pornography, a poison which can impair the Aryan will to reproduce and survive in a demographic sense, the most elemental kind of survival of all. The most valid objection to pornography is that it has a tendency to trivialize the reproductive act. We Aryans must change our attitudes toward the abortion and illegitimacy questions. Every healthy, bright Aryan baby born, whether to a married or unmarried mother, is a contribution to our survival as a race, at least under the present circumstances. The abortion of a single, healthy Aryan fetus is an injury to our race, which is now facing a sharp demographic decline, especially in a relative sense. The Aryan demographic decline in the United States is creating a vacuum which is sucking in many non-Aryans, especially from Latin America.

Aryans can survive and prosper only if they have an awareness of their illustrious heritage and potential, the basic motivational factors that are a sine qua non if Aryans are to survive in the face of tough competition in an increasingly non-Aryan environment.

An irrational, unfounded hatred of members of other races is beneath the characteristic nobility of the Aryan psyche. On the other hand, a lack of awareness of the antagonistic role and attitudes of the non-Aryan components of the American population could eventually be lethal to the Aryan component. Non-Aryans in the United States have a vigorous concern for the survival of their racial groups. We Aryans have a right, indeed a duty, to be concerned for our own survival. We should feel no moral imperative whatsoever to apologize for defending our race.

WORSHIP?

Every now and then we are asked, 'How do we worship our gods?' There are certain connotations to the word 'worship' that make us rather uneasy applying that word to the relationship with our gods. Webster draws a slight difference in emphasis between the meaning of the noun and the verb; for the former, the explanation is: "state or quality of being worthy," "excellence of character," "dignity;" this is fine. The 2nd listing is "used as a title;" that may also pass. The 3rd is "prayer;" understood in the Christian sense, this is not exactly what we would want to project relative to our gods; we do not petition the Asir.

The verb is explained as 1) to adore; 2) to respect, to honor; 3) to idolize. Only the second listing would be fine, for, indeed, we honour and respect our gods, but we do not adore or idolize them in the usual sense of these words.

The question above, therefore, ought rather to be, 'how do we honour the Asir? How do we show our respect?' The fellowship suggests the following considerations:

Let us begin by repeating a statement from Religious Attitudes of the Indo-Europeans by Professor Hans Guenther: " . . .there is no satisfactory exposition of Indo-European religiosity as such, and where such a description has been attempted, it is often deliberately or unconsciously measured with yardsticks derived from the Judeo-Christian world." This simply means that we have no clear knowledge of the relationship between our forefathers and their gods; we can draw some conclusions, we can surmise, we can listen to our own instincts and accept only that which rings true, but we do not KNOW, so there is no cut and dried answer.

However , we do know that the relationship was not one of fear; there was no cringing before a deity, it was not a slave/master situation. When, for example, the 90th Psalm, verse 7, says: "For we are consumed by thine anger and by thy wrath we are troubled," this is an alien attitude that does not refer to original Indo-European concepts although all members of the Aryan tribes knew well the power of the cosmic forces. "No religiosity which takes something away from man, to make him appear smaller before a deity who has become all-powerful and oppressive, is Indo-European" (Guenther).

In the Odyssey men are seen as 'friends of the gods;' in the Bhagavad Gita, Krishna calls Arjuna 'his friend.' Plato refers to a community between gods and men, and he sees the man of moderation and self-respect as a 'friend of the gods.' Such a relationship is based on the concept that gods and men are bound by the same values, by a common destiny.

At the same time our forefathers were well aware of their limitations; to them (as to us) the gods represented the eternal powers of the universe—'the Force' of the cosmos of which a small part resides in man as a component of the whole "with which no man shall measure himself" (Goethe).

The expression 'to pay homage to' also has some unhealthy connotations; it indicates in feudal law the vassal/lord relationship although it may also mean 'to honour.' And this is actually the essence of our relationship to our gods—we honour and respect them. Since this relationship is personal, no priest class developed among our forefathers of old. Within the Druids it seems priests were powerful, and at times shamans and like individuals enjoyed a position of respect, but where the Asir gods were honoured this was not common. Among the Aryan tribes, the chieftain, the oldest member of the community or the head of the clan, officiated when the folk gathered to pay tribute to THE gods, but THESE people were more like co-ordinators (I hate to use the word M.C. or host since the phenomenon of the TV host!); they were not conceived of as prophets, NOR were they mediators.

When, therefore, communicating with the gods, there was no kneeling, no downcast eyes, no bent heads. Rather, the Indo-European stood, gazing upwards, often with his arms outstretched, preferably in natural surroundings, but where this was not feasible, in the privacy of his home. At tribal gatherings, the dedications to the gods were brief, similar to someone now proposing a toast to an honoured guest.

So how do we show our appreciation for the gods? We do that every time we teach a child the ways of our forefathers or help a kinsman; when we protect nature from the ravages of industry or plant a tree; when we perform our duty to the folk or execute a job well; when we show moderation in all things, respect for self and folk, and when we are true to our kin, cautious when among strangers.

Another question asked of us concerns prayers. As said above, we do not petition our gods; there is no horse-dealing, no 'if you do this, I'll do that;' we do not buy favours from a deity that way; that would put us in debt to the gods; besides, as Ellis Davidson remarks in Gods and Myths of Northern Europe, "Men knew that the gods whom they served could not give them freedom from danger and calamity, and they did not demand that they should.... The great gift of the gods were readiness to face the world as it was, the luck that sustains men in tight places and the opportunity to win glory which alone can survive death."

These are proud words and lofty ideals; they show that our forefathers were prepared to live by their own powers, physically and spiritually; yet they felt a close relationship to the gods because these represented the natural powers; our ancestors knew that to violate the laws of nature, both at personal and tribal levels, bore in themselves retributions according to the seriousness of the misdeed.

What takes the place of prayers in an Odinist community would be a summonsing up, we might call it, of the spirit of the gods, a trying to conceive what Thor would do or Odin advise if they were faced with the same problem in the imaginary world of the legends.

Here we touch on something that on the surface may seem mystical but which in reality is not. When seriously addressing a problem, you have to give your full attention to all possibilities. You may consider what you would like to do, which is not always the same as what you know you ought to do; you think of all the angles, the pros and cons for following this line of action or that. You might be so intent on solving the problem that you could possibly enter into a dream-like state of mind and see an apparition in a broadrimmed hat, wearing a blue cape, appearing before your eyes. Your rational mind would know that this does not happen; rather, it is your subconscious facilities, drawing on the hidden instinctual powers that reside in you which surface in the shape of Odin to give you the answer you were looking for. Thus, it is not the god who told you what to do, but rather YOUR own subconscious self that in fact knew the answer all the time although it took an act of great spiritual intensity to bring it up from the DEPTHS of your mind.

Don't Odinists then have celebrations, rituals, services? You bet we have; but they are not occasions for any spiritual submission to an all-powerful, all-knowing deity. The traditional celebrations of our forefathers had their roots in the seasonal changes as experienced by a farming community. First and foremost are the four seasons; the fertility rites of spring and the thanksgiving observations of harvest are also important occasions, together with a few other days during the year. Each celebration was usually dedicated to a certain god or goddess who was particularly connected to the season and therefore especially honoured.

The people would gather; they all knew what they were celebrating; there were songs and dances around a bonfire; foods and drinks were brought forth and a little of each dish was thrown on the ground as an offering to the god. Then followed a general rejoicing with much merrymaking which at times could become rather rowdy—let us not forget that 'pagans are those who say Yes to life,' as Nietzsche put it; our forefathers saw nothing wrong with having fun and celebrating life itself.

Modern Odinists live under different circumstances than did our ancestors in the days of heathenism. Christianity brought with it fear, submission and a negation of natural instincts. The way in which we celebrate the seasons and honour our gods cannot be exactly as our forefathers did, but we shall get as close as is reasonable.

This means, first of all, that wherever possible Odinists should make a point of getting together to mark the seasonal changes and the special festivals we have on our calendar, to have a feast and toast the gods. The simple act of meeting is in itself a celebration of folk identity for it is the basis for our culture and it creates a FELLOWSHIP that has been missing for far too long. Sitting alone somewhere is not nearly as conducive to such festivities as when you are with a few friends who share your spiritual outlook and your concerns for folk and future.

As we always point out, Odinism is not dogmatic; there are other ways in which to show respect for our gods, but it will mostly be a question of emphasis, not one of basics. □

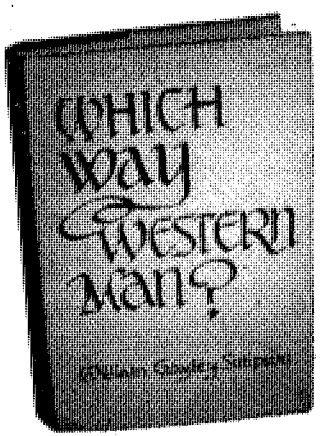
Survival manual for the White race



William Gayley Simpson has spent a lifetime of keen observation, careful analysis, and deep reflection developing the principal thesis of his book: that the single, undying purpose of all human activity should be the ennobling of man. In support of this thesis he looks at the foundations of Western Society, at the structure of our government, at the effects of technology and industrialization on man, at the roles of the sexes, at economics, and at race. The book goes to the roots of the problems facing the White race today, and it shows the ways in which White society must be changed if the race is to survive. WHICH WAY WESTERN MAN? is an encyclopedic work whose conclusions can be ignored by no one with a sense of responsibility to the future. WE THE ARYANS

Reprinted from The Talon
published by the Euro-American Alliance
Box 2-1776, Milwaukee WI 53221

We are the Aryans. We have built all of the great Civilizations of the world. Those we have not built ourselves we have inspired. Our race have brought to the planet all of the scientific and technological advances worth noting. The look of our race is so noble that statues of Aryan heroes have become the world's great treasures. Even in war do we imprint the signature of our nobility—valor, mercy to the defeated, and loyalty toward those to whom we are allied. There is no better soldier, no greater thinker or lover of the high Culture, its art and philosophy, than the Aryan. We conceive of Constitutions which astound the world for their gravity and fairness. In peace and in war the Aryan has been a leader for more than three thousand years.

Nevertheless, we are a dying race. Our birth-rate is beneath 2.0 Aryan children per couple. It takes at least a birth-rate of 2.0 (ours is 1.6) to insure the basic survival of a race. Our Aryan people don't seem to care whether this mighty race survives. Indeed, it would seem that all too many Aryans prefer to be the last of their kind. That is the conclusive evidence of the Aryan refusal to fight back against the forces sworn to make an end to the White Race. The Aryan is an individualistic sort of person. He wants to make it on his own, even though the entire anti-White world of Jews and coloreds is ganging up on him and his descendants. What hope has he?

Well, things may be changing. The future of the Aryan race depends upon the awareness of danger by our youth. Did you know that all across America, in every college and university system, White students are organizing? Their organization is called the WHITE STUDENT UNION, and together with the aid of the Hon. Tom Metzger's "White American Resistance" (WAR) the WHITE STUDENT UNION is bringing the message of Aryan pride to White students everywhere across the United States and in Western nations abroad. Tom Metzger (WAR, P.O. Box 65, Fallbrook, CA 92028 [There is now also a Computer Bulletin Board System on Line: Call 619-723-8996]) has seen the potential of the WHITE STUDENT UNION, and has decided to help it grow in California. You can help these courageous young Aryans to grow on college campuses all over this country. Write to the WHITE STUDENT UNION, P.O. Box 41872, Sacramento CA 95841, and ask how you may be able to help them. If you have children of high school or college age, tell them about the WHITE STUDENT UNION. Your children need an organization such as the WHITE STUDENT UNION.

We have been saying this for nearly nine years now: Organization will do it. The Aryan racial organization is the key to our racial salvation. It astounds us that more Whites cannot or will not recognize this fact. The Jews could not have become so influential without the ADL and the American Jewish Committee. Neither would the negroes have made it so far in Aryan society without the NAACP. Every non-White knows that racial moves cannot be made without minority pressure groups. The Aryan, however, is foolish enough to think that he can go it alone. Well, he can't; and sooner or later the fact will be too evident to ignore. He will have to face the facts.

Speaking of facts, we wonder how so many Aryans can fail to recognize a racial attack on all the White race. For example: the City of Milwaukee has decided to advance negroes and other minorities over Whites who have more seniority on the Civil Service lists. White workers are going to be overlooked for promotion based upon race. Yet Whitey says nothing out loud—no complaints. The Milwaukee Police Department is forced by court order to hire minorities, promote minorities over qualified Whites, and assign negroes to White residential districts. White officers are heard to grumble, but the White community says nothing. Right now two black members of the Green Bay Packers football team have admitted to "The Milwaukee Journal" to having had sexual relations with a White woman in the basement of a Milwaukee tavern where the woman was employed as a "go-go" dancer. The woman alleges that the two black Packers players raped her after invading the dancer's dressing room. That was one week ago (this is October 16th) and nothing whatsoever has been done about it. The Milwaukee County District Attorney, who worhips blacks, has no comment about his "investigation." The two blacks haven't even been ordered to appear before the D.A.

But what is so odd is that here we have another racial assault by blacks against a White woman, and Milwaukee Whites are silent on the subject except to say that the woman probably was a "slut" and the "Packers are good guys." We wonder if Milwaukee is unique—or is this city symptomatic of White inability to react to racial insults, slights and assaults. It may be that the Euro-American Alliance is out of place here in Milwaukee, that somewhere else in America Whites are ready and willing to answer the attacks of the minorities. We happen to know, however, that Whites are being raped and murdered all over the country in increasing numbers by negroes and all manner of "wogs." The Jews have succeeded in making the Aryan feel guilty for his expressions of racial concern. Is there a limit to this silence?

We wish to say right here that Aryan youth are in the most precarious position of all. Their diminishing numbers mean a dismal racial and socio-economic future. 'Starve a White family out' will probably be the new motto of the Liberal-Jewish-Minority coalition. God knows that more Americans of the Aryan race, more White youth, have fallen for the racial trap set by the Jew entertainment moguls: have you seen the race-mixing on the 'rock' video programs? Now most White kids won't mix sexually with negroes merely because 'Hymie' wants them to. But too many young Aryans are moved by media to accept the black lifestyle as the equal of their own. Most young Whites have no idea any longer who they are. They know nothing of their brilliant racial and cultural past: blame the government schools, which a long time ago began to purge Aryan historical studies from the curricula. Still, White students have the potential to rise to the occasion.

What the WHITE STUDENT UNION can accomplish on campus is to demand and get Aryan studies programs, including the REAL history of our great race. Someday, these aware young Aryans will lead the Western world. Things may be looking up, and we, the mature Aryan racial-nationalists, must aid our brightest, most courageous youth to persevere in this, the most vital cause of this Age.

(As an addendum to this month's piece, it was announced today that the vaunted "Nobel Prize" for Peace was awarded to a squeaky little negro by the name of Bishop Desmond Tutu, presumably for his work in South Africa of opposing the Aryan system of separation/segregation called "Apartheid." It was reported that 'white' and black integrationists flaunted the laws against public displays of racial consortium and began to cavort in the streets upon hearing news of the award. The One-Worlders are gearing up for an assault on South Africa. You will know 'when' as the Jews begin to leave that country for New York, Miami Beach and Los Angeles in larger numbers than usual.

So you see that the White race is under the gun in all Western nations. It is but a measure of Aryan-American foolishness that we do not see it as a matter of a little time before the boom is lowered on Whitey in the USA. Yes, Virginia, it damn well can happen here!

We are reminded that the greatest advocate of peace in our time is still locked up in Spandau Prison in Berlin: Rudolf Hess (90). He'll get no "Nobel Peace Prize." He will not even be set free. □

17 July 1984

Dear Friend:

Thank you for the note; I am honored to have my articles printed in Liberty Bell. Every article in the June issue seemed to be inter-related in some way, and this is excellent. The contribution by Major Clerkin was tops; after seeing that the aged Lee Layton has finally recognized the sham of Christianity for what it is, I couldn't help but feel that Major Clerkin is also having second thoughts. I associate his works usually with a Christian Identity theme, but that was totally absent in his hard-hitting article.

It disturbs me that you have to operate "on a shoestring," so to speak, sort of like my own family just being able to live from pay-check to pay-check. Many times I've daydreamed about being able to finance our cause substantially; when I see some article about a family in NY or PA winning one of those huge lotteries, I think of how I would spend such a fortune. It would give me a wonderful feeling to be able to come to you with a cashier's check for a few hundred thousand! There's something ironic and in the vein of "poetic justice" to use the Jews' lifeblood (money) in a cause directly against them.

Since I haven't won any lotteries lately, in lieu of that cashier's check, please accept this donation, and I do sincerely wish it would have 3 or 4 more zeroes behind it! Anytime I earn a little spending money with my hobby, I set aside a portion for you and your efforts; it takes all my regular pay-check to pay the expenses of raising three children, or I would donate on a much more regular basis.

I know I've said enough already to a busy man, but let me pass on this incident that strikes home to our cause: three weekends ago, I transported a group of young boys to Houston for a day at Astroworld (an amusement complex a la Disneyland theme); as there were other adults along to chaperone, I chose to sit in the parking lot all day and catch up on my reading. I did manage quite a bit of that, but I also observed a most ominous situation. Watching the people, I was struck by the fact of how many were non-white; mongrels of various hues passed by all day long; the majority were Mexican, then nigger, then Oriental. If a white couple came by, they would be escorting one; possibly two children; but these non-whites would have four, six, even eight kids in tow, and all seemed to be from babies to ten years old.

Another couple who made the trip with me went on into Houston on business, and they came back saying they thought for a minute they were in Washington, D.C. It's been some ten years since they'd been to that section of Houton, and they said all they saw were niggers, everywhere.

We observed the trams picking up people from the parking lots and hauling them to the park. The trams had a driver and an attendant on each vehicle. The driver was usually white, but the attendant, who did all the talking and instructing over the tram's P.A. system, was ALWAYS an Oriental of some kind.

For those who have read Raspail's "Camp of the Saints," it was indeed a chilling spectacle, and brought home to reality just how far we've come in accomplishing the Jew goal of a mongrelized U.S.A. The hour is late; the sands in the hourglass are running out, just as our time as a people runs out.

Will we fight, or will we assist our mortal enemies in destroying us by continuing to cringe before them? Right now, you could say we cringe in fear voluntarily; it won't be long before they will FORCE us to cringe.

Sincerely,
R.G., Texas

Dear Landsmann:

...I much enjoyed your "White Racial Nationalism" in the last Liberty Bell. A co-worker saw me reading it and asked what it was. He was completely ignorant of the Jewish question (as I was until 1980) and had to be told what "Goyim" meant and what kosher butchering was. He was surprised to see your publication selling for $3 but I told him it was because it was unavailable in stores. He read the 3-page article with amazement. His comment was: "It's true! Every word is true!" So I congratulate Major Clerkin on an excellent job of writing. I also much enjoyed "The Rest of Donald Day" and, as you may note, I have ordered his book. It is amazing how much America has declined socially from his day. It is true, in the old days a murder was big news. Now we have a dozen a day in the NYC area and no one even notices them. NYC has virtually become a third world country like Uganda. If the flow of white money, keeping the savages fed and doped up, ever ceases, the racial war Farrakhan spoke of will become an instant reality. I had thougt the Jews would hyperinflate this year and maybe stage another oil hoax. Instead, their oil war has fizzled and we are on the verge of a deflationary collapse like that of 1931.

On May 11, 1931 the Vienna Kreditanstalt collapsed, setting off a chain reaction collapse of the world banking structure. Exactly 53 years later, to the day, the Continental Illinois Bank collapsed after a 3-day run drained it of $20 billion. Total collapse of the U.S. banking system was only averted by massive Fed loans and a phoney guarantee of all deposits by the FDIC. A few days later, on May 28, there was a run on Manufacturers Hanover and the entire U.S. banking system in general. Some $50 billion in Eurodollars were liquidated in a few days. From that day to this, U.S. banks have been shut out of the Eurodollar markets worldwide. They have been forced to borrow from other banks who borrow for them and tack on a fat fee for the privilege. It was pressure from these banks that forced the accounting change that is now forcing U.S. banks to write off overdue loan interest to South America. The real fun will begin next quarter when the overdue loans will be 180 days past due. At that time the principal will have to be written off. That would ruin every bank in America. In 1931, the equivalent was the WW I debt which had to be suspended in August. Not a cent has been paid on it since and it will be the same with the foreign debt now. Naturally, the Jews intend to squeeze every bit of it out of our hides. In September 1931, the British pound collapsed and a bit later in the year a major bank in Michigan was refused a loan by a Federal agency and collapsed, dragging down the state and then the entire country. By inauguration day, every bank in America was closed. You may see this happen again in 85. Unless the Jews immediately inflate the dollar, it is a certainty.

In closing I might add that I missed your letters section. Nearly alone in a sea of "holycaust survivors" and Liberal half-wits, I need some moral support from knowing there are sane human beings left.

Sincerely,
R.S. New York State

Dear George:

One comment I should like to make. We white people have got to stop thinking of ourselves as a majority. We are a persecuted and shrinking minority. It is long since time that we realized we are underdogs in danger of elimination, not a powerful majority dispensing "charity and tolerance" as the Liberals pretend. We had better arm and organize and soon. Whites have been escaping the black plague by moving out to the suburbs where niggers and spics generally don't go since they don't have cars or money. At some point soon, the system will break down and we will be faced with economic collapse and racial war. The Jew government's response has been to raise taxes past the point of confiscation. Whites ar only surviving now by cheating on their taxes. This, in turn, leaves them open to persecution by the Jews' IRS which uses selective enforcement of the tax laws to crush white nationalists. At some point in the next year or two (Farrakhan said by 1986, and I am inclined to agree with him), the system may break down whereupon we will face a struggle for survival against the colored hordes backed by whatever power the Federal authorities can muster. I was at the Detroit riots of 1967, and I saw the burned down stores were still in ruins in 1981. That was the rehearsal for what is to come. At that time, a nigger mob, advancing on a white suburb, was fired on and dispersed by armed civilians. A friend of mine in the 82nd Airborne division was among the first on the scene and he counted 19 dead and 37 wounded in the street, nearly half the death total for the whole riot. It was carefully kept out of the papers, but this was the incident that caused Johnson to send in the Federal troops (my unit). Until then, 33,000 police and National Guards had been standing about with empty guns while the niggers looted and burned the city.

After this affair, the Jews had to go back to the drawing board with their plans for racial war and the anti-gun crusade was intensified to disarm the whites. If the welfare money to the black slums is cut off, we will have full scale racial war within days. Rather than fear this event, we should welcome it. The coloreds have been conducting a racial war against us for years under the cover of "crime." Countless thousands of whites are murdered, beaten, robbed, and raped every year. It is much better that this come out in the open and that whites start fighting back rather than trying to conduct business as usual. We should speed the collapse along by every possible means. A good way is to get every government benefit imaginable and pay little or no taxes at all if we can manage it. Here in my state, Jew York, at least 20% of the people cheat on the sales taxes. If possible, we should get our income totally on the side and without withholding. At the same time, take every government benefit you can get, from welfare to food stamps to college loans to unemployment. Our model should be the Jew Roy Cohen who enjoys a luxurious life style and pays no taxes whatever by the expedient of pretending nothing he uses is his. His Jew friends help him in this. We are not bloated with stolen money, but the same principle applies, we should help those of us who are with us just as white communities like the Mormons and Amish do. We should also avoid Jew swindles like insurance companies, lotteries, the courts, the stock market, the banks, political parties, etc., whenever possible. We are a nation within a nation and we should act together for our mutual benefit just as other minorities do.

Best regards,
W.K., New York State

Dear Mr. Dietz: 21 July 1984

In reading the "Spotlight" for July 23, I learned of the bombing out of the IHR in Torrance, California. I am sure you must have read about it also. Naturally not one word about it in any Zionist-controlled paper or any TV or radio network. The more I read and learn about this Jew-controlled government, the more disturbed I become and feel it is too late already. I am also very concerned about your safety. Please be so careful. You and other Patriots who are trying so hard to inform the stupid and naive people in our midst. The Jews seem to have everything in place. Just take a look at the traitors (Goyim) at the Democratic Convention. What a disgrace to our once great country, the delegates as well as the traitor politicians. May God have mercy on the good people of this world.

Sincerely,
Mrs. S.L., North Carolina

Dear George: 18 July 1984

My compliments on a fine June 84 issue. We give the eschatologically inclined a little breather for once! Paul Knutson's labors in putting the sequel to Donald Day's ONWARD CHRISTIAN SOLDIERS must be applauded. I enjoyed the book immensely, and now, THE REST OF DONALD DAY. BALLOT BOX 1984 was short, but succinct. Amen!

The recent massacre in California of 21 MacDonalds customers reminds me of a cassette I have by John Coleman, Ph.D. The Jew-Masonic 'think tanks' are creating many more such zombies with their drug cults. They will no doubt make much of this in their quest to confiscate all firearms.

Liberty Bell readers have long since made contingency plans, however.

Best regards
G.I., Illinois

Dear Landsmann: 30 July 1984

Liberal politicians are always babbling about the "poor" and how we must show compassion for them. Of course, by poor they mean non-white. No mercy is shown the white impoverished by taxes or the Jew financial system and the cost of supporting the black and Jewish parasites. From the TV you would think the average white man makes about $50,000. The official figure is that whites over 18 make about $17,600. The poorer whites are being forced to compete against black and spic labor, the middle class is being taxed to death and the upper class and professionals are being squeezed out by niggers hired via 'affirmative action' (against whites) and by Jews who fasten their bloodsucking grip on all the well-paying professions and turn them into rackets. In the last decade, millions of whites have been reduced to poverty, thrown into jail, become paupers, drunkards, dopeheads, or suicides because of the economic pressure of supporting the parasites who are destroying us. Most of these white have been helpless and just lain down like sick dogs and taken it without knowing what to do. But there have been a few exceptions. One was Gordon Kahl who quit paying taxes, went to jail and was eventually murdered by police. But he first killed 3 policemen and wounded two. Another case was that of a farmer and his son who were thrown off their farm by a usuror bank. When the father found out he was being black-balled by the bank so that he couldn't get any loans to start another farm, he ambushed and killed the two bank officers responsible for the fore-closure. Now we have another such case in the recent 'MacDonalds mas-sacre.' The press has not covered it well but I finally pieced the story together. The man responsible lost his job in Ohio because of the industrial collapse engineered by the Jewsh usurors. Unable to find any work, the house he had worked half his life to earn was foreclosed on by the banks. Moving to San Diego, he got a pretty good job as a welder at a company building nuclear power plants only to be laid off by the campaign against nuclear power the Jews have been running. As anyone who is married knows, financial problems lead to marital problems. Finally things got too much for the man and he snapped.

Most whites faced with this kind of situation drift into drink or drugs or kill themselves. But he did something the Jews fear more. He killed 21 people in an explosion of rage against the system that was destroying him. The media have been careful to play down the reasons for his action. To the public, the story is that his reasons are inexplicable and unknowable. A lot of media sympathy is spent gushing over the victims. They claim the one lesson to be learned from the massacre is more gun control to disarm the whites. I can see the Jew/Liberal mind working here. Jews, spics, and niggers have a (well-deserved) contempt for white Liberals. The steely-eyed white man with outrage in his heart and a gun in his hand is a figure that makes him shudder. They would have much preferred for the white man to kill himself or lay down and die quietly. His action raised the spectre of what will happen if the millions of desperate whites who are being de-stroyed by the system find out who their tormenters are and act against them with a similar explosion of rage.

All in all, I can't find myself disapproving of the MacDonalds massacre. I wish his aim had been better directed at the guilty; however, I noticed from photos that about 3/4 of the victims were spics, so his aim wasn't so bad after all. All in all, the MacDonalds massacre has performed a service for our race. I wish that a lot more white men would take some such action rather than dying like sheep. Even more, I wish they would direct their anger at the guilty, with intelligence, as Kahl or the farmer did. The coming depression collapse will unleash enormous amounts of anger and outrage from the white population. It should be the job of those who know who the guilty are to direct this rage against them. The explosion of rage that led to the MacDonalds massacre is a far healthier reaction for our race than the usual passive despair. I just hope that it will be better directed in the future.

Yours truly,
R.S., New York State

Dear Mr. Dietz: 5 August 1984

Bo Lee Layton wrote of your dilemma in his last letter. I am enclosing a check which I hope can be of some help. Not much, but something... I spent so much time and energy to educate the SITizens that I sacrificed the good years only to incur the enmity of the saps who are boob-tube-o-lated and who would lynch me for my efforts to save our Republic. I know you are aware of this phenomenon and most likely have experienced far worse situations than I have. You certainly sacrificed a fortune. But, I fully expect that by this time next year, most 'comfortable' and well-to-do persons will be in need of diapers. We should buy stock in the manu-facturers of Pampers.

I subscribe to the ADL BULLETIN, and in a past issue they 'honored' you and stated you were an "ex-Nazi." Congratulations! However, with the Zionist power it bodes ill since so few Americans will stand up to them. At least Jesse Jackson and Minister Farrakhan do and I admire them for that, especially Farrakhan. I see him as a future potent obstacle to Zionist plans. I really do. It should be encouraged.

I'd love to meet you and If I ever come your way, I'll most certainly stop in. I was 65 in June, so I have peaked and only the Lord knows how much longer I'll be on the firing line. A lot of damned good patriots have passed on and we need persons who KNOW THE FACTS and who can be counted on when the time comes that our viewpoints can be expressed. That is the great fear of the Zionists for they know that the people, if sufficiently informed, will react against them. But their treachery in having laws passed and applying financial and terrorist pressure to eliminate the knowledgeable intensifies with this fear and it will eventually cause enough anger so that when the facts are widely known, there will be a situation similar to Germany's awakening. Of course, we have an 'ethnic' problem, what with the burgeoning black situation as well as the Latins and Asians, that Germany did not have. And divisive issues like ERA, etc., are always stirred up by the same destroyers to keep us at each others' throats to divide us.

My best to you, my friend. Keep the faith and chin up!

Dear George: 11 August 1984

Hope this finds all well there. I am about the same here. Since I wrote you last, I finally saw the parole board but the results were as expected: I was denied, so I'll be here another year. The prosecuting attorney sent in a 7-page letter protesting my release because I was "a racist Nazi." With the exception of that, there isn't much new here... My best to all there and keep up the good work.

Dear George: 15 August 1984

When I enlisted in the Air Force, I raised my right hand and repeated "...and protect my country from foes both foreign and domestic." They should add, "...except if our domestic enemies are Jews or Niggers because that would be racism!"

It seems that when I try to convert a new body to our ideals, I am confronted with the same two plastic phrases: (1) "That is just one man's OPINION" (2) "What can one man do?" To the first phrase, the difference between opinion and fact is equal to the difference between the Grand Canyon and a creek. What can one man do?—Lead other men!

Gentlemen: 28 August 1984

I have been mailing the 'Realities' pamphlet, a resume of Zionist crimes, and a National Vanguard leaflet about more marines dying in Israel, to numerous Universities and junior collegess all over the country. I have also prepared a mailing when the colleges open; 100 percent coverage for Pennsylvania, Ohio, Illinois, Minnesota, and California. All of the above weights 1 ounce and is mailable for 20 cents. If you could interest some groups from different states to mail to their colleges, I can't help but believe that it might have some effect.

According to Article 3, Sec. 3 of the U.S. Constitution, anyone who adheres to the enemy of America is guilty of treason. Wasn't Bolshevist Russia our declared enemy in 1940 when F.D.R. 'adhered' to the enemy by helping Russia defeat Germany? F.D.R., in my opinion, was a traitor who created our present powerful enemy. And why is President Reagan throwing a few bones to white Americans and going pellmell after the minority groups that are flooding into the country. I ask this question in hundreds of cards mailed around the country.

Sincerely,

O.L.B., California

Dear Mr. Dietz: 5 September 1984

I received my July 84 Liberty Bell yesterday and found it, as usual, of great interest. The Letters to the Editor are, to me, very interesting due to the exchange of ideas therein. But the letters regarding various religions are disturbing to me in that they tend to ignore the fact that all religions are personal beliefs, that all religions are and must be personal. These letters about various religions seem to claim that all White folk should or must follow THEIR religious creeds/dogmas, etc. Such statements decrying other religions and suggesting apostasy leads to divisiveness which our alien internationalist enemies have exploited, are now exploiting to divide and conquer our superior WhiteRace to extinction.

It was not by chance that our White Racist Founding Fathers recognized religions as personal, and that religions must be prevented from dividing our White peoples, White societies, White Race. All intelligent, knowledgeable White people today know that Nature's (Gods, Allahs, Odins—call it what you will) natural Laws of genetics and eugenics create the races and each person thereof to be unique, special, different and UNEQUAL. Every White person is an UNEQUAL individual who interprets everything differently. But all White people are 'Kinsmen' in that they all have the White Race's genetic heritage which they can and do procreate in their progeny. And if White people do not mate together, there will be NO next generations of White people; if there is no next generation of White people, then they are extinct.

It is also obvious to intelligent, knowledgeable White people that the White Race is under attack, in a total war for its survival, and it is losing because of its religions, its fifth column and trojan horse of alien internationalists, and because of its ignorance of history and the sciences of genetics and eugenics. In a total war of survival of our White Race...all White people have one mandatory duty: to assure the survival of the White Race. If our religions, or our individual Rights, do not recognize this fact, then we White people are unfit to survive in this world that is based upon the survival of the fittest, and we will not survive.

Being each an UNEQUAL individual, our White people WILL have different beliefs and ideas, and thence their religions must be personal. But they all are White people who depend upon the White Race's heritage and culture for their survival. So long as our unequal White people demand to be free as sovereign individuals with equal rights, they will have different religions or none. But every White people's religion MUST be White Racist and propound White Racism if the White people and their glorious heritage and culture are to survive. Thence it is the duty of every White person and their religions to unite with the other White people with other religions, or without any religion, for the survival of the White Race. No divisiveness can be tolerated by White people on the necessity for White Racism in White societies if they are to survive. I support every White Racist of any religion, or none, as I can. Our White people's goal and duty is first to the survival of our White Race, then to the survival of our White societies, then to the survival of our families, and then to the survival of self.

Dear Editor: 11 September 1984

It amuses me to read articles and letters from people claiming that Whites are the world's most intelligent and creative people on earth. Would we have all our problems if we were not stupid? Would we have soldiers guarding borders all around the world while millions of aliens invade the United States? Would we support leaders who allow such things? Would we tolerate a usurous banking gang with its roots in England's and other European Central Banks? Would we fight a war in Europe, give the victory and a big slice of Europe to the Soviets, and then admire the traitor that accomplished this betrayal? So the Japanese were semi-savages three centuries ago. So were the Europeans. Europe has had its tribal wars for thousands of years, different small nations led by a half-witted elite of nobles and kings. Let's look at ourselves!

Dear Editor: 15 September 1984

In response to Dr. Charles Weber's request in the 8/84 issue (p. iv), could you please refer to him my request that he undertake as his next translation the article on the 'ascendancy of Jews in the literary life' of Weimar Germany which he refers to? And while at it, could you also convey to him my appreciation of these efforts on his part (for which I very much doubt he shall receive any national awards for translating the articles!)

The article on Weimar literary activities will surely have many important parallels to the contemporary 'American' literary scene, which, as the late Truman Capote once pointed out, is so heavily influenced by the "New York Jewish literary mafia." This is the crowd which has made a nincompoop like Norman Mailer into an 'American literary titan.' Under its aegis, American literature, much like America itself, has become a madhouse of minority racism, Holocaustery, and quasi-pornographic sexual indecencies. It is a 'literature' born out of an ancient hatred for all national ideals, all heroism, all strength, and all nobility, and out of a perverse love of the decadent, the debased, the alien, the sexually obscene, the unfit, and the anti-national. It is the product of a shallow, cynical, rootless, and destructive brand of intellectualism. In its attempts at literary criticism, it offers up Marxist and Freudian analyses of Moby Dick!

Perhaps Dr. Weber's translation would shed some light on the Weimar era activities of this same crowd.

Yours faithfully,
T.U., New York State

Dear Editor: 15 September 1984

The comparative ease with which Jews found it possible to manipulate public opinion in most of Europe and the United States gave their Zionist leaders the idea that they could do so around the entire world. This absurd idea resulted in the creation of the State of Israel as a political center among hundreds of millions of hostile Moslems. Also, it resulted in the creation of the World Court and the United Nations, both now hostile to the Zionists. For a supposedly intelligent people, the Jews do not act the part. If they are looking for an Armageddon, they are going about it in the right way. The longer the firecracker condition prevails in the Mid East, the better informed the American people will become. Support for Israel in the near future will be impossible for a U.S. politician.

The letter by Carles Messick III (July) demonstrates an intolerance toward Odinism which is reminiscent of Christianity! Mr. Hand's reply was much more logical. Since both movements are inchoate at this time, we should concentrate our energies at destroying the source of White Man's misery—Christianity.

Might I suggest that an anthology of previously published articles, such as those on the enclosed list, be published in book form? Possibly entitle it 'The Hoax of the 20th Century.'

I enjoyed the August 84 LB and in particular the letters by R.S, New York (I hope someday to meet him) and I thank him for his insight into cancer-valuable info.

I wish to add fuel to his speculations about the upcoming war. USAA (the commissioned officers only) Insurance Company is sending out a pink letter with all proposals for insurance. The letter states that they will limit their liability to $25,000 for all policy holders in, on orders to, or traveling through Libya, Egypt, Chad, Israel, Lebanon, Iraq, Syria, Iran, Saudi-Arabia, etc. Considering its connections and the General Officer backgrounds of the Chief Executives, they obviously know something.

It's been a long time since we spoke. I just returned from a trip to see our good Friend Ernst [Zuendel] in Toronto. Enclosed is a photo of where the bomb tore his garage. You must have heard by now about the J.D.L.ers (Yodelers) planting a pipe bomb. I was there 10 days.

As far as Ernst is concerned, the trial date, January 7, is the beginning of the end of the 6 Million Myth in Canada! I believe that nowhere in the world is anyone closer to bring it about at this time. But the Yids wound up NOT WANTING this trial after all...

Please take care and may we not rest until the fight is over or over for us.

Dear George: 23 September 1984

Enclosed $17., please send me "The Myth of the 20th Century" by Rosenberg. I have learned by now that every book on your list is worth reading and that I can buy a title sight unseen and know I will get something out of it.

Robert Ringer has just come out with an interesting book called, tongue in cheek, "How You can Find Happiness During the Collapse of Western Civilization." Though written in a jocular way, the book is dead serious. Its level is about where I was in 1979 when I found out about the Jew and Race. Ringer realizes that our civilization is collapsing and blames this to a large extent on what he calls the "voting class." He goes through the entire book without ever revealing that the latter are mostly non-white. The simple truth is that blacks and mullatos cannot maintain a civilization created by whites and that the civilization must crumble in direct proportion to the shrinkage of the white population. The cities now are virtually 3rd world ratholes thanks to government policy. Of course, Ringer writes mainly for money and he would be unable to publish commercially if he dared mention the racial problem.

Ringer is also anti-government to the point of telling people to arm against it, but he never mentions it is Jew-run from top to bottom. Again, that is on the list of censored topics.

I found other aspects of his philosophy primitive as well. It's not that he is wrong, there are simply things he does not know of or take into consideration which modify his conclusions. He follows the ideas of Ayn Rand to a large degree and, as a businessman, hates government extortion and meddling. Experience with our Jewish government has convinced him that governments are evil, as ours certainly is. The point is, after reading Yockey, you realize how primitive this view is. Ayn Rand's idea of hiding in a remote valley is a counsel of despair and defeat. Further, Yockey points out that a weak government is a luxury only nations without powerful external enemies can indulge in. America had Mexico and Canada for enemies, Germany had France and Russia. We had a few hundred thousand Indians while Russia had 20 million Mongols. Naturally, those countries will have much more powerful and militaristic governments than we do!

The main point is that Ringer's book has valuable information and reaches millions of people. All these have now reached the point I and my friends were at before we realized the Jewish and racial problems. This is their next step and they are now ready for it. This promises an order of magnitude increase in the national consciousness of the Jewish problem.

The onrushing depression will help. It looks like the dollar collapse is finally here. With it the myth that inflation has somehow abated will be laid to rest.

Ringer made a comment that remains in my mind: "Anyone who lives in a big city is sentencing himself to a life of voluntary poverty." This rings true when I compare rents and house prices here and where you are. I hope to be able to visit your area later on this year. Naturally I will call you before coming down to see if you will be free.

Best wishes,
R.S., New York State

Dear Mr. Dietz: 28 September 1984

The article in the August 84 Bell entitled "Racial Origin and Earliest Racial History of the Hebrews," by Eugen Fischer, and translated by Dr. Charles E. Weber, is a very welcome entree to the L.B. series on the Jewish Race. I for one appreciate true and honest scholarship, and distain that variety of invictive and pejorative yellow journalism which assumes an anti-Semitic posture but in so writing assumes a very Jewish posture in the way they treat their subject. I don't like slurs, although slurs are probably deserved by the Jews. I prefer straight forward facts that yield more light on the subject and less heat. I think the only heat that is warranted is the heat of physical pressure upon them. That shall come about only when people are convinced of the truth of our claims. To gain such confidence means that we must do the work of impartial genius, all for the sake of veracity and total worth of our work.

Also, I think that Fischer's book is very dated. Most Christian and Jewish researchers omit or obscure some of the most recent and obvious archaeological finds which yield light on this subject. For some time now I have wanted to write a pamphlet on a recent dig at Tell Mardikh in Syria which, rather than corroborating some of the stories of the Unholy Bible, bring almost everything into question about the history of the Jews and their use of a fabricated history. Briefly stated, the dig was made in the 70s by Professor Matthae and Pettinato, both from Rome, who were hot on the trail of the ancient site of the kingdom of Ebla. Ebla was all but forgotten by most archaeologists and antiquarians and some thought that the place did not exist. Like Troy, it was buried and dismissed by the experts as a mere myth to tease the mind until it was discovered by Heinrich Schliemann. Pettinato and Matthae were in a sense a new Heinrich Schliemann in the Mid East. Tell Mardikh was Ebla, the place only hitherto mentioned in old clay tablets and annals of Assyria and Babylonia. But, what had they really discovered? Rather than making a simple find which would prove its existence, and thereby secondarily also prove the reliability of the ancient texts which mentioned Ebla, the two professors in 1975 unearthed the main library of the city. It turned out to be a goldmine of information on the subjects of the Unholy Bible. Briefly stated, once again, out of about ten thousand tablets discovered, and some of these soon translated, it appeared that the Eblaites worshipped Jah as one of their main gods, existed as an ancient form of banking system with many detailed financial records of debtors and lenders, etc., used names which are popular in the Old Testament, such as David, Saul, Abraham, and others. Also several of the names of patriarchs in the book of Genesis appear, only not as personal names but the names of surrounding suburbs and colonial settlements. But, the really big bust was the fact that this city of Ebla was destroyed by King Naram Sin of Assyria around 2100 B.C. It was thriving at its highest at about 2500 B.C. How could this be? Most scholars are wont to update the history of the Hebrew nation to more recent times. Abraham is given a date as late as 1600 B.C. How can we account for the vast difference in the time scale of the Old Testament and the archaeological record? There are two or three ways this can be understood. Firstly, Hebrews were first known to infiltrate Palestine and Eypt as early as the 2nd millenium B.C. but did not subvert the latter until the 15th and 16th dynasties, when the capital was moved from Thebes to Tanis. This is known as the Hyksos period, or the Hebrew period. They, the Hebrews, had been conquered by Naram Sin in 2100 B.C. and became wanderers and semi-nomads entering and exiting many countries until they took the rule of Egypt around 160 B.C. These Hyksos rulers destroyed all the existing historical records of the Egyptians and made subsequent research very difficult for the archaeologist. But the basic picture emerges as it is described almost accurately in the 47th chapter of Genesis (called the Communist takeover of Egypt under Joseph). Thus we have a very scanty, obscured and distorted picture of Hebrew history in the Bible. Names of men and places sometimes refer to other things than what they at first seem to be on the face of it. There seems to be a kind of allegorizing tendency there, but, even more significant is the effort of the biblical storyteller to include the experience of a whole tribe of people (Hebrew) under the eponym of a single man's name, like Israel, Isaac, Abraham. The finished product of the book of Genesis is that of a reduction of history on a rather large scale, in which Hebrews, who on the average are always entering a country, and then having to leave it again, are made to look like the events in the life of one singular patriarch instead of the experience of a whole tribe.

What Ebla proves is that Hebrews existed before the Biblical Abraham; that they were a financial and mercantile mini-empire in the middle of the third millenium B.C., but earned the wrath of at least one more-powerful neighbor, Assyria, which destroyed Hebrew political power and unity. The Hebrews went underground politically. They formed the Religion of Abraham (father of nations, or dictator of nations), and some others at a later date modified this religion to Isaac (laughter, connoting Hebrew obnoxiousness and disrespect for their host in Egypt and Canaan). Then they progressed to Jacob (supplanter, or disinheritor) when they planned their takeover of Egypt. Much more can be said of these eponyms and how they are to be role-played out as tribal, rather than personal, history in Genesis. But, there is a good example of the eponymous usage of two tribal names in Genesis 34. In this chapter, two Hebrew teenagers destroy the whole city of Shechem, a village of several thousand inhabitants. They take all the women and children as possessions, along with cattle and livestock. They destroy the dwellings and kill all the male population. Certainly the work of Jews, but not of two Jewish teenage boys. This is a model of the eponym in action. The tribe is reduced in literature to the story of a man and his family so that the evil of the race is minimized into a microcosm of a few immoral acts within the family. To treat the stories in Genesis in this fashion enables us to bring distorted and confused Bible history into line with the real facts of history. Unfortunately, the Tell Mardikh discovery is now under wraps by the government of Syria. It appears that certain Jewish writers, like Yoni Jacov, are using this find to validate historically Israel's claim on the Golan Heights. Also, Syria is afraid of other claims that are being made on the whole region around Tell Mardikh itself as being original Israeli property. Now only Syria will permit its men of science to investigate the site and make translations of these tablets. In conclusion, there is one verse in the Old Testament which is probably accurate in a very historical sense. It is Deuteronomy 26:5: "And you shall make response before the Lord your God, 'A wandering Aramean (Syrian) was my father; and he went down to Egypt and sojourned there...' "

Questions will be answered.

Dear Landsmann: 13 October 1984

...The economic recovery is doing so well that I just got laid off my 2nd job this year. Studying the production figures in various magazines I read, I find that real production is only up slightly since 1982. Indeed, considering the consumption of capital and infrastructure that has not been replaced and the industries shut down, actual US wealth has fallen about 6-7% in the last two years. We have survived without a major collapse because:

1. The Jew banks created more credit allowing people and companies to borrow more and stave off bankruptcy at the cost of getting deeper into debt and paying more usury.

2. The US has systematically squeezed the entire world for capital. Last year alone some $300 billion in flight capital flowed into America. All this is BORROWED money. Woe for the day when we have to pay it back! A day which will occur the moment the dollar begins to fall.

3. By overvaluing the dollar against other currencies and squeezing them for debt payments, the banks have forced other nations to sell to the US below cost in order to get dollars for interest payments. This flow of cheap goods has kept our inflation down at the cost of destroying US industries unable to compete with the dumped foreign goods.

This whole swindle is about to end. The collapse of American industry and farming and the bankruptcy of most foreign countries has now reached the point where they are unable to even make interest payments any longer, revealing the bankruptcy of the whole system. Three of the top 10 commercial banks and the top S & L's have now collapsed and the rest are not far behind. Only massive inflation can now avert the collapse. But, if the Jews try that, there will be a massive run on the US dollar and a collapse of its value. It now appears this long delayed collapse will take place before year's end. The government's game plan seems to be a repudiation of the dollar overseas and the issuance of a new currency. This will open the way to the final hyperinflation of the dollar...

Sincerely yours,
R.S., New York State

Dear George: 22 October 1984

I would like to suggest that on future printings of BOOKS FOR PATRIOTS, the more basic and essential books for understanding the Jewish conspiracy be printed in heavy type, and, of course, that an explanation for that be given on page two. This would be useful for newcomers to the knowledge of this organization, so that they can spend their first amounts of money the most efficient way.

I am listing below, by number, those which I think are the most important and basic books. You will probably add others and remove some from this list, since you can judge better than I can on this. Also, an explanation for the meaning of the asterisks on many of the titles should be printed right on the book list pamphlet, on page 2. And I think that the picture of 'Uncle Sam' should not be put on the cover of the book list. The government of this country, personified by 'Uncle Sam'' has been run by the Jews from the very beginning; the vast majority of the 'Founding Fathers' were Freemasons. And 'Sam' is a Jewish name (Samuel).

In loyalty to the White Race,
L.E., New York

[Just as soon as I find the time to get the 'Book List' into the computer the above suggestions will be taken into consideration. -Editor]

Dear Editor: 20 October 1984

People who talk about exterminating all Jews are silly. The average Jew is just as stupid as the average Christian. If the average Jew had any sense, he would not allow his Rabbis to keep him in perpetual trouble with their lunatic religious ideas. Christian prelates have done the same thing ever since Jesus was invented. It is the Rabbis and Zionists who should be done away with. Listening to Zionists has caused a lot of Jews to set up a state in Palestine where they face almost certain destruction. And Christians are financing their efforts and creating hundreds of millions of Moslem enemies and possibly World War Three.

Dear Mr. Dietz: 26 October 1984

I am sorry that it has been such a long time since I last wrote you. I know that I should have kept in touch, but it is sometimes hard for me to gather my thoughts on paper. It all began last June 25th. This was the day I left my family and home in Chicago for the Marine Corps. I went to San Diego for 12 weeks of basic training in boot camp. The training was excellent and I graduated 14 September. To my surprise I discovered that the ratio of mud-people to White folk was a small 10%. Many of these White recruits were ignorant of the problems facing our people today and would not stand to reason. This, I concluded, was the result of the nation- or world-wide program of Jewish mind control through the Jew communications networks. They force-feed their lies to millions of our people every year. Throughout the world they are destroying our people's will to live. We must destroy this germ, now. Who's to say which is the right or wrong way to put an end to the chaos which surrounds us?

Sometimes I feel helpless against our overwhelming Jewish foe. It comforts me, however, to know that there are people like yourself on my side.

Please continue to send my Liberty Bells to my Chicago address. I would appreciate to hear from you or anybody from Liberty Bell Publications who wishes to write me at the following address: PVT. A.J. Strauss, 352-58-2984, MVOC-3, MTSCo.-MCSSS-MCB, Camp Lejeune NC 28542-5050.

Dear Landsmann: 27 October 1984

...How pitiful to hear of your plan to cease publication. Alas, your readers are among the poor, me included. The rich are either the dependents and co-workers of the Jews or are afraid to attract attention to themselves. Most Americans are simply demoralized cattle. As long as things are still going well for themselves, that is all they care about. Hitler, at least, had something to work with. He had the potential support of the Army, the nobility, the old judiciary, and part of the industrialists. The Jews were also clearly identified with the foreign enemy as authors of the general misery. Plus, the German people were nationalists and part of an ancient culture. In America there is nothing. The police and Army are Jew-run from the top down and rotted throughout. The courts and government are Jew organs as are most industrialists. There is no nobility, and the leadership is Jew-owned and drug rotted. The American people are demoralized cattle and mullatoized to an extent that Germany never was.

Despite all this, the Jews will eventually destroy this nation as they have so many others. From that will come the reaction that will expel and destroy them. Too bad it must come to that first. It is too bad now to save America. When H-bombs fall and the economy collapses, and the colored hordes come swarming out to loot and kill the remaining whites, the current Liberal lunacy will die an overdue death in the struggle for survival. In those terrible days, the remaining whites will not turn to women, lawyers and Liberals for leadership but to powerful white men, warriors like Miles Standish, James Siever, Bedford Forrest, or Patton. Faced with hideous reality, there will be no evasion into Liberal lunacy. As in Russia, a healthy white nation will grow around a core of leaders who know how to maintain order. The racial problem will be primary from the start. We must make sure that they are aware of the Jewish problem as well.

This nation has been on a course for disaster since at least 1960, or even earlier, for that matter. But is it any injustice that the JewSA is doomed? It would be an affront to justice if it survived and prospered after what it has done under Jew rule!

It is fasciniating to read Rosenberg's 'The Myth of the 20th Century.'' He makes clear many things I have been groping toward. His comment that a world wide racial awakening is taking place as a reaction to the materialism of the 18th and 19th centuries makes clear what is happening. Every race in the world is feeling its racial stirrings and is instinctively combatting the still dominant white race. Only the whites are in a stupor, thanks to Jew rule. Thus, we lose ground constantly. The Jew policy everywhere is the status quo. They don't want change. They had it made in the 19th century and want it to continue. Of course, their own policies make that impossible. By ruinig the economy and undermining the US they have made economic collapse and war inevitable. What is clear is that the belated collapse of the Jews' 19th century rule, enforced on the world by the Jews via the US, will awaken the white race to the need for racial survival. That will mean our racial awakening as well. There is nothing like the threat of death to dispel illusions of safety and comfort and 'peace.'

Rosenberg's section on the cities is amazing as well. It ties right in with my own thoughts. He shows that the gigantic cities are destructive to the race, wasteful in resources and deathtraps in war. The steady movement of whites out of the cities and coloreds and Jews moving in has been a steady factor for the last 50 years. The best whites are moving out. The much despised survivalists are abandoning the cities and suburbs alike while the Jews cling to them. Rosenberg commented, in the 1930s, that skyscrapers are madness in present day realities. And so they are. But the Jews cling to their gigantic cities as they have since Babylon. Their sysem demands cities. They are not comfortable anywhere else. Their vile corruption will not work in small towns. Thus, they are where Russian H-bombs will vaporize them or their beloved niggers will eat them alive when the welfare checks stop coming.

It is hard to predict the exact time of the final disaster. I am amazed that we have lasted this long! It is now clear that the final crisis has already broken out. Two times this year the US has trembled on the brink of nuclear war. A third crisis is now approaching before year's end. If we weather that, there will be another and another until something breaks. The final financial crisis began with the failure of the Continental Illinois Bank on May 10, 1984. Right now the financial rulers are trying to postpone the crisis to early 1985! They have given up on averting it. We are living on borrowed time now. Look around you. It is the end of an era. And about time too! A more ignoble and vile nation never existed than Jew America. To paraphrase Robert Ringer: "If God doesn't destroy America, he ought to apologize to Sodom and Gemorrah!"

Your truly,
R.S., New York State

Dear Mr. Dietz: 25 October 1984

I especially enjoyed Professor Oliver's spirited criticism of the Judaeo-Christian tradition. It's about time someone mentioned the 'Original Church of Latter-Day Bastards' (Unitarians) in connection with the anomalous common coin.

Sincerely yours,
D.H., Ohio

Dear Mr. Dietz: 30 October 1984

I feel I must write a few words in response to the swash-buckling ignorant arrogance of J.P. (Canada) regarding a large portion of the Black race who find themselves living on this North American continent.

J.P's half-witted childish scene-making on a public bus can be equated with many such scenes I used to witness when living in the Los Angeles area. One in particular was a little old white-haired lady sitting in a parked car at the curb of a down town area and two teen-age Black girls with mentalities on the level of J.P's came up to her and screemed in hear ear, "White Bitch!" These teen-age Blacks, rather short on mental motion, were obviously carrying out their Jew instructions. When I run across the J.Ps of the White Race, I am convinced they too are carrying out their Jew instructions.

I have worked and had a great deal of association with a large number of Blacks who are as concerned about the welfare and survival of their race just as much as I am about mine. These Blacks also know who our mutual enemy is, which is more than the majority of the White race does. All of you out there acting like retarded children following the Jew line such as J.P., who alienated a bus load who probably found the Black to have more breeding than the smart ass White. I can tell you wind bags that ALL Blacks (except their own race traitors which they have just like we do!) loath and despise Jews with a passion that can't get worked up in a White. For J.P's education, the Black is not your enemy; a very large portion of them want no part of you; they have been trying since Abraham Lincoln's time to leave you to your own devices.

As for Jesse Jackson, I am sure he feels he is using the Jews until he can get into a position to get rid of them, lock, stock and barrel, just as Idi Amin did in Uganda. If Africa is ever to be free of Yids, I can tell you it won't be the lilly livered Whites who run them out, as one can see from what takes place in South Africa. However, when these Blacks clean house, they don't and won't stop to see your genealogy; anything with a White skin will go (even though Idi Amin recognized them in all colors they come in). I am not holding Idi Amin up as a hero by any means; but, he had enough sense to know the cause of his country's ills and took steps to eliminate them, and had the courage to do it. Is there one White-ruled country with a leader with enough guts to do this?

If you "nigger"-hating gas bags want to put your money where your big mouths are, there is an organization in the U.S. called The American Colonization Society, P.O. Box 8340, New Franfield CT 06810. These Blacks are attempting to put a bill through Congress to enable them to be repatriated to Africa; give them some support.

I wonder if brave J.P. ever goes up to a diamond-studded Jew in his Rolls Royce and says "Go back to Israel, Jew;" I doubt it!

Sincerely,
Mrs. J.F., Montana

Dear Editor: 30 October 1984

The monthly arrival of "Liberty Bell" never fails to be an exciting event in my life. I have often pondered George Dietz' statement of purpose: "It is, therefore, in the best tradition of America and free men everywhere that "Liberty Bell strives to give free reign to ideas, for it is ideas which rule the world and determine both the content and structure of culture."

Important questions are likely to be controversial questions. Even when ideas are published in the "Liberty Bell" with which I do not entirely agree, I appreciate the the sincerity of their authors and their ability to challenge me to examine my own ideas.

Now we all must rally to support George Dietz in continuing to publish the "Liberty Bell," whether as writers, subscribers or those who can afford financial contributions beyond the subscription fee. We must not allow this important light to be extinguished.

Dear Geoge: 2 November 1984

With deep regrets I read your latest letter of appeal and with even deeper regrets I am unable to send as much financial help as I would really like. However, I am sending a little something and will try to do so again next month. I am sure that there will also be book orders coming your way soon.

I really think we are going about achieving our goals in the wrong way.

As you mentioned in your appeal, we should all become Bible thumpers and watch the dollars come pouring in. Then while we beat our breasts and proclaim the magnificent Jewish god, we can slowly pervert the Scriptures and lead the sheep in any direction we wish. All this while we get fat on their generous donations motivated by love of a fictitious Jewish god.

...Must close for now. Hope we can get "Liberty Bell" through this crisis and, thanks for all the good work you have done, George!

Dear Landsmann: 3 November 1984

As you may have gathered, I am a student of military history. It is only with data from your books that I have begun to understand the reasons for many of the otherwise inexplicable events of WW II. For example: I had always wondere why the Britsh suddenly intervened in Greece in 1940. This strange action nearly cost them all the forces involved and led to their defeat by Rommel in Africa. Even more strange was Hitler's intervention in the area with 35 divisions thus delaying his Russian invasion by 5 [crucial] weeks. Why this reaction, I wondered? What could a few English divisions in Greece do to harm Germany? Why just leave them to be wasted there?

I now realize that the entire affair was a huge Jewish plot. At first they cared nothing for Greece. Only one brigade of British troops was sent there in November 1940, and then nothing for 4 months. Meanwhile, the defeat of the Italians, and plotting in Yugoslavia, opened a chance for a treacherous stroke so dear to Jewish hearts. The Yugoslavian government was overthrown in a coup allowing the installation of a Jewish flunky government. This now agreed to secretly declare war upon Germany, but they demanded to be supported by a major British force before doing so. This is the reason for the sudden dispatch of a division, an armored brigade, and 5 infantry brigades plus support units in March of 1941. Another two divisions and a brigade were due to be sent there but were held up by Rommel's sudden offensive. The plot was apparently for Yugoslavia to suddenly attack the Italians in Albania and provide a corridor for British troops right up to Austria. Supporting plots in Turkey, Bulgaria, and Romania were designed to involve this whole area in a bloc against Germany and open a southern route, via the Dardanelles, to Russia. The collapse of the Italian army in Albania, following on the disasters in Lybia and Ethiopia, would have cleared the way for a coup in Italy to overthrow Mussolini, as actually appened 2 years later. Churchill actually admits to part of this plot in his "World Crisis," volume 1. As usual, Hitler was well ahead of Churchill and the Jews and struck before they were ready. Yugoslavia and Greece, caught by surprise, collapsed at once. The British scuttled for the coast, as usual, leaving their allies in the lurch. To their amazement, they were followed to Crete by German paratroops, thus revealing their age old sea monopoly had been made obsolete by modern technology. Germany thus secured all the Balkans. All secret plots against them were aborted. The Russian flank was cleared and never menaced again, plus the route to Turkey was opened and the Russian route through Turkey was closed. On top of that, the prestige of England was weakened throughout the East leading to the moslem revolts in Iran, Irak and Egypt. It was the need to hold down the Arabs that consumed 660,000 British troops troughout the Mideast (compard to 110,000 Italians and 35,000 Germans). The cost was the 5 weeks delay in attacking Russia and the need to use many divisions to garrison Yugoslavia and Greece.

It is interesting to compare the war leadership of Hitler and the efficiency of the German forces with the leadership of Reagan and the JewS Army. The entire world knows that the U.S. is going to invade Nicaragua after the elections. Our mighty army had a hard job of it overrunning 800 Cubans on Grenada...

Sincerely,

R.S., New York State

Dear George: 10 November 1984

Please renew my subscription starting with the August issue, if possible. By the way, I took the advice of a letter to the Editor in Liberty Bell a few issues back, and cast my write-in vote for Rudolf Hess for President. When my brother heard what I had done, he told me (Reagan style), "There you go again, not voting for your President."

And, if all you people around the country are wondering what all the fuss is about in the N.C. Hunt-Helms Senate race that cost $25 million, well, we Tar Heels are equally bemused. Helms is said to be a war monger, a racist and anti-Semitic; a Neanderthal. He may well be a war monger, but a racist? His press spokesman during the campaign was a negro, and Helms himself has publicly and repeatedly distanced himself from those of us who may still be a little dubious about that princely breed. As for Helms' anti-Semitism, this stems from his one-time timid suggestion that just perhaps Uncle Sucker has tilted a bit too far in overt support of Isreael vis-a-vis the Arabs. Tilted? I ask you, George, if Helms is a dangerous, radical Right Winger, what does that make us? Anyway, here is my book order.

Sincerely,

T.T., North Carolina

Dear Editor: 17 November 1984

I would like to comment on the scholarly work of translation done by Dr. Charles E. Weber. I think that his efforts have been, and I hope continue to be, an inspiration to all of your readers, as they have been to me. Of course, he did not write the articles, but, these same articles, and many others like them, exist in Germany and are sitting on an obscure shelf somewhere gathering dust. When I was in Seminary I was amazed at the frequency at which German authors were quoted or referred to. The irony of which is that the same books were not yet translated into English. The reason for this is that there is not a very strong interest in continental scholarship generally. It appears to me that American religious faith does not take scholarship seriously, and also that it often doubts that a serious work of scholastics is revelant. Some of the more naive tend to regard all critical works of sholarship with distain. As if they were mere shams. They frequently suppose that no viable challenge to their faith exists in reality. Among some of my peers I found elements who tended to resist an education for fear of its effects. And I don't mean in the John Dewey sense. I mean that some people fear that they may need to change their ideas to meet the conditions of new knowledge.

When I think how the scholarship surrounding the Dead Sea Scrolls has been obfuscated and frustrated I am appalled. The popular opinion has it that all of the scrolls found at Qumran validate the Bible and prove its authenticity. Far from the truth, many of the Dead Sea Scrolls prove contrariwise, i.e., that the Bible is full of flaws, deviations, contradictions, additions and deletions, and obvious tampering. The scroll of Enoch has been for a number of years in the custody of one scholar who placed it on the back burner, so to speak. It is still there as far as I know. I cannot help but think that this neglect is criminal and part of a conspiracy of silence. It is the supposed respect covering these prostituted scholars which enables them to hold ancient books hostage for long periods of time so that no one gets a chance to see their contents. Another type of hiding or concealing scholarship is when a man's work receives short shrift in a major publication, which forces him, or her, to seek a less well-known publisher who does not have the circulation. An example would be a series of articles that have appeared from time to time in "Revue De Qumran." These articles, written by French and German authors, all deal with the subject of popular astrology in the Qumran Scrolls. From my own reading on this subject, and my occasional perusing of the copies I made, I have become convinced that the Israeli religion is a highly syncretized amalgam of bits and pieces of many religions. At the time of Christ, the Essene community practiced astrology on a regular basis and observed special times of the day and week, according to the position of the sun, the moon, and the planets. Th Essenes developed an elaborate eschatology based on astrology so as to predict the future of the great golden age. But, the point is that modern theologians of the Christian persuasion do not think that a religious Jew of the Bible period could be so pagan. And these facts are almost locked up and out of reach of the masses. For that matter, no one seems to care to broadcast facts like Christian Bible thumpers preach the message of "salvation" for sale at bargain prices through Jahweh & Clone Brokerage Co. So it is unlikely that we shall see any significant change in these sly underhanded practices.

In the meantime, I hope to see more of Dr. Weber's in print.

Hail Odin,
Ronald Hand

ABOUT THE AUTHOR: Dr. Revilo Pendleton Oliver, Professor of the Classics at the University of Illinois for 32 years, is a scholar of international distinction who has written articles in four languages for the most prestigious academic publications in the United States and Europe.

During World War II, Dr. Oliver was Director of Research in a highly secret agency of the War Department, and was cited for outstanding service to his country.

One of the very few academicians who has been outspoken in his opposition to the progressive defacement of our civilization, Dr. Oliver has long insisted that the fate of his countrymen hangs on their willingness to subordinate their doctrinal differences to the tough but idealistic solidarity which is the prerequisite of a Majority resurgence.

SOME QUOTABLE QUOTES FROM AMERICA'S DECLINE

On the 18th Amendment (Prohibition): "Very few Americans were sufficiently sane to perceive that they had repudiated the American conception of government and had replaced it with the legal principle of the 'dictatorship of the proletariat,' which was the theoretical justification of the Jews' revolution in Russia."

FREEDOM OF SPEECH—FREEDOM OF THOUGHT
FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION

The editor-publisher of Liberty Bell does not necessarily agree with each and every article in this magazine, nor does he subscribe to all conclusions arrived at by various writers; however, he does endeavor to permit the exposure of ideas suppressed by the controlled news media of this country.

It is, therefore, in the best tradition of America and of free men everywhere that Liberty Bell strives to give free reign to ideas, for ultimately it is ideas which rule the world and determine both the content and structure of culture.

We believe that we can and will change our society for the better. We declare our long-held view that no institution or government created by men, for men, is inviolable, incorruptible, and not subject to evolution, change or replacement by the will of the people.

To this we dedicate our lives and our work. No effort will be spared and no idea will be allowed to go unexpressed if we think it will benefit the Thinking People, not only of America, but the entire world.

Ecologists, as they now call themselves, have long been concerned over the chemical pollution of land, air, and water in industrial nations and the ever accelerated depletion of natural resources throughout the entire globe. Aside from some shameless exploitation of this concern for political and subversive purposes, the ecologists' fears for the future are justified, and one could wish that they dared say frankly that a principal cause of what they deplore is simply the overpopulation of this planet as a whole and of countries such as the United States in particular. If the world is not to become eventually uninhabitable, an intelligent race, interested in its own survival, must find a way to arrest the noisome pollution of its environment by the fantastic proliferation of anthropoid refuse within its own borders and in territories that its own people could advantageously colonize.

That problem, posed by an undeniable fact, is grim indeed, and every possible solution of it is certain to be highly unpleasant and even horrible, but it is one that intelligent men will face rationally. It is, of course, entirely beyond the comprehension of persons whose minds have been hebetated by prolonged use of ideological narcotics, Christianity, "Liberalism," and similar forms of childish sentimentality.

* * *

A recent flurry of concern was caused by the unverified report that a very low form of organic life had been detected in the soil of Mars, which induced unjustified speculation that Mars may once have been an inhabited planet on which all complex forms of life had been destroyed by a progressive desiccation caused by the consumption of such plants as the forests on which the habitability of the earth depends. And although attention was then focused on the rapid destruction of the great rain forests of the Amazon to clear land and build towns for irremediably inferior and useless species of bipeds, the depletion of other forests was, of course, relevant.

One is saddened by the waste of trees to produce paper that will be covered with drivel and the verbalized nonsense that gives the thoughtless the illusion that they are thinking. Two examples of such waste have just been scattered around this country by the "German Information Center" in New York, the propaganda agency of the disreputable gang that now governs Germany. But there is truth in the aphorism that there is no book from which a critical reader cannot learn something. Whether that something is worth the time it takes to read the book is, naturally, a quite different matter.

Common Values, Common Cause: German Statesmen in the United States, American Statesmen in Germany, 1953-1983, is, as one would expect, a maladorous mass of the gobbledegook that politicians in a "democracy" utter as naturally as locusts stridulate, and, except for a few geographical terms, the 202 pages of "statements and speeches" might have been productions of the speech-writers in the White House. It is adorned with pictures that show German scoundrels conferring with American scoundrels. It would not be right to say that the various Chancellors and Presidents are plotting together, because all the scheming has been done for them by higher powers, but, to judge from the pictures, they have a good time exchanging off-color jokes and winks.

If a diligent reader were to sort out and examine every bit of the verbal garbage about "partnership for peace," "commitment to democratic ideals," "cooperation for progress," and the like, he might be able to find some traces of the constant deterioration of Germany from the time of Adenauer to the time of Kohl. Each puppet has represented something a little worse than did his predecessor.

Indefatigable optimists, who hoped that Helmut Kohl might mark the beginning of some slight amelioration of conditions in Germany, should have learned from that individual's conduct during the visit of the leading South-African scoundrel, Pieter Botha, to Germany, as reported in the official Week in Germany for 8 June. With the insolent vulgarity of "do-gooders" and their Puritanic itch to meddle in other people's business, Kohl demanded the abolition of apartheid in South Africa and hastening of the glorious day when the savages there will start exterminating white men. His Foreign Minister, Genscher by name, carried on the work of insulting South Africans and our race in general by yapping for "independence" for the sub-humans who infest the deserts of what he called "Namibia," i.e., South West Africa. Needless to say, Kohl and Botha winked at each other as they went through their act, and chuckled as their infamy was covered by turning loose hordes of presumably German zombies, who howled with indignation because Botha, supposedly the representative of a white nation, had been allowed to visit the ruins of Germany. But the episode of the visit made it more clear than ever that Kohl and Botha are both puppets that are manipulated in a single Puppenspielerei.

The volume of printed tripe, however, will remind some of us of the cautious hopes we entertained in Adenauer's time. He was, so far as was known, a German, although he was doubtless supervised by the Jewess to whom he was married, and he was obviously in a position that was extremely difficult and, if he was an honest man, heart-breaking. So far as one could judge from visits to Germany during those years, he did his best, within the limits of his authority, to give the conquered nation hope for its future in the part of the dismembered country that was under his jurisdiction. And he certainly exercised some restraint on the ferocity of the Jewish conquerors to an extent that became obvious only in later régimes, when the parasite race began more boldly to display its unappeasable hatred of civilized mankind. He also presided over the "economic miracle" of German recovery from the devastation and slaughter wrought by the Jews' janissaries in the Suicide of Europe. That, to be sure, was a great achievement, but one that was made possible by the innate character of the Germans who survived the great catastrophe and belonged to a generation that had not had its brains addled by American barbarians, officially called "educators," who zealously undertook the work of sabotaging the minds of German children. It was not so much of a "miracle" as it appeared to Americans, who had already been trained to regard work as a hardship to be avoided except when it is a dire necessity and proof that one is "underprivileged."

We, who know what conspiracies accomplish on every scale from the boodle that is normal in even a small town to the world-wide operations of the innately conspiratorial race, are perhaps excessively inclined to suspect that subtle and long-term planning contrived events that greatly further the work of our enemies, whereas in reality all that may be involved is their proficiency in exploiting every opportunity for depredation that chance offers them, just as pickpockets take every opportunity to snatch wallets surreptitiously. We must be wary, therefore, and not leap to a conclusion when we observe that Adenauer's "economic miracle," by exploiting the superiority of German industry, created a shortage of labor, which led to the importation of swarms of incompatible aliens, chiefly mongrels and other dregs from the biological cesspools of Asia Minor,* who, with their often even more mongrel offspring, now clutter up Germany, where the industrial boom has been ended by the growing superiority of Japan. The offspring of the refuse have for years polluted the German schools, to which they were foolishly admitted, and in some places they were actually so numerous that German children became a minority, while German children everywhere, like children in the United States, were exposed to corrupting contact with lower forms of human life. Now some Germans are trying to hire the creatures to go home, while feeble-minded Germans talk about making citizens of some of the scum, and the Genscher mentioned above officially yelled for the "social integration" of the refuse as a "top priority" of his government, so that German taxpayers will be forced to finance the increasing pollution of their country, while they also support the two and two-thirds millions of Germans who cannot find work because their places have been taken by the imported riff-raff, which numbered 4,600,000 in 1982 and was increasing at the rate of 650,000 a year.

In his treasonable talk about "integrating" the "minorities" in Germany, Genscher merely repeated what was said by Helmut Schmidt, when he was the Flügelmann called Chancellor in 1982 and jabbered about his "long-term goal" of "integrating" the parasitic enemies "permanently into the mainstream of society." If Germany were still a nation, the problem of the "minorities" could be solved very quickly, given the well-known efficiency of the German railroads, and Herren Schmidt, Kohl,

* In 1982, when there were only 4,600,000 of the imported aliens in Germany, by far the largest number were classified as "Turks" which means only that they came from the part of Asia Minor that is under Turkish government. So far as I know, no attempt has been made to determine their racial composition, and we must rely on the impressions of Germans and visitors to Germany who have observed the aliens whom they encountered or saw in action. That they are mostly dregs from the mongrel population of the territory from which they come is shown by the efforts made by the Turkish government to prevent their return to Turkey. Germany is to be made what the United States so happily became, a dumping ground for the world's racial garbage.

But Germany is not a nation, and so long as her territory is ruled by the shabbat goyim in Bonn, the dwindling population of Germans will have to walk through streets that are filthy with walking garbage. So now you see clearly the result of Adenauer's "economic miracle." And you have before you a question of historical causality that it behooves you to ponder carefully. When Germany was permitted to make the economic recovery that amazed the world, did the Jews permit and foster that recovery for the specific purpose of producing the result that has now occurred? Or did they permit the hated Aryans a measure of economic prosperity only so that they could extort from them forty billion dollars as "reparations" for their fictitious Holohoax, and only later discover how the influx of foreign "workers" could be used to hasten the final liquidation of the Aryans in Germany and thus leave God's Race free to start in earnest on the Aryans in other parts of the world?

How much was forethought and long-range planning by the enemies of mankind and how much was only their opportunism, ever alert for a chance to plunder today with no thought of the morrow? He who can feel certain of his answer to that question will be, as the French say, bien fine.

The Federal Republic of Germany in the 1980s is another bundle of buncombe, consisting of the lucubrations of four "experts," one of whom, Robert Gerald Livingston, who now adorns the John Hopkins University, edited the whole. I need not tell you that expert Szabo, who is the Professor of National Security in a mare's nest called The National Defense University in the District of Corruption, assures you that Kohl is regarded by "analysts" as a great conservative, just like Mog Thatcher and Ronnie Reagan. All that reminds me of blatteration by a "political scientist" I heard when I was a youngster: he "analysed" what he called "the great climacteric" in the Soviet, when that "genial Liberal, Trotsky" was overcome and expelled by the "reactionary conservatism" of Stalin.

Szabo is cuter, however, when he assures us that "The 'Americanization' of West Germany represents a Westernization of German life, with the result that West Germany is a completely Western country for the first time in German history." If you didn't gag on that one, try this really cute twist: "Reinhard Lettau's pamphlet, US=Täglicher Faschismus and Ernest Nolte's comparison of Vietnam with Auschwitz were, as the historian [sic!] Hans Gatzke had written, examples of attempts which were motivated unconsciously by the hope of mitigating Germany's own past crimes.' By bringing America down to the level of Nazi Germany, many Germans could relieve some of their own guilt."

That reminds one, of course, that the shameless little hirelings who now govern Germany are determined to rub the Jews' excrement in the face of every Aryan. In Germany today, the Jews do not even need to use their own terrorists, as they still do in the United States, where they totally destroyed the Institute for Historical Review in Torrance, California, in the early morning of the Fourth of July, a date selected to show their contempt for their American curs. In Germany, the Jews let the German police do their work for them in terrorist raids on individuals and publishers suspected of having books that displease Yahweh's Chosen Bandits by failing to endorse their Big Lies, especially their Holohoax.

It would require too much space even to list the outrages against civilization perpetrated by the pirates of Bonn, but the measure of German degradation is shown by the action of the University of Göttingen, once a respected institution of higher learning, when it "revoked" the doctoral degree of Dr. Wilhelm Stäglich, who offended God's Race by publishing a veracious account of what actually happened at the Auschwitz that Szabo mentioned (doubtless with a smirk) above.

Now we should clearly understand what that implies. For writing a truthful book, Dr. Stäglich was forced from the office of Judge in Hamburg, which he had held for twenty years. That, of course, was within the powers of an uncivilized government. The German police raided the offices of the publisher of Dr. Stäglich's Der Auschwitz Mythos and destroyed all copies of the book; that was within their power, just as they could have murdered the publisher and his staff. But what the academic rabbits in the University of Göttingen attempted was something no human being could do. A learned degree, an earned doctorate, is a record of academic achievement and, unless it was demonstrably obtained by fraud, cannot be revoked, anymore than the Jews, much as they would like to do so, can revoke the crossing of the Atlantic by Lindbergh in 1927. The contemptible shysters of Göttingen knew that, but they had simply lost all respect for facts. One can only wonder that they did not think of revoking Dr. Stäglich's birth-certificate. That would have enabled their Professor of Demography, if they have one, to prove conclusively that Dr. Stäglich never existed and therefore that the offending book could never have been published, so reports of it must be the work of 'Neo-Nazi' plotters, who should be crucified for spreading such false reports. That would have been a really neat job and might have earned for them the highest academic honor in their conception, that of kissing a Jew's godly buttocks.

If you read the German press—no, what I really mean is the newspapers that are printed in the German language in the territory ruled by Bonn, newspapers generally owned by the international parasites or their stooges, which gleefully report the crimes against civilization committed by the Jews' barbarian mercenaries who are the government in Bonn, you will soon come to take the motto nil admirari and you will wonder at nothing they may do, however outrageous or absurd.

In the August issue of Instauration, a well-known American conservative of some academic standing, who hides his identity under the pseudonym "Cholly Bilderberger," gives a circumstantial report of a case which, he says, is now in the German courts. According to Bilderberger, two Kikesses who were lunching in a restaurant in Stuttgart told each other what blessings their race had bestowed on the Semites of Palestine by grabbing their country. They saw a young German at a neighboring table, a man named Oberkirchen, raise his right eyebrow a distance said to be between five and seven millimeters, i.e., approximately between three-sixteenths and nine thirty-seconds of an inch. Now raising an eyebrow is a gesture that indicates irony, and if Oberkirchen was ironic, that meant he was guilty of the crime of doubting something said by one of God's Master Race. Oberkirchen was tried for "anti-Semitism" and sentenced to six years in prison, but, according to Bilderberger, has been granted bail while appealing his conviction to a higher court.

Now you and I will suspect Bilderberger of rather heavy-handed and somewhat juvenile satire. But, given the unspeakable nest of traitors in Bonn and the utter shamelessness with which they now operate, how the Hell can we be sure? If Bilderberger invented that story as a sarcastic parody, its very crudity makes him a failure as a satirist, but he may compensate himself with the mantle of prophecy: he merely described what Bonn is quite likely to do next year or the year thereafter or as soon as its owners get the idea.

In January 1981, Liberty Bell carried a leading article by Allan Callahan, "John Lennon: Good Riddance," describing the psychic devastation of Aryan youth wrought by the calculated menticidal filth purveyed over the "electric Jew," as television is aptly called, by the deceased degenerate and his fellow Beatles, on whom—I should say more correctly, on which civilized men had failed to step in time. Lennon, it will be remembered, was condignly eliminated by pesticidal bullets from a gun held by one of his innumerable victims.

No one should have been astonished by an article by Jack Martin of the Copley News Service, which appeared in many newspapers on 22 April 1984. It was only natural for Lennon to fancy himself another Jewish messiah, come to destroy civilization for the benefit of his malignant race. According to one of Lennon's confederates, quoted by Martin in the article, Lennon convened a special board meeting of his gang and announced, "I have something very important to tell you. I am Jesus Christ come back again. This is my thing."

Of course!

It is relevant and worth noting that the same issue of Liberty Bell contains a cogent article by an anonymous author, entitled "The Whiteman's Guidebook." Its grim realism is a lesson every man of our race needs to learn above all else. Look up that number of Liberty Bell in your file or obtain the offprint, which is still available from the publisher.

In 'Populism' and 'Elitism' (p. 25, n. 27), I commented briefly on the morbid envy, malice, and blood-lust that inspired Julia Ward Howe to write the words of "one of the most terrible songs ever sung," the perennially popular "Battle Hymn of the Republic," which, I hope, owes its popularity to the stirring music she filched when she set her words to it.

THE AGONY OF EASTERN EUROPE

After the Jews captured and occupied Russia in 1917-18 and, with the help of their Slavic dupes and subjects, extended their Bolshevik rule over the greater part of what had been the Russian Empire, their new barbarism was separated from Western Europe by a belt of six nations that had resisted attempts to occupy them. Finland, the three Baltic states (Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania), and Poland, which had been territories of the Russian Empire, won their independence. Romania, although its royal family was a branch of the Hohenzollern, had been an ally of Britain and France and so emerged from the First World War as one of the lesser victors.

Finland and the Baltic states established republican and more or less democratic governments. The three smaller nations were militarily helpless and placed their hopes for survival on fatuous dreams of enduring peace. Finland, with a population that was less than two-thirds as large as that of the three Baltic states, retained the native vigor that enabled it to astound the world by its brilliant defeat of the massed might of the whole Soviet Empire in 1939-40. It was also noteworthy as the only European nation which paid its debts to the United States. That, however, won it little sympathy from a nation that holds to the "democratic" principle that honesty, or a plausible simulation of it, is the best policy when it is good for business.

Poland became independent under a military dictatorship headed by General Pilsudski, who had led a revolt against Russia in 1914 and, with his Polish Legion, fought as an ally of Germany and Austria during the greater part of the First World War. Under Pilsudski, who knew that what counts in this world is force, not talk, Poland resisted Bolshevik efforts to invade her territory and the attempts of Wilson, Lloyd George, and Lord Curzon to sell her out to the Soviets at the "peace" conferences in Versailles in 1919. She decisively defeated the Jews' Bolshevik armies, which were under the overall command of Leib Bronstein, alias Trotsky. She regained her old frontiers with Russia and profited by the annexation of territory from Germany, Austria, and Lithuania.

Unlike the more northern nations, Poland was aware of the Jewish problem. The Poles had long resented their swarming parasites, whose depredations, by usury and corruption, were to some extent the cause of the distress of the peasantry and the demoralization of the middle and upper classes. But although the Jews in Poland wailed about the horrible persecution they suffer whenever their open or covert control is not absolute, the Polish government took no effective measures against the aliens, who, naturally, went to work at once to undermine the resurrected nation. The continued dominance of Jews in Polish commerce, industry, journalism, and education bottled up an explosive force that was released by the German conquest, during which the German army found itself in the position of having to protect Jews from retaliation by Poles of the middle and lower classes.

The Jews took their revenge, largely by exploiting and exacerbating the really insoluble problem of the "Polish corridor," which had been created at Versailles to maim Germany; the Poles naturally wanted to retain it, while Germany needed it to end the bisection of her territory. The Poles were thus cozened into accepting against Germany obviously nugatory guarantees by the Jews' stooges in Engand and, secretly, the United States, which were, of course, made to use Poland as a pretext for starting the Jewish war against Western Civilization in 1939, and indubitably made with the intention of betraying Poland as soon as the cat's paw had served its purpose.

Romania—the name is variously spelled in English, 'Roumania' and 'Rumania' being the most common forms, but I adopt here the spelling used in the book, The Anti-Humans, to which I shall shortly refer, which is also the spelling in Romanian. Romania, I say, as an adherent of the victorious Allies in the First World War, profited from a large accession of territory from the Hungarian part of the Austro-Hungarian Empire, and regained her province of Bessarabia, which had been ceded to Russia in 1878 and had revolted in 1917 to avert occupation by the Bolsheviks. (The name of the province was probal ly derived from that of the Bessarabs (Bazarabs), the princely family that ruled Walachia and Moldavia from the Fourteenth to the latter part of the Seventeenth Centuries; it has nothing to do with Arabia.)

Like Poland, Romania was deeply infested with Jews, and as soon as she was free of Turkish suzeranty, she tried to limit their control and exploitation of her people. She was several times forced to yield to strong intervention on behalf of the Jews by Great Britain, France, and Germany, and after 1918, Britain and France and the United States continued to champion the international race that was even then engaged in surreptitiously subjugating them.

In lands adjacent to the six buffer states, Judaeo-Bolshevik take-overs were narrowly averted after 1918: in Germany, by action of the veterans of her armies, who, however, permitted the establishment of the Weimar Republic, which was even more thoroughly honeycombed and controlled by the Jews than had been the monarchy under Wilhelm II. Their power was augmented by the rancerous hostility toward Germany of Britain, France, and, so long as Wilson was nominally President, the United States, and it was further consolidated by the economic chaos of the planned inflation, which made German currency valueless and enabled the Jews to

INTRODUCTION

The author of this book, a Romanian born in Greek territory, went to Romania for his university education and there became a member of the anti-Communist organization that flourished in that nation before and during the tragic and fratricidal Second World War. After the Bolshevik conquest of Romania, the Soviets, undoubtedly on orders from their masters, maintained a pretense that their occupation was merely temporary and further disguised their purposes by keeping on the throne as King of Romania the legitimate heir, a young man who was merely a puppet in their hands, but served to give to the people an illusive hope that Romania, though devastated and impoverished, might again become a free nation. In this hope, of course, the Romanians (like many other captive peoples) were encouraged by the governments of the Western nations that had won the military victory. Those governments, especially in the United States, maintained a pretense that they were not the servants of the Bolsheviks' masters, and, whenever they deemed it expedient to administer a little verbal paregoric to their own population, manufactured oratory about "defending the Free World" and "containing Communism." Americans, who were so charmed by those phrases that they did not notice what their own government was doing, cannot blame the Romanians (or the others) for having supposed that the official verbiage was an indication of national policy.

During the early years of Soviet occupation, therefore, the Romanian people entertained delusive hopes of eventual liberation, and the author of this book accordingly remained in Romania, his true fatherland. When he was at last arrested and imprisoned on suspicion of holding opinions inimical to Bolshevism, he, luckily, suffered only the excruciating tortures and hardships that are normal in what is called a Great Society. During his imprisonment, however, he had by chance an opportunity to learn of an experiment conducted on a select group of young men, and he had the acumen and patience to discover precisely what that experiment was. In this book he discloses for the first time the facts about a practice of which the peoples of the West still know nothing.

Bacu speaks only of what he knows — of what he witnessed with his own eyes and learned from the lips of men who had, despite themselves, been stripped of their humanity by an infallible scientific technique. His subject, therefore, is what the Bolsheviks secretly did to human beings in the prison at Pitesti* from 1949, when the experiment began, to 1951, when it seems to have been temporarily discontinued for some reason unknown.

What is described in these pages is not, however, an isolated event. Everyone who has had experience in military intelligence dealing with the Bolsheviks, or who has made a close study of information that is available from little known but authentic sources, will recognize in Bacu's pages a detailed description of a technique that the implacable enemies of mankind have used in many lands — perhaps in all countries that are officially Communist — for many years. The military intelligence agencies of Western nations have long known that a film demonstrating basic Pavlovian procedures was produced in Russia for training the Bolshevik secret police in 1928, and that the intelligence service of at least one nation succeeded in obtaining a copy of that film. After the notorious "purge" trials in Russia in 1936, when the masters of that country for some reason thought it advisable to exhibit to the world their ability to elicit the most incredible confessions from highly-placed and hardened Bolsheviks, intelligent observers naturally wondered what means could have been employed to produce such amazing results. Certain Western intelligence services sought to ascertain what means had been used, and eventually ascertained them in sufficient detail to show that the essentials of the method were precisely those that Mr. Bacu has described for us.

*With the exceptions of names of places (e.g., Bucharest) and persons (e.g., King Çarol) that have well-known English forms, Romanian proper names in this volume are given in their Romanian spelling, but without the diacritical marks that are used in Romanian. To avoid excessive expense in setting type, the use of these marks had to be restricted to actual quotations from Romanian and the index, to which the reader is referred for the exact form of names and titles requiring diacritics.

Military intelligence services naturally do not publish what they have learned by their secret and often perilous operations. Perhaps the first hint of the new method given to the general public came from George Orwell, who, in his 1984, portrayed the internationalists' Utopia and described some parts of the Communist technique, eliminating much that was too realistic for the taste of the reading public at that time, and replacing it with some episodes that could give a dramatic touch to what was in reality unspeakably vile and interminably monotonous. From 1984, however, an alert reader could have surmised much that was left unsaid. Since then, confirmatory evidence has become available from many sources, often fragmentary, for victims who have the stamina to tell what was done to them may nevertheless be understandably reticent about the worst aspects of the degradation imposed on them. They often censor their reports, to avoid harrowing unendurably the feelings of a humane reader or arousing total disbelief in tender-minded individuals from whom miseducation or innate sentimentality has concealed the ultimate horrors that lie hidden in creatures anatomically indistinguishable from human beings.

It almost never happens that we have a report from a survivor who at the time observed and interviewed the piteous victims of scientific bestiality, but, by a lucky chance, himself escaped the traumatic and mind-destroying shock of the torments they had undergone. That is what makes the book here translated from the Romanian unique. Bacu, to whom we owe our only authoritative report on the "Pitesti Phenomenon,"* was such a survivor.

In these pages, the reader will, for the first time, have at his disposal a fairly complete account of Bolshevik techniques of dehumanization, including some details, here mentioned as delicately as possible, of which we do not like to think. On these, Bacu does not insist, but you will see their import. One aspect concerning which he is silent is the sexual torments that form a standard part of the Bolshevik method. That is a large omission, but scholars who have had the fortitude to study the works of the celebrated "Marquis" de Sade† and his peers will readily perceive what was involved, while a specific report here would not only sicken most readers, but would prevent the distribution of this book through the United States mails.‡

This account, as I have said, deals with prisons in Romania, but the procedures used there have been and are used wherever

*[Mr. Heath wrote before the publication, late in 1969, of Dr. Ion Carja's Intoarcerea din Infern: amintirile unui detinut din inchisorile Romaniei bolsevizate (Madrid, Editura "Dacia"), a less detailed and explicit book in its description of the methods used. — Editor.]

†Donatien Alphonse Sade (1740-1814), to whom we owe the word sadism, was condemned to death by French courts for rape, murder by poison, and almost unbelievable torture of persons whom he kidnapped for that purpose, but the execution of the sentence was delayed by strange influences until he was liberated from prison by the French Revolution, during which he was honored and admired for his orations about "equality" and "brotherhood." Napoleon had him put in an insane asylum.

‡[Mr. Heath did not anticipate the full effect of decisions by the Supreme Court in Washington. The mails — and the newsstands and the public schools — are now open to every conceivable obscenity that the Jews in the United States find it profitable to publish. American publishers would probably enjoy the same immunity. — Editor.] the anti-humans have gained control. Identical procedures, together with such improvements as may have been suggested by their experiments and delights in Romania and other captive nations, will be used everywhere that their power is extended — including, of course, the United States, if that nation reaches the goal toward which it is presently moving at a vertiginous speed.

If the Americans succumb, they will remember this book as a prophecy that was completely fulfilled.

* * * * *

Apart from its value to Americans as foreshadowing things to come — certain to come, if the operations now in progress in the United States are carried to a successful conclusion — this book, although not couched in the technical terminology of psychology and psychiatry, should be of absorbing interest to everyone who, regardless of his political desires or prognostications, is sincerely interested in study of the human consciousness. It delineates the result of a crucial experiment that could not have been performed on Occidentals outside Soviet territory.

This book is a landmark in the broad field now generally designated by a term adapted from the Russian, psychopolitics.

Psychopolitics, a technology rather than a science since it is a practical application of data obtained by research in several sciences, may be defined as the art of controlling a nation by controlling the minds of the politically dominant majority of its population.

As a designation, psychopolitics is preferable to psychological warfare, which, though correct, is often taken to mean only operations directed against an enemy nation in the course of armed conflict. An excellent example of such propaganda attacks is President Wilson's famous "fourteen points," a group of fairy-stories about the peace and justice that the American Santa Claus had in his bag for good little boys and girls in Europe.* That high-sounding nonsense, which seemed plausible to persons addicted to idealistic fantasies and romantic fiction, is credited with having broken the will of the German people and induced them to surrender in 1918, after which, of course, it was easy to inflict on them suffering and starvation, Bolshevik outbreaks, and finally a monetary inflation so enormous that the international people then in Germany could "legally" appropriate most of the property in Germany that they had not already acquired, "legality" being observed by handing a few American dollars to famished and despairing Germans in return for land, buildings, or factories worth a thousand or a million times that price.

The "fourteen points" are justly regarded as one of the great triumphs of psychological warfare, but under modern conditions verbal bombardments, unlike artillery fire, cannot be aimed in one direction. Clever as the "fourteen points"

*It is probably true, but irrelevant, that Wilson half-believed himself when he spun his rhetorical fantasies; if he did, he was selected for the presidency precisely because he had that capacity for self-intoxication. Colonel Curtis B. Dall in his excellent book (F. D. R., Tulsa, Oklahoma, 1967, p. 137) reports that a prominent Jew, who had been an eye-witness and a kind of errand boy for his elders, boasted that in 1912, while Wilson was being trained for the presidency, Bernard Baruch, one of the great Jewish satraps stationed in the United States, used to lead Wilson about, "like a poodle on a string," and make him recite at Democratic Headquarters, while Baruch's fellows were egging on Theodore Roosevelt, whose candidacy, of course, ensured the popular votes for Wilson needed to make Wilson's appointment seem "democratic." We may be sure that Fido Wilson learned how to sit up and speak "new freedom," "make the world safe for democracy," and the like to the satisfaction of his masters and trainers before they had him perform before the footlights for the edification of Americans who imagined that they had selected (elected) him as their Leader. What Fido thinks while he responds to his cues and performs on the stage is of interest only to Fido's biographers and to psychologists.

were, we may legitimately wonder whether they would have made the German populace simper, if the populace had not been made susceptible to such gabble by the long and patient work of enemy aliens and their hirelings. What is more significant, substantially the same drivel was used, through Wilson and other mouthpieces, to pep up the American people and make them glad to furnish cannon fodder and money to "make the world safe for democracy" by devastating Europe in a "war to end wars." Wilson's ideological barrage was directed against Americans as much as against Germans, and we may wonder which nation, in the long run, was the more damaged.

Under modern conditions, psychological warfare is necessarily waged by a government against its own subjects and only secondarily against a foreign country, and the real beneficiary is invariably the international nation that controls both sides in the war that it has arranged for its own purposes. Only if we keep that fact in mind can we use the term psychological warfare correctly.

The tactical and strategic use of psychopolitics that the Soviet recommends to its allies and agents in the United States and other nations of the West yet uncaptured has been set forth in a remarkable document of which several copies appear to have reached the United States in the 1930's and later. It is most widely known and generally available as a booklet, Brain-washing, a Synthesis of the Russian Textbook on Psychopolitics, with an introduction by the Reverend Mr. Kenneth Goff, who was a member of the Communist Party in the United States from 1936 to 1939, and who had studied psychopolitics in a special Communist training school in Milwaukee. He states that the textbook, although issued for the use of English-speaking students in Lenin University, was also "used in America for the training of Communist cadre." An almost identical text was obtained from a confidential source in 1955 by a Professor Charles Stickley of New York City and published in that year.* A quite similar text, with only minor variations, came into the possession of Mr. Louis Zoul, the well-known author of Thugs and Communists, who published in The Soviet Inferno the greater part of the text divided into short sections, each of which is followed by copious corroboration from many sources, such as Anatoli Granovsky's I Was an NKVD Agent and Captain Robert A. Winston's The Pentagon Case, as well as letters from individuals who escaped from Cuba and other proletarian paradises.†

In the publications before Mr. Zoul's, the text is preceded by a commendatory address, evidently delivered at Lenin University by Lavrentiy Beria, the Jew who was Head Butcher in the Russia satrapy from 1938 — when he liquidated another Jew, the unspeakable Yezhov — until 1953, when he was in turn liquidated by another and even more ferocious Jew. The date of the oration is not given, but it would seem to be earlier than 1938 and to come from the time when Beria, in addition to feeding his blood-lust in Transcaucasia, was presiding over the manufacture of "historical studies" for the use of educated simpletons in the United States and elsewhere.

The "synthesis," which deals with the uses of psychopolitics rather than technical details, is obviously a condensation and omits most of the Marxist jargon with which admittedly Communist publications for the general public are almost invariably

*Mr. Goff's booklet is available from Soldiers of the Cross, $1.00. It is hard to tell which of the many other printings are still in print. One, containing an excellent introduction by Eric D. Butler, the well-known Australian publicist and editor of the New Times of Melbourne, was published by the Victorian League of Rights in Melbourne, Victoria, in 1956, then priced at 4/-. Another, with a foreword discussing the Soviet textbook as an obvious source of the "mental health" agitation in the United States, was published at about the same time by the American Public Relations Forum, Burbank, California; $1.00.

†The Soviet Inferno is published by Public Opinion, P. O. Box 4044, Long Island City, New York; 2d edition, 1967, $2.00.

larded.* It does, however, maintain the pretense, discarded only on the very highest levels, that psychological warfare against Western nations is directed from Moscow in the interests of Russia, and that the goal is the destruction of "capitalism." The text, though candid enough in treating the American people as enemies who must be destroyed or enslaved, was evidently designed for students who would forget that the Bolshevik capture of Russia was, of course, planned, financed, and directed by the Schiffs, Warburgs, and other wealthy Jews then living in the United States, who used their control over the governments of Germany, Great Britain, France, and the United States to ensure the Bolsheviks' triumph

*Marxist doctrine, though very useful for befuddling low-grade minds (which normally accept as profound any highly touted mass of intricate verbiage that they are unable to untangle), is believed only by the lowest ranks in the Communist hierarchy. As Duane Thorin perceived when he was a prisoner of the Communists in China (A Ride to Panmunjon, Chicago, 1956; p. 39): "Intellects that failed to see through the falsities of communism were so arrested that they were of only limited use in the totalitarian state." Persons with such inert minds are, naturally, not promoted to really responsible positions, no matter how hard they work or how sadistic they are. The policy of denying them promotion, which is certainly sound from an organizational standpoint, has led to some defections — which are of no real consequence, since the dullards do not know very much to reveal and they are easily replaced — although, where circumstances make it convenient, such tools are usually scrapped and liquidated when they begin to show discontent or claim promised rewards — as you will see in Chapter XXVIII of the present book. In the middle echelons of the organization, comparable to company-grade and field-grade officers in an army, the ambitious career men, naturally too intelligent to take their own propaganda seriously, are careful to use the official "ideology" even among themselves, partly for exercise in unremitting hypocrisy, and partly because they find Marxist dialectics a game as entertaining as chess. This sport, which may be played for high stakes, gives rise to clever syllogisms about "deviationism," "Stalinism," etc., which often trap the players. A good example may be found in the work of the Soviet physician, J. Landowsky, available in a Spanish translation, Sinfonia en rojo mayor (Madrid, 1949), of which one chapter has appeared in English, translated by George Knupffer, Red Symphony (London, 1968).

over the Russians.† The students were also expected to believe or pretend that "capitalism" included the international lords of finance, who have always found their Soviet colony an extremely profitable investment both in itself and as a means of exploiting their control over the money and banking of nations that are told that they are "free."

The text of Brain-washing‡ deals primarily with means of inducing insanity or idiocy in selected victims and is thus †Pretense is often dropped on the highest levels in talks with outsiders who are too well informed to be deceived. Prince Sturdza, in the authentic text of his memoirs (see the footnote on p. xxxv below) pp. 346 f., reports that when he came to New York in 1929 to obtain a loan for the Romanian government, he had to plead his country's case with the mighty Jewish lawyer who represented the great international banking houses of New York that had directed the Bolshevik seizure of Russia. This lawyer, known as Louis Marshall (a good Scottish name!), was, as Prince Sturdza says, "a second Bernard Baruch, less conspicuous but just as influential as the famous proconsul of Judaism (rather than Jewry) in the United States." (A proconsul, it will be remembered, was in the Roman Empire a governor sent into conquered territory to direct and supervise the native governments, which were allowed some autonomy in local matters that did not directly affect the interests of the Empire.) Marshall, like other great potentates, disdained to play a comedy with the suppliant; he took Prince Sturdza to the window, pointed at Wall Street, and said with lordly bluntness: "Look what we can do for a country we like; in Russia we have shown the world what we can do to a country and government we hate." Prince Sturdza adds, "Mr. Marshall, a few days later, reiterated that statement to Mr. Gheorghe Boncescu, the Financial Adviser of our [Romanian] Legation [in Washington]." Marshall naturally thought it best to profess a liking for the United States, a country which he and his fellows were about to afflict with an "economic depression," neatly arranged by a squeeze through their banks, to ruin influential natives, appropriate their property through foreclosures, and create the atmosphere of crisis and poverty that would facilitate the "election" of their talented servant, Franklin Roosevelt.

‡The word brain-washing is "an English translation of a Chinese euphemism," according to an article by Professor Revilo P. Oliver in the Birch magazine, American Opinion, November 1964, pp. 29-40. This article is an excellent discussion of the whole subject in brief compass, and gives some telling examples of tricks used in public schools and newspapers, but unfortunately fails to treat the strictly scientific (psychological) principles of propaganda, which can (and indeed must) be used to create "public opinion" directly relevant to the Pitesti experiment described in the present book. It is not, however, a complete treatise, even in outline, of psychopolitics; it barely alludes to very important weapons of psychological warfare. We cannot digress to discuss those weapons here, but no one should overlook the efficacy of scientifically produced propaganda* in the United States, where it is virtually a monopoly of the Jews, who, through advertising, can control the ever diminishing number of newspapers, periodicals, and broadcasting stations that they do not own outright. The best strategic propaganda is pro-in modern circumstances. The techniques of propaganda are no more "Communist" than rifles or airplanes; like all weapons, they work for whoever uses them, but do not hit the target, if they are not well aimed. In all wars, victory goes to the side that has the best weapons and uses them most expertly.

*The best technical treatises on the subject are in French: Jean Stoetzel, Esquisse d'une theorie des opinions (Paris, 1943), and Jacques Ellul, Propagandes (Paris, 1962). One cannot too much emphasize the fact, ignored by Professor Oliver and other American writers, that the techniques of propaganda, like the technology that makes possible television and computers, have no political or social content. The results that are obtained by means of a television station or a computer depend entirely on who uses it for what purpose. It is true that all technological advances place the people who are too stupid or lazy to use them at a hopeless disadvantage. A nation that neglected or refused to use airplanes, for example, would necessarily be defeated in war and disappear (except as a political fiction, if that suited the purpose of the conquerors), but that is not the fault of the Wright Brothers and General Sikorsky. The effectiveness of propaganda, in the strict sense of that word, depends largely upon what is technically called pre-propaganda, i.e., the ideas injected into the minds of children by their education. In the United States, the public schools were early converted into a very efficient machine to stunt the minds, pervert the morals, and destroy the self-respect of children, but the Americans seem pleased with the results, even after they have had a preliminary view of them in the unwashed derelicts, sexual perverts, drug-addicts, and crazed revolutionaries that their public schools are systematically producing at their expense. It seems likely, therefore, that the Americans no longer have either the intelligence or the will to resist their enemies, and will dumbly acquiesce in the fate prepared for them. Since the number of Americans who are still permitted to have liquid capital is very small, the ever increasing number of foresighted refugees who are fleeing from the United States to other countries is significant, though statistically small.

duced by manufacturing impassioned argument and violent controversy on "both sides" of a given question, so that the public accepts as unquestionable fact everything that "both sides" in the contrived controversy seem to take for granted.

Propaganda, if properly used, can always control a majority of a given population, but will always be ineffective against both the critical intelligence of independent minds and the faith of a religion that the propaganda line openly contradicts. Although the minds can usually be hired, and theologians can be employed to "modernize" the religion, there will always be troublesome exceptions, even after a century of strenuous effort. In the conquest of a country by psychopolitics, the exceptions must be put under physical restraint and either liquidated or made harmless imbeciles or, if possible, converted into useful zombies.

This is the problem with which the text of Brain-washing is principally concerned, and with particular reference to the United States, where naked terrorism through the government was impossible in the 1930's, and is not yet feasible, even today. The principles expounded in the text and the methods suggested are indisputably authentic: they are the standard Soviet application of the discoveries made in Russia, before the Bolshevik conquest, by Dr. Ivan Petrovich Pavlov, whose scientific talents the shrewd Bolsheviks were able to take over and put to their own use.† You will find the essentials stated in the text.

The "synthesis" of the textbook on psychopolitics recommends and prescribes for use against Americans a propaganda campaign for "mental health" to obtain from the stupid Americans acquiescence in legislation to authorize the "legal" kidnapping of troublesome Americans and their incarceration in prisons (to be called "hospitals") in which "trained psychiatrists" of alien origin and their brutish assistants can induce insanity, imbecility, or, if necessary, death by means of scientific tortures, especially "electric shock therapy" (which can be used to break the backbone), or mind-destroying drugs, such as the now famous L.S.D., which was only later produced by the Weizmann Laboratories in Israel and shipped to the United States for surreptitious sale to adolescents and children whose minds had been given a preliminary conditioning in the public schools.

In the 1930's, the "mental health" scheme would doubtless have seemed preposterous and ridiculous to the stolid and happy-go-lucky Americans, if they had heard of it. It has now, however, been almost completely implemented, and has already been used in a considerable number of cases, a few of which have attracted some little attention, especially that of the abduction of General Edwin A. Walker, which failed because he had prominent friends who acted before he could be destroyed, of Frank Britton, who had dared to criticize Jews and was effectively silenced, and of the journalist, Fred Seelig, who, through a miscalculation, was prematurely released and had time to narrate his experience in print before he died.* We may expect, however, that the procedure will be used with increasing frequency and less secrecy, and that soon it will be mere routine for Americans who make themselves obnoxious to their masters (for example, by claiming that the "United Nations" or the Federal Reserve System or the Marxist income tax is "un-Constitutional," or by pretending that God's People do not have a right to use lesser breeds for their own profit and fun) to be hauled to Springfield, Missouri, or some other equivalent of Pitesti on the western side of the Atlantic, and there, with "loving care," be restored to "mental health" as vertebrate vegetables.

*Frederick Seelig, Destroy the Accuser, with a foreword by Westbrook Pegler and a commentary by Dr. Revilo P. Oliver (Miami, Florida, Freedom Press, 1967). This book, which I have seen, has become unprocurable, and I do not have a copy at hand. The author is said to have died of heart failure in Valparaiso, Indiana, not long after his book was published, and a letter to the publisher was returned to me with the notation "unknown"! The book, as I remember, contained some details about the eagerness of the staff at Springfield to start torturing General Walker, who was kidnapped through the complicity of Federal judges (compare Judge Petrescu in Chapter XXVIII of the present book) while the author was a prisoner there.

Despite the panoply of refined techniques, such as surgical operations on the brain ("lobotomy"), excruciating electrical torments, and subtle drugs, it is noteworthy that even in the United States at the present time the favored procedure is to subject inconvenient Americans to a kind of physical degradation of the same kind as that used at Pitesti, though, for some reason, less intense and systematic. A typical case is that of the American journalist, who, having come upon evidence that compromised the nest of homosexual perverts in Washington, > was kidnapped by a U. S. Marshal and hustled to Springfield, Missouri, where he was stripped and thrust naked into a small cell, of which the floor and three sides were of rough concrete, while the fourth was a ponderous steel door. There was no furnishing of any kind in the cell, and only two openings, one a round hole in the floor leading to a sewer, and the other a ventilator, through which were sent blasts of frigid air alternating with shrill, deafening, cacophonous, and rhythmically disoriented "music," intended both to damage the auditory nerves and to make sure that the poor wretch in the cell could not possibly fall asleep as he stretched his naked body on the rough concrete. Naturally, the victim's skin, abraded by the concrete, soon developed open sores, and his despairing mind eventually took refuge in periods of total stupor that even the howling din coming through the ventilator could not break. After being deprived of food and water for three days and nights, the victim was forced to obtain them by crawling on his hands and knees in minimum time to a pot placed on the sill of the briefly opened door.*

*The unfortunate journalist was almost certainly Frederick Seelig, but, for reasons stated in the preceding note, I have had to quote

In the United States it has thus far been necessary to use a certain amount of discretion and pretense in the destruction of anti-Communist nuisances, but in Romania, after the completion of the take-over, more effective secrecy made precautions less necessary.

The Pitesti experiment dispensed with such complicated and expensive paraphernalia as electrical apparatus, brain surgeons, and specially prepared drugs. It used only the simplest tools, everywhere procurable: clubs, the bestiality of degenerates, the weakness of human nature when attacked by Pavlov's methods. The results of the experiment were, as you will see, impressive and appalling. They proved that no one could resist the techniques of the Anti-Humans, but whether the experiment was entirely a success is a question that must be left to your decision on the basis of your estimate of what the experimenters hoped to discover or prove, while a critique of their methodology must be left to the few Occidentals who have expert knowledge of psychobiological processes.

What no reader of this book can fail to perceive, if only for a moment before he tries to forget the "unthinkable," is the unspeakably vile and sadistic lusts of the contrivers of the experiment at Pitesti — appetites so foreign to everything that he regards as human that the creatures who are animated by them can be described only as the "enemies of mankind," or, concisely, as the Anti-Humans.

What is described in this book happened in Romania after the Bolsheviks discarded the pretense that they were tenderhearted humanitarians bringing "equality" and "civil rights" to the downtrodden victims of the wicked "Fascists" and "anti-Semites." Before and even after the Anti-Humans stopped from the article in American Opinion, November 1964, p. 31, mentioned above. The writer of that article, Professor Oliver, does not give the victim's name, but the circumstances make the identification certain. One wonders how (or why) Oliver's article was printed in a Birch publication.

dissembling, some Romanians were, by foresight or good luck, able to escape westward, and even to make their sufferings known, as Mr. Bacu has done in this book, to peoples not yet imprisoned.

When the United States has progressed to the point reached by Romania in 1948, there will be no place on earth to which Americans can flee, and there will be no one to hear their screams.

* * * * *

All that remains to be said to introduce Mr. Bacu's book to American readers can be expressed in a few pages giving such information about Romania as will enable Americans to appreciate the human drama — the pathos and the tragedy — of this narrative.

Romania was for centuries, even while it was under the comparatively mild and humane oppression of the Moslems, the easternmost land of the West. The nation was born of the Roman conquest of Dacia (101-106), and there Rome left an imprint that has thus far been indelible and a spiritual heritage that survives in the heart of the people.

The civilization of Romania was the civilization of the West. The names of men and places may be unfamiliar to your eyes, but the people you will recognize as your own kind and their thoughts will be the thoughts of the Christian West.

There is, however, one peculiarity of Romania that requires some preliminary explanation, for it is the very opposite of what contemporary experience in the United States — and, for that matter, in most Western nations to varying degrees — makes us take for granted.

The persons whom the Bolshevik beasts selected for dehumanization were a clearly defined group: university students. That was because in Romania, in sharp antithesis to what we see in the United States today, university students were a highly respected elite and included men who combined the vigor and ardor of youth with unsurpassed patriotism and a lucid conservatism, intellectual and religious.

This fact, which will seem so paradoxical to Americans today, was the result of two concurrent factors.

Romania was essentially a land of peasants with limited industrial and commercial classes. The four universities, at Iasi (founded by Prince Cuza in 1860), Bucharest (founded in 1864), Cluj (1872) and Cernauti (1875), each divided into several faculties (theology, philosophy, letters, science, law, and medicine), were open to all who had completed their studies in a lyceum (liceu, translated 'high school' in the present book). The lyceum had relatively high standards, requiring, for example, the learning of French and German as well as either Latin and Greek or English and Italian, and weeded out the intellectually incompetent.* Only a small fraction, therefore, of Romanian youth entered the universities, and consequently a considerable prestige was attached to the very word student (i.e. university student, since a pupil in a secondary school was an elev). It suggested a considerable intellectual ability and a serious purpose, for the students in Romanian universities were, for the most part, the children of hard-working peasants or of earnest professional men; the scions of the wealthy more often than not went abroad for their education.

*Romanian children began the formal study of their first foreign language, French, in the year corresponding to the fifth grade in American public schools. By the time that they reached the point that corresponds to the first year of high school in the United States, Romanian children were reading Cicero in Latin and mastering trigonometry. Such progress is, of course, merely normal in serious educational institutions. The public schools in the United States, on the other hand, are designed to blight native intelligence and produce a nation of nitwits that can be easily manipulated and fleeced by professional "educators" and other shysters.

To this fact we must add a second, that will be even more astonishing to the American reader. The Romanian universities were as much centers of ardent patriotism and conservatism as American colleges, in the period of 1920-50, were centers of internationalism and socialism. The prevailing atmosphere of staunch conservatism also distinguished Romanian universities from other European universities. For this there were several reasons.

Romania was essentially an agrarian country and a large percentage of the studenti had had closer contact with the realities of life than was usual in Germany and France. More important, Romania was a small nation with a clear consciousness of its national individuality as a Western nation, tracing its origins to the Roman conquest of Dacia, and encompassed by peoples of Byzantine, Slavic, or Oriental traditions. It had stubbornly maintained that consciousness through centuries of alien domination, attaining a precarious and transient independence in 1600, only to fall again under the rule of the Turks. After numerous interventions by Russia, the enemy of Turkey, and after many episodes of valiant resistance to both Russians and Turks, Romania, formed by the union of Wallachia and Moldavia, gained autonomy in 1859, but remained under the suzerainty of the Turkish Sultan, and did not become fully and formally independent until 1881. Independence so recently attained and constantly threatened remained in the Romanian mind the precious guerdon of nationality at a time when the larger nations of Europe were taking themselves and their prosperous perpetuity for granted.

Romania, moreover, had Russia on its eastern frontier — Russia which, in 1812, had seized and annexed Bessarabia, a region containing a large population of Romanian blood. After the International Conspiracy captured Russia in 1917, Romanians could not fail to know what the beasts did in Russia and especially in Bessarabia. Moreover, it was the Romanian army that in August 1919 occupied Budapest and freed Hungary from the unspeakable vermin led by Israel Cohen, alias Bela Kun. The Romanians knew what Bolshevism was, and whence it sprang. In the United States, separated from the reality by thousands of miles and an infected press, many stupid or cunning professors could gabble about a "noble experiment" and a "people's regime," but in Romania such nonsense, so utterly at variance with observed reality, was recognized as either asinine or criminal.

To these considerations must be added another equally important. Although, as was to be expected, Romanian universities naturally tended to imitate the far older and venerable universities of the great European powers, especially Germany and France, there was a significant difference that limited the more deleterious aspects of that influence. The faculties of Romanian universities, especially Iasi and Bucharest, were predominantly composed of Romanians, whereas, of course, elsewhere in Europe university teaching had been invaded by large contingents of the international people. Before the Treaty of Adrianople in 1829, the Jews, for the most part, had ignored Romania, an impoverished land under Turkish rule, and had by preference swarmed into nations where the prospects of easy pickings from the natives were far more attractive.* After 1829, hordes of Jews came over the borders, but, despite various efforts by France and Germany to procure for these intruders in Romania the privileged status they enjoyed elsewhere, Jews were, for all practical purposes, debarred from citizenship until 1923, when the Romanian government then in office yielded to the pressures of the "great powers".† It

*A concise account of this aspect of Romanian history will be found in the opening chapters of L'Envoye de l'Archange by the distinguished French authors, Jerome et Jean Tharaud (Paris, 1939).

†Strictly speaking, Romania, coerced by a scarcely veiled threat of invasion by Germany and Great Britain, in 1879 repealed the article in her constitution which, like the constitution of the State of Pennsylvania that was framed and adopted under the thus happened that in Romania, unlike France and Germany, the universities were still largely staffed by men who in mind and spirit belonged to the nation, and they were not dominated by an alien race whose members can, with the facility of chameleons, take on the color of whatever the environment in which they choose to reside. In Romanian universities, therefore, patriotism was intellectually respectable, and, on the whole, taken for granted until 1918.

After 1918, although faculties remained largely Romanian, the situation became confused. Some professors seem to have been either bemused by the glib patter of Marxism, a "doctrine" cleverly designed to addle mediocre brains that can be fascinated by pseudo-intellectual verbiage, or intimidated by the Bolsheviks' boast that they represent a mysterious but irresistible "wave of the future." Many others, perhaps fearing for their comfort or lives, concealed their real sentiments and leadership of Benjamin Franklin, restricted citizenship to Christians. After 1879, the legal privileges of citizenship were available to all Jews, provided that they either (a) had served in the armed forces of Romania or (b) applied for such rights and were found on investigation not to be guilty of political or moral subversion and corruption. Naturally, only a few thousand thus obtained the legal status of citizens, and it was not until 1923 they could all swarm into Romanian politics and begin to take over the country "legally" by manipulating greedy politicians. Everyone knows that the Jews are, as they themselves frankly boast, an international race or "peopledom" who never become in fact citizens of the nations in which they find it profitable to dwell. As Albert Einstein said, "There is no such thing as a German Jew, Russian Jew, or American Jew: there are only Jews." Hundreds of the most accomplished and intellectually prominent Jews throughout the world have frankly said the same thing, and all the admitted Zionists have proclaimed it year after year, but, unaccountably, the people of the Christian West perversely refuse to believe them — and then secretly complain to one another in private that Jews are not good Christians and not good Englishmen or Americans. Although Europeans do understand that a European who lives in China is not a Chinaman, most of them have a curious mania to pretend that a Jew who resides in Europe is a European — and even a mania to punish other Europeans who will not join in the absurd pretense. The Jews, whose leaders have told the truth often enough, can scarcely be blamed for taking advantage of the folly of the peoples whom they despise and exploit.

remained silent or took refuge in ambiguous pronouncements. A few, however, fearlessly maintained Romanian traditions and asserted their intellectual integrity. They provided the inspiration for the patriotic and conservative movements among the university students.

The reaction of the students was doubtless hastened by a simple sociological pressure. The Jews, although they were numerically only a small part of the population even after the great influx at the end of the World War, swarmed into the universities and began to jostle out the natives. According to the official statistics, for example, in the spring semester of 1920 at the University of Cernauti there were enrolled in the College of Philosophy 574 Jews and only 174 Romanians; in the College of Law, 547 Jews and 234 Romanians. At the University of Iasi 831 Jews were enrolled in the College of Medicine as against 556 Romanians, and in the College of Pharmacy, 229 Jews and 97 Romanians.* These are, of course, some of the most striking disproportions, but everyone will see why, especially in such academic institutions, young Romanians, finding themselves a minority amidst a throng of pushing, versipellous, and disputatious aliens, and doubtless also often finding themselves eclipsed scholastically by the mental agility and Oriental subtlety of the Protean race, should have turned ardently to patriotic movements.

There was a further development that will be even more astonishing to the American reader. It may be that before the First World War in Romania, a largely peasant nation but recently emancipated from Moslem control, Christianity retained a greater vigor and commanded a more general piety than in other countries of Europe, though it would be difficult to make an accurate comparison between Romania and, for example, Brittany, Bavaria, or Piedmont. Romanian universities were, of course, profoundly affected by the intellectual climate of the great European universities and necessarily reflected the dominant attitudes of thought, from German "idealism" to the "religion of humanity" preached by Auguste Comte in his more lucid intervals; from the stern pessimism of Schopenhauer to the graceful and universal irony of Anatole France. To a very large extent the intellectual life of Europe was dominated by the attitude that Christianity was an historical phenomenon characteristic of an age whose passing one might view with joy, indifference, or regret, but which, whether for better or worse, was passing ineluctably away: religion was a waning superstition that still had power only over the uneducated. These currents of European thought necessarily affected educated Romanians, who, as a matter of course, read and wrote French fluently and, in many cases, German also.

Romanians will, no doubt, variously estimate the direct effect on their intellectual life of the dire and immediate menace of Bolshevism in the period that followed the First World War. Certainly all intelligent Romanians could see that their enemies were anti-Christian — were in both word and deed frantic enemies of the Western World, whose culture had for fifteen centuries been specifically Christian, and whose nations had been so distinctively set apart from others by their religion that they had been little conscious of the underlying racial unity of the West. In the 1920's, it must be remembered, Bolshevik propaganda was stridently anti-Christian, denouncing religion as "the opiate of the people," signalizing its victories by massacring ecclesiastics, defiling shrines, and converting churches into stables or warehouses, and teaching militant atheism in its schools.* It was not until much later that the Bolsheviks could implement on any extensive scale their other and complementary technique of utilizing renegade ministers and priests to spread the germs of Bolshevism under the guise of a "social gospel" or "ecumenical Christianity." Until 1930, at least, the established Christian churches were almost universally regarded as a bulwark against the International Conspiracy. Furthermore, in 1919, the multitude of Jews residing in Romania, deeming a Bolshevik victory imminent, had prematurely and indiscreetly dropped their pretense and appeared openly as the instigators of "proletarian" riots and sabotage, and the suborners of violence and treason, not troubling to disguise their eager anticipation of a glorious butchery that would put the natives in their place. Thus the fundamental and necessary hostility between Christianity and the various doctrines of Judaism again made Christianity the symbol of Romanian nationalism as opposed to its foreign and domestic enemies.

*Hence the cliche, "atheistic Communism," that is still used in many conservative circles in the United States. To recapture the patriotic outlook of the 1920's, the reader will do well to turn to R. M. Whitney's fundamental Reds in America (New York, 1924), in which accurate analysis of Bolshevik plans (including the plans for the "Civil Riots" agitation of the 1960's) accompanies an implicit confidence that Christian Churches will remain Christian!

In these circumstances, it was only to be expected that Romanian patriotic societies would be specifically Christian, but some, I suspect, used Christianity primarily as a symbol of their purpose. The first of the patriotic organizations was the Guard of the National Conscience (Garda Constiintei Nationale), founded by Constantin Pancu, a simple steelworker whom his fellows elected their leader, primarily to expose the nonsense of the "proletarian" propaganda with which the Bolsheviks were trying to confuse and utilize Romanian laborers — for the invariable but concealed Bolshevik purpose of ultimately reducing them to brutalized slavery.

In 1923, the National Christian Defense League (Liga Apararii Nationale Crestine) was founded by one of Romania's most distinguished scholars, A. C. Cuza, Professor of Law in the University of Iasi, with the discreet support of the internationally known historian, Prof. Nicolae Iorga, who is, perhaps, best known in the United States for his History of the Byzantine Empire, which has appeared in several English editions.* A league headed by scholars of such eminence naturally had great prestige among university students and educated men in general and it became a force of very considerable political importance, particularly after it merged in 1935 with the political party headed by Octavian Goga, prominent poet, litterateur, and statesman. Although the National Christian Defense League sought the support of the sincerely religious, its inner direction was rationalistic, basing its avowed hostility to Jews and Bolsheviks on historical and scientific grounds. From all that I can learn, Professor Cuza's creed was essentially the elegant scepticism of Renan. Professor Iorga's historical works treat Christianity with a cold objectivity. And Octavian Goga, if correctly quoted by Jerome and Jean Tharaud, seems to have held at heart a view of Christianity similar to that set forth in Nietzsche's famous Genealogy of Morals.†

The greatest influence over the Romanian students at this juncture was undoubtedly exerted by Corneliu Z. Codreanu, the son of a teacher in a Moldavian secondary school. Born 13 September, 1899, he prepared himself in law at the University of Iasi, where he studied under Professor Cuza, and he later studied abroad in both Germany and France. A man of iron will, exalted faith, and ardent patriotism, Codreanu, after participating in the Guard of the National Conscience from its inception and in the National Christian Defense League, founded on 24 June, 1927 the Legion of Michael the Archangel (Legiunea Archangelului Mihail). The organization's

*Professor Iorga became Prime Minister of Romania for a time in 1931. An estimate of his conduct in office is beyond the scope of this notice. [His History of Roumania, translated by Joseph McCabe, was published in London in 1925. — Ed.] principles — an unlimited love of country, a code of personal honor and moral intransigence, the reciprocal loyalty of knighthood, and rigorous subordination of body to spirit — were all based by the founder on an absolute faith in Christ. The Legion was "indissolubly united under the aegis of God" and its members pledged themselves to sacrifice themselves without limit or reservation for God and Country. This was the movement that by its high and noble idealism attracted to itself all the young elite of the Romanian universities, won their unqualified allegiance, and largely dominated the thinking of even those who stood aloof or opposed it.

†This sufficiently explains why there could be no cooperation between the Christian Defense League and Codreanu's Legion of Michael the Archangel, and it is not necessary to endorse the suspicions of Professor Cuza expressed by Ion Mota in an essay, "Legiunea si L.A.N.C.", in the volume Corneliu Codreanu, prezent (Madrid, 1966).

This is why the Romanian university students were, in contrast to those of other Western nations, profoundly Christian. I have been assured by Romanians that in many cases the students' firm religious convictions were shaped not so much by their families or by their churches as by the inspiration of Codreanu and the rigid Christian discipline he imposed on all his followers. There can be no doubt but that, from a strictly religious point of view, Codreanu's movement represented the greatest and most intense revival of the Christian faith in any nation during the Twentieth Century. Its influence on the spiritual and intellectual life of the elite among young Romanians was enormous and transcendent. That is what makes the Legion unique among the nationalist movements of our age. The combination of ardent faith and intense nationalism produced a generation of heroes. The Legion, also known as the Iron Guard (Garda de Fier), sent an expeditionary force to Spain in 1936 to combat the international vermin there and earned the enduring gratitude of the Spanish people. And when the war with the Soviet began, the members of the Guard, taken from the prisons to which they had been sent by the Antonescu dictatorship in an effort to suppress their movement, formed the very flower of the Romanian army and were distinguished for their valor and devotion in all the actions of that war.

This is not the place to summarize, however briefly, the career of Codreanu* and the convulsed history of Romania after the precipitate and illegal return to that country of Prince Carol, a royal debauche who, after many offenses, had been disinherited and exiled by his own father. Carol, accompanied by a Jewish harlot to whom he was completely subservient, returned to Romania in 1930, dethroned his own son to reign in his stead, and, finding no other way to check the rising political power of the Iron Guard, overthrew the Constitution in 1938 and made himself dictator of Romania. Codreanu, arrested on patently false charges, was, together with thirteen of his lieutenants, taken from prison on the night of 29 November 1938 and, in the early hours of the next morning, murdered in the forest of Tancabesti at the orders of the royal degenerate.† Carol, with the support of the lords of

*For non-partisan and critical accounts of Codreanu's career, see Paul Guiraud, Codreanu et la Garde de Fer (Paris, 1940), and the distinctly unsympathetic work by the brothers Tharaud, L'Envoye de l'Archange, cited above. Brief appreciations by his followers will be found in Vasile Iasinschi's Facing the Truth (Madrid, 1966), and in two volumes of essays by various hands, Corneliu Z. Codreanu in perspectiva a douazeci de ani (Madrid, 1959) and Corneliu Codreanu, prezent (Madrid, 1966). On the significance of Codreanu and his movement in the history of Europe during the climacteric years that ended in what may have been the Suicide of the West, see the work of the distinguished diplomat and scholar, Prince Sturdza, cited below.

†The method of the murders was singular and remarkable. The fourteen men were taken in buses to the forest and there each of the men, who had been bound in an odd way, was strangled with a rope thrown over his head by a gendarme stationed behind him for that purpose. Then, to give some color to the official story that Codreanu and his ranking Legionaries had been "killed while trying to escape," each corpse was shot in the back several times before it was thrown into the waiting grave. Prince Sturdza, in the Romanian text of his memoirs (Madrid, 1966; pp. 133 f.), asks the inevitable question: "Let us ask ourselves why there was that resort to strangulation, a procedure that was awkward and complicated in the circumstances, instead of a bullet in the back of the head, the simple and usual method and the obvious one to have used, since an hour later, to simulate an escape, the lifeless bodies were riddled with bullets." (There is the further consideration that the bullet, unlike strangulation, would not have left the marks that were detected by autopsy international finance, ruled Romania by a combination of fraud and violence until September 1940, when the Iron Guard drove him and his Oriental leman from the country, and restored his son to the throne.

The gruesome murders in the dark forest of Tancabesti that night in November 1938 were one of the fateful and decisive events of modern history. King Carol, who gave the orders, himself acted on the orders of his masters, the hidden and malevolent powers that, through their puppets in the governments of Great Britain, France, and the United States, were relentlessly herding the peoples of the West toward the catastrophic and fatal war that Germany was trying so desperately to avert. Carol's owners were, of course, the powers that had installed the Bolsheviks in Russia twenty-one years earlier, and the destruction of the Iron Guard, the only organized and formidable anti-Bolshevik force in Romania, left Carol free to carry out (as he did less than two years later) the plan to surrender Romania's fortified border in Bessarabia to the Soviet and thus open to the Communist hordes the passes into the Balkans and southeastern Europe.

King Carol's commitment to subject Romania to the Soviet as soon as the projected war began was, of course, known to the French government and doubtless in other circles even before he gave the orders for the murders of Tancabesti, which thus changed the strategic balance of Europe and were a preliminary to the dire and appalling disaster that was in fact, as when, after the flight of Carol, the bodies were exhumed and the officers who had carried out the murders under orders testified to what they had done.) Prince Sturdza then points out that the elaborate and peculiar way in which the victims were strangled corresponds in every detail to the method by which Jews are instructed to kill their enemies in a passage of the Talmud that he quotes (p. 134). Needless to say, this part of Prince Sturdza's book, like many others, was omitted in the heavily censored English translation cited in our footnote below.

Prince Sturdza has so aptly termed it, the Suicide of Europe.* It may even have been the decisive turning-point.

No diplomat and statesman of the Western world was more farsighted and sagacious than Prince Michel Sturdza, whose long career as an ambassador in many capitals of the Western world and corresponding contacts in the highest circles of many governments gave him excellent sources of information, while his personal position during the European disaster enabled him to observe and judge with a dispassionate lucidity

*Prince Michel Sturdza wrote his brilliant analysis of the origin of the Second World War in French: La Bete sans nom — enquete sur les responsabilites (Copenhagen, 1944). Unfortunately he chose to publish his memoirs, which include a comprehensive study of the European catastrophe and are an absolutely indispensable source for all serious historians, in Romanian: Romania si sfarsitul Europei — amintiri din tara pierduta (Madrid & Rio de Janeiro, 1966). It is a misfortune that the observations of one of the wisest and most experienced diplomats of Europe — perhaps the only one who witnessed events from a peculiarly advantageous position, recorded them with philosophical detachment, and then was free to publish his book without being constrained by a need to apologize for himself or for a political party or government at the expense of historical truth — were written in a language that so few of our people can read. To make the work generally available, a wealthy American hired the John Birch Society to perform the technical work of supervising translation and printing and to distribute the book when it was published: The Suicide of Europe (Boston, 1968). The choice was unfortunate. The greater part of Prince Sturdza's book was accurately and even ably translated, although the material was drastically rearranged and often curtailed: for example, the concluding paragraphs of Prince Sturdza's text (p. 323 of the original) were reduced to a few lines and buried in a footnote at the bottom of page 23 of the English version. But the text was diligently censored to eliminate every statement, direct or indirect, that could offend the Birch Society's Jewish masters. A great many passages of historical importance were "lost" as the contents of the book were shuffled around, and in what was left, for example, the word evrei ("Jews") is almost invariably translated as "some people" or "certain individuals," wherever it could not conveniently be ignored. And, naturally, a long passage was interpolated to commend and advertise the Birch business. But even in this mutilated form, The Suicide of Europe is a very valuable book and must be recommended to everyone (except the few who can read the original) who wishes to understand the age in which we live.

that could scarcely have been attained by even the intelligence services of the great nations that were destroying one another in the interests of their common enemy. Honest historians must therefore accord great weight to Prince Sturdza's conclusion that:

> It was Codreanu's murder that prompted Hitler to a radical tactical change in his foreign policy — a change loaded with the most fateful consequences not only for Germany but for the entire world of Western Civilization ... Hitler made two speedy decisions: The first was of military character, the occupation of Czecho-Slovakia ... The second was a bold political decision ... he would negotiate an understanding and an economic arrangement with Soviet Russia.†

By this estimate, Corneliu Codreanu, although he could not have known or even imagined it, carried with him the destiny of generations then living and yet unborn, and the crowned hireling whose hand struck him down was, although his clotted mind could not have guessed it, one of the most pernicious traitors of all time. By any estimate, Codreanu was a great man.

The most eloquent attestation of the nobility of Codreanu's character and the purity of his religious faith is the deep ven-

†The Suicide of Europe, pp. 120-23; in the original, pp. 137 f. These two sudden shifts of policy made it seem to the rest of the world that Germany had acted in bad faith at Munich and that even its opposition to the Soviet was insincere; that certainly facilitated the work of the international lords who finally forced on the West the suicidal war which, as the British historian, H. R. Trevor-Roper candidly admits, "Hitler would have done anything to avoid." By far the most complete and accurate study of the complicated diplomatic manoeuvres and intrigues that were needed to start that war is the carefully documented treatise by Professor David L. Hoggan, which, since it has been mysteriously "delayed" by the American publisher who had it set in type many years ago, is thus far available only in the German translation: Der erzwungene Krieg (Tubingen, 1963). Much less complete, but valuable, are the late Professor Charles Callan Tansill's Back Door to War (Chicago, 1952) and Professor A. J. P. Taylor's The Origins of the Second World War (New York, 1962). The facts are indisputable, but many Americans believe that the devastation of Europe and the slaughter of millions of Europeans was admirable because it pleased Jews.

eration for him and loyalty to his memory felt by his surviving followers. Thirty years after his death, twenty years and more after failure and the loss of their country, they are exiles in foreign lands and menaced even there by the ubiquitous power of the anti-humans and the ever accelerated conquest of the Western world by its furtive enemies. But for their Captain and his vision they still feel the devotion that twenty-nine Romanian writers express in their contributions to the recent volume, Corneliu Codreanu, prezent.

The students of Romania, patriots and Christians, were selected by the anti-humans as victims of the process described in this book, not so much because they were the objects of the beasts' most venomous hatred, as because they provided material for an experiment that would confirm the universal validity of a technique that the world conquerors had elaborated long before and thus far used with uniform success. The anti-humans rightly judged that if the courageous and devoted youth of the Iron Guard, exalted by the most ardent Christian faith, could not resist the application of a fiendish science, no humans could ever resist.

That is what makes this narrative so tragic.

The Legion took its motto from Seneca: "He who is willing to die need never be a slave." Aye. But what of those who are not permitted to die?

FOR MY LEGIONARIES

The Legionary Movement in Romania, commonly known as the Iron Guard, —perhaps the oldest anti-Communist movement in the world, still alive—was founded by Corneliu Z. Codreanu in 1927. For My Legionaries (353 pp., pb., $8.00), Codreanu's stirring work, is a complete and authoritative account of the ideals and principles of the Legionary Movement which shaped the character of young Romanians before WW II. Control over the communications media and the normal channels of book distribution by our international enemies makes it impossible to reach the broad market this unique book deserves. We are certain that the rapidly deteriorating political conditions will preclude a second edition, and For My Legionaries will soon become a collector's item. This book also provides the 'missing pieces' of the drastically censored The Suicide of Europe by Prince D. Sturdza; the identity of those who masterminded Romania's takeover and who are now engaged in carrying out the same program in the U.S. will no longer be unkown to you. ("Solzhenitsyn would appear to have not the slightest inkling of who conquered HIS country!"—B.C.)

THE ANTI-HUMANS

by D. Bacu (307 pp., hb., $8.00), describes what was done to the young men whom Codreanu inspired, when, seven years after his brutal murder, Romania was delivered to the Bolsheviks. They were subjected to what is the most fully documented Pavlovian 'experiment' on a large number of human beings. It is likely that the same techniques were used on many American prisoners in Korea and Vietnam. The Anti-Humans is a well-written document of great historical and psychological importance. Reading it will be an emotional experience you will not forget. ("A sequel to Orwell's 1984"—R.S.H.; "A searing expose of red bestiality!"—Dr.A.J. App).

ABOUT THE AUTHOR: Dr. Revilo Pendleton Oliver, Professor of the Classics at the University of Illinois for 32 years, is a scholar of international distinction who has written articles in four languages for the most prestigious academic publications in the United States and Europe.

During World War II, Dr. Oliver was Director of Research in a highly secret agency of the War Department, and was cited for outstanding service to his country.

One of the very few academicians who has been outspoken in his opposition to the progressive defacement of our civilization, Dr. Oliver has long insisted that the fate of his countrymen hangs on their willingness to subordinate their doctrinal differences to the tough but idealistic solidarity which is the prerequisite of a Majority resurgence.

SOME QUOTABLE QUOTES FROM AMERICA'S DECLINE

On the 18th Amendment (Prohibition): "Very few Americans were sufficiently sane to perceive that they had repudiated the American conception of government and had replaced it with the legal principle of the 'dictatorship of the proletariat,' which was the theoretical justification of the Jews' revolution in Russia."

On Race: "We must further understand that all races naturally regard themselves as superior to all others. We think Congoids unintelligent, but they feel only contempt for a race so stupid or craven that it fawns on them, gives them votes, lavishly subsidizes them with its own earnings, and even oppresses its own people to curry their favor. We are a race as are the others. If we attribute to ourselves a superiority, intellectual, moral, or other, in terms of our own standards, we are simply indulging in a tautology. The only objective criterion of superiority, among human races as among all other species, is biological: the strong survive, the weak perish. The superior race of mankind today is the one that will emerge victorious—whether by its technology or its fecundity—from the proximate struggle for life on an overcrowded planet."

HERE IS A BOOK in lucid question/answer format that tackles virtually all the myths and distortions propagated by the "Holocaust" Establishment—a book for young and old alike.

- Presents ideas and information not found in other books in this field.
- Short, well-organized and up-to-date on the latest ideas and research.
- Suitable for the classroom as a counterbalance to "Holocaust" studies.
- Gives a historical background of the Jewish problem in Europe, examines the motivations of various groups with regard to the Extermination thesis, and introduces the reader to the more detailed literature on the subject.
- Written by a former professor with a Ph.D. in an historical discipline whose training as a linguist gave him access to literature in various languages, and whose U.S. military intelligence experience in WWII included his residence in Europe during 1945-48 with assignments involving him in preparations for the Nuremberg Trials.

In the classroom; in debates; for the novice revisionist, the inquisitive and skeptical—nothing could be as useful as Dr. Weber's The "Holocaust"—120 Questions and Answers. 120 questions that rouse thought. 120 fully-referenced answers that blow the lid off the blackout. A book of this scope and format has been needed for a long time. Here you have it: easy-to-read, written and priced for wide distribution—and an answer to today's obsession with Holocaustiana.

buy up for a trifle in sound money much of the property of the deliberately starved Germans. In Hungary, which had been made independent of Austria, the Jews carried out a revolution in conformity with their racial instincts, with results that are vividly described by Cecile Tormay, whose eye-witness report was translated into English as An Outlaw's Diary (London, Allan, 2 vols., 1923), which was reprinted in the United States as a paperback some years ago. The Jewish terror was suppressed by a Romanian army, which aided the Hungarians under Admiral Horthy to regain possession of their country. The great Admiral became regent of a kingdom in which he thought restoration of the Hapsburgs would be premature, but he took no effective action against the swarms of Jews, who became outspokenly "anti-Communist" after the failure of their kinsmen's reign of terror and remained deeply entrenched in all lucrative segments of Hungarian economy.

In the period between 1918 and 1939 there were in most European nations (including Britain) national movements, more or less effective, which sought to restrict the dominion which the Jews, under various guises, covertly exercised over the nation's internal and external affairs. There were only two which need be mentioned here.

In Germany, the genius of Adlf Hitler created, by a candid appeal to the healthy instincts of the Aryan population, the National Socialist Movement, which attained a bloodless triumph, made the nation independent, and gave it a prosperity and sane morality that excited the envy of less viril Aryans. So great were the racial energies thus released that Germany, with an area less than two-thirds that of Texas, and fantastically outnumbered by the muddle-headed Aryans whom the international race incited, together with virtually the rest of the world, to attack her, withstood and almost vanquished her crazened enemies and their masters by a national heroism unequalled in human history. Her tragic defeat in 1945 consummated the Suicide of Europe, which may prove to have been the suicide of Western Civilization and the race that created it.

In Romania, a movement to restore the country to Romanian control was led by another man of genius, Corneliu Zelea Codreanu, and is generally known as the Iron Guard, although, for the greater part of its existence, it was officially known as the Legion of St. Michael the Archangel. It failed to attain effective power, largely because the King of Romania, the degenerate Carol II, was a weak-minded puppet, easily manipulated by his Jewish concubine and her compatriots. It is always hazardous to speculate about what might have been, but it can be argued that if a large part of the Romanian people had not felt a sentimental loyalty to the dynasty under which Moldavia and Walachia had been really united to form an independent nation, Codreanu might have been able to seize power by a resolute action which would then have become feasible.

The two anti-Jewish movements differed fundamentally. Although the Hitlerian régime took no measures against the Christian cults in Germany and even tolerated subversive agitation by the professional holy men, its basis was a philosophical awareness of the crucial importance of biological science in human life and hence of the innate differences between races, with the underlying assumption that Aryans should in fact be governed by Aryans.

In Romania, Codreanu's Legion was overtly and explicitly Christian, and its opposition to Jewish dominance had a religious basis, the antithesis between Christianity and Judaism that is expressed in some parts of the "New Testament" and was elaborated by many Fathers of the Church before the fall of the Roman Empire.

One consequence of the disastrous victory of the Jews' subjects in Britain, France, the United States, and other lands was the occupation of Romania by the Soviets, to whom the Jews' stooges delivered a hegemony over the greater part of Europe. By some cautious preliminaries and subterfuges, the Jews, riding on the shoulders of their Slavic lackeys, returned to power in Romania and proceeded to take vengeance on their opponents. One example of their revenge on the survivors of Codreanu's Legion was the experiment in the alteration of human intelligence and behavior that was described by D. Bacu in a book of which an excellent English translation, The Anti-Humans, may be obtained from Liberty Bell Publications.

The translation is preceded by an introduction by Warren B. Heath, which is reprinted in this issue of Liberty Bell. □ first and the new editions of my Conspiracy or Degeneracy?, has sent me a photocopy of a column written by the last of our honest journalists, her friend, the late John J. Synon; and published in many of the newspapers that subscribed to his column. Unfortunately, she has lost her notation of the date on which it was published, but internal evidence indicates some time in 1971.

This column, which tells the simple truth about the song and the "hate-filled harridan" who wrote the words, should never be forgotten. It is reprinted below.

JULIA WARD HOWE'S BATTLE HYMN OF HATE

JOHN J. SYNON

Whenever I hear a Southern voice or a Southern band giving vent to that despicable Battle Hymn of the Republic I wince. And then I wonder. I wonder if the renderers are plain stupid or if they are maliciously anti-South.

That song is the most venomous ever written. The heart of it, if you will listen to its words, expresses the determination of its author to destroy Southern people. And yet, today, Southern bands—public-school bands, mostly—are to be heard thumping away at the malign thing. I heard it twice, last January, during George Wallace's inaugural parade.

Recall its phrases: "...(W)e will trample out the vineyards where the grapes of wrath are stored"..."let us die to make men free"..."as we go marching on".

Those "grapes of wrath" are you, my friend, if you are a Southern person, you are the one to be trampled.

Let me tell you the story.

Julia Ward Howe, the biddy who wrote those lyrics, was a queer admixture of sex, piety, poetry, reform, and busybody. As such, she was the quintessence of a Victorian breed of cat indigenous to the North during the middle years of the Nineteenth Century. Such as she were known as Abolitionists and they were responsible for more "trampling" than any sect in this nation's history.

The war of Northern Aggression began in April of '61. Some seven months later this roving eyed woman was to be found in Washington, whisking in and whisking out of this soldier's tent and that: At age 42, Julia Ward had come down from her Boston home to "minister" to "the boys."

Between "ministrations" she holed up at the Willard hotel and there—there or in some tent or another, the evidence is not clear—one November night, that first year of the war, she put her feelings to paper. The thought behind her words has been marching ever since.

The composition, itself, is strictly second-rate-stuff—as, indeed, was Julia—and had there been only words, it is likely once her "poem" was published, that would have been the end of it. But there was the music, too, and that was different. It is a stirring martial melody. And so, piggy-back, stirring music has kept alive Julia Ward Howe's words of hate.

Oddly enough, nobody knows who wrote the tune. Like the Ministering Angel, herself, the music has a clouded history. So far as I can learn, it was first known as a Methodist hymn, Brother Will You Meet us? Later, as Hallelujah.

Sumter had been fired on the preceding April. Perhaps a month after that, in May, at a flag-raising ceremony at Fort Warren near Boston, the old hymn was sung to different words. The new lyrics honored a recently-departed victim of a straight-shooting Confederate. As a patriotic, war-time tune, it caught on. That version became known as John Brown's Body (not the John Brown of Harper's Ferry infamy). Months later, somebody replaced John Brown with Julia's "poem" and there we have it.

I offer the true significance behind today's use of the song is to be seen in the fact that it is not sung under its original words or title but as The Battle Hymn of the Republic.

Such is the legacy of a hate-filled harridan; her spleen goes marching on.

None of this information is obscure. I am as confident as I can be the recent resurgence of the tune was an inspired resurgence. And I am equally confident those creepy little vixens in our Southern public schools who teach it to their students do so with malice aforethought. Believe me, we've got a passel of weevils working our corn meal.

So, next time you hear the repulsive thing, ask whoever is in harge if they know its significance. When they deny such knowledge, tell them the story I have told you and watch their "surprised" reaction. Suggest they try Dixie.

Observe their reaction then. □

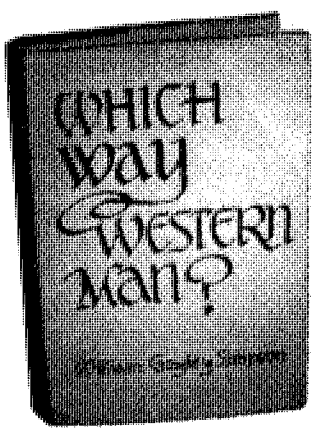
Survival manual for the White race



William Gayley Simpson has spent a lifetime of keen observation, careful analysis, and deep reflection developing the principal thesis of his book: that the single, undying purpose of all human activity should be the ennobling of man. In support of this thesis he looks at the foundations of Western Society, at the structure of our government, at the effects of technology and industrialization on man, at the roles of the sexes, at economics, and at race. The book goes to the roots of the problems facing the White race today, and it shows the ways in which White society must be changed if the race is to survive. WHICH WAY WESTERN MAN? is an encyclopedic work whose conclusions can be ignored by no one with a sense of responsibility to the future. Letters to the Editor

Dear Editor: 30 November 1984

The "Nazi" witch hunt continues.

Jews, in Russia under Stalin, are said to have massacred millions of Ukrainians. We all know that they killed tens of thousands of Palestinians and a few hundred Englishers in the Mideast.

Do you have any leaflets describing Jewish war crimes and asking the American government to hunt down these criminals IN ISRAEL and in the United States? No doubt, quite a number of them have moved to Israel or come to the United States since Stalin's time.

Sincerely,
O.L.B., California

* * * * *

Dear Mr. Dietz: 1 December 1984

Your idea of preaching the Yahweh racket might not be such a bad idea, if you could come up with a good actor like the Falwells, Grahams, Robertsons, et al. They rake in quite a few millions a year and have unlimited sucker trade to con. These people are already too far gone to be much use to our side and what couldn't you do with a few million syphoned off each year like the amounts the Yahweh racketeers syphon off to Israel. All you have to say it is for God and you can make a mint.

Also, some time ago Professor Oliver suggested that we put up candidates that would join the traitors and if we could vote as a united group without asking questions when they got Congress, they could lower the boom. I think this is an excellent idea and suggested it to some groups 25 years ago, but I guess they are afraid they might actually win the war, so they couldn't consider it. All we need is 500 to 600 dedicated and extremely intelligent and crafty (a la Huey Long style) to promise the degenerate boobs everything (use the enemy's money and get elected) then, when strong enough, pull out all the stops. It could be done, but I doubt we could round up 500 or 600 loyal-to-the-death types that wouldn't turn their fellow patriots in if the price was right.

There are so many ways we could use the enemy's tactics against them if we only had the personnel intelligent enough to do it.

Keep up the good work!

Sincerely,
J.F. Montana

Dear George: 26 October 1984

I have recently finished distributing those 3000 envelope stuffers and stickers I ordered earlier in the year all over the place, on public bulletin boards, on mail box covers, through open car windows, on bus seats, stuffed in discarded newspapers, through the junk mail return envelopes, person to person, etc. etc. I have shown several people copies of the Liberty Bell to read, also. This activity took all summer long and I certainly hope you have been rewarded with at least a few book and journal orders!...

I have just returned to the typewriter to conclude this letter after opening today's mail and I am distressed to find your October 18 appeal that accompanied the somewhat belated September issue of the Liberty Bell. I am truly sorry that once again financial resources have declined. I am amending my previous contribution to run through the end of the year and want you to bill me quarterly for $20 beginning in 1985 and thereafter. I hope your readers will do their part, too, as Liberty Bell MUST NOT FOLD! It is an invaluable source of information obtainable NO OTHER WAY! My check for the following order and contribution through December 1984 is enclosed.

Very truly yours,
G.H., New York State

Dear George: 27 November 1984

Taps for Liberty Bell?—I hope not. You have filled a niche in the on-going racial struggle, George, and none are apparently in line to fill the void should you cease publication. I am enclosing my check for an extension of my current subscription. I would like to make a few observations, so now is the time to take the check and chuck the letter!

First, National Socialism or the New Order, is an on-going movement. We who believe in and shape our lives by the concepts of a racial community must have new concepts, new ideas with which to see the struggle through into the coming century. You must encourage and even seek out new writers with fresh ideas; we can see the weakness of our current propaganda efforts by the lack of followers flocking to our ranks. The Liberty Bell must become the organ for our expanding horizons. As The National Socialist is no longer being published, at least I don't see it in my mail anymore, someone must become the journal of the intellectual voice of the racial community. That is your role, George, if you have the strength, both financial and emotional, to see it through.

Secondly, the NSDAP was a product of Germany of the 1920-1930 time period. It is not, in its entirety, applicable to today's political realities. It is an excellent guide, the party provides a working blueprint of success as valid then as today, but the tactics must be adjusted. We can thrill at the lofty racial concepts of The Leader, der Fuehrer, as we can use them, adapt them them, but they must, in many cases, be altered to today's situation, a concept which Adolf Hitler certainly understood. Let the Liberty Bell become the proving ground for the concepts which will enlarge our movement.

We do not have to rely upon the research of the 1930s to make a case for racial purity, we do not have to look to the German labor movement, education, entertainment, professional life, etc., to find the overwhelming influence and domination of the Jew. It is here, today. We cannot live in the past. The past is dead, we must salvage what is worthwhile to today's struggle from our now fallen comrades and carry the banner onward. Die Fahne hoch!

Mit deutschem Gruss!

Dear George: 30 November 1984

Back in 1933, when I was 16, I remember the stillness that prevailed throughout the house on Sunday afternoons when Fr. Coughlin was to be heard broadcasting from The Shrine Of The Little Flower. Nobody was allowed to make a sound. My father was a devout Coughlin follower and an indefatigable worker for Social Justice.

For me, it was at this time that I first became aware of the Jewish problem. I remember writing a school paper on the Federal Reserve System.

From those days on I was interested in world affairs and I suppose I have been involved in just about every so-called right wing, conservative, patriotic movement since, beginning with the America First Committee to keep the U.S. out of World War II through the Goldwater and Wallace farces. I have subscribed to everything from The Cross and The Flag, Common Sense, American Merury, the Greater Nebraskan, The South African Observer, to American Opinion, the Dan Smoot Report, Spotlight, Instauration and half a dozen other current publications including Racial Loyalty, The Thunderbolt and the Liberty Bell.

I have read extensively for over forty years on the Jews, genetics, anthropology, politics, religion, history, the occult, astronomy, geography, and just about anything else you can think of that has anything to do with life on this planet and the problems that beset the white man.

I have heard speakers by the dozen talk, talk, talk at meetings where about the only thing that was accomplished was "meetin', eatin', and retreatin'," as the saying goes. The only speech that really impressed me was given by Revilo P. Oliver, one of the few men in this country that I know of who really tells it like it is.

I have belonged to so-called conservative groups like the John Birch Society, but I have withdrawn membership in all of them for basically the same reasons: most are completely blind to the Jewish menace and all are unable to see the destructive influence of superstition (religion, by whatever name you choose to call it) on the white race, and few are even remotely interested in the racial issue which is of paramount importance. Aside from this, every one of these would-be savior groups is at swords points with each other; they will not stick together.

All of which brings me to the point I have in writing this letter, which I hope you will receive in the belief that it is written and meant to be constructive and in the best interest of our cause.

I was saddened to see Ben Klassen's materials deleted from your recent catalogs, for whatever reason, as I believe his approach to our problem is one of the best yet advanced, if not the best. While I personally do not agree wholeheartedly with his Salubrious Living thesis, I can find little fault with the basic tenets of his Nature's Eternal Religion or those of The White Man's Bible. Any hard-hitting plan of positive action is of far more importance than quibbling over what one or more of us believes ought to go into someone's stomach.

I personally believe there is a need for all of us white men, Creators, Odinists, Alliancers or whatever of basically anti-Jewish-Nigger-Mongrel persuasion a need, an urgent need for ALL of US to unite against THEM.

Very truly yours,
H.R., New York State

Dear Mr. Dietz: 30 November 1984

Thank you for printing Ben Klassen's letter of August 7, 1984. A reply is printed from Ronald Hand, but the letter is dated the second of August, 1984. Was that a typographical error for the 12th? [Indeed, it was! —Editor]

The reason the racialist white movement is not flocking to Ben Klassen and knocking down his door is the man's personality, and his bombastic, arrogant ignorance; his "village atheist" attitude, if you will. There is no philosophical content in his books worth mentioning to appeal to anyone with either intellect, refinement, or sensitivity. There are a number of historical errors and many oversimplifications in his "Nature's Eternal Religion." He copycats the Bible's dogmatism, evidently thinking that the superior white race is incapable of thinking in any other than dogmatic, authoritarian terms. The very fact that he chose to make his book a "bible" reflects an ego problem, and his title, "Pontifex Maximus," which I thought he must have picked either out of defiance or out of waggish humor, has now been forcefully brought to my recognition as the kind of arrogance that one associates with the founder of a cult. Is Moon any less dogmatic than Klassen? Klassen praises the endless achievements of the white race, but he is really talking about the accomplishments of only the highest one per cent of the race's great individuals.

After all the talk about the white man's superiority, Klassen treats him as if he were nothing but a sheep, and must be approached on the "draw 'em a picture" kindergarten level. Klassen went to a lot of work writing his books, I'll give him that much credit, but they are not original in their thinking. He has borrowed extensively in his ideas, but where are his footnotes, references, quotations or proofs of his assertions? Just one example: He claims that Mohammed's wife, Fatima, was a Jewess, not an Arab woman. Proof? None. Just his assertion. She was rich, so that makes her a Jewess?

Klassen takes a lot of swipes at the Odinist religion in his characteristic tarbrush smear style. For instance: "I would choose the Greek or the Roman gods ten to one over the Viking's. Their stories are much richer in classic lore, mystique, wealth of characters, and any other technique that may tickle your fancy. Compared to them, the Vikings were crude, brutish, and bordering on the dense. In fact, on the intellectual level the Vikings were on a similar level to Hagar the Horrible as portrayed in the Sunday comics." So why didn't Klassen tell us this in his bible? He gets so emotionally excited that he includes the Norse religion among the classic religions, (otherwise, how could the Roman and Greek tales be so much richer?!)

Let us assume, with tongue in cheek, that Klassen really knows what he is talking about, and has actually read any Norse mythology since he was ten years old.

Terry Oaks said it well when he remarked that the Norse gods differ from all others (including the gods of the savage peoples of Africa and Oceania) in that they do not require any obeisance or propitiation. There is no "master-slave relationship" between the Germanic gods and their worshippers. Odinists see their gods as friends rather than as supernatural beings.

I am sure we can all name several dozen famous men who have advanced our civilization, even if we were to choose just the last 200 years. These men are white racial heroes. Do we worship them? No, but we admire them, extol them, and wish to emulate them. So what is the difference? The Norse gods are more archetypal in that they are less individually delineated, and that they symbolize either an attitude, a life-style, or a concept which is a racial composite. The Norse gods are heroes because they are mortal—they die after having successfully accomplished the destiny for themselves which was self-chosen. In other words, like men, they could have failed. The One High God, as the Greeks and the Romans called him, (and Paul of Tarsus mocked in the Acts of the Apostles as the "Unknown God") was called by our ancestors, All-Father, the great one who created the universe and its laws, and was far above all the gods and demi-gods. The concept of Yahweh was blasphemous to the white nations of the north, because it identified the tribal god of the Jews with the One High God, the "Ancient of Days." (Why do you suppose the Jews are always downgrading our great men? Because they know our psychology better than we do.

The Aryan race's superiority stems from its thinking, and that thinking was developed in religious and social concepts of dignity, pride, freedom, and individual responsibility. Only the religion of our folk could have endowed our ancestors with such a culture, and for Klassen, who can claim to be descended from these people, to pour scorn on the true, ancient religion of his forefathers, is inexplicable to me. Is the man so confused that he cannot distinguish between Christianity and its effect on our race, and our race's own inherent virtues?

KEEP THE LIBERTY BELL RINGING!

Please remember: Our fight is Your fight! Donate whatever you can spare on a regular—monthly or quarterly—basis. Whether it is $2., $5., $20., or $100. or more, rest assured it is needed here and will be used in our common struggle. If you are a businessman, postage stamps in any denomination, are a legitimate business expense—and we need and use many of these here every month, and will be gratefully accepted as donations.

Your donations will help us spread the Message of Liberty and White Survival throughout the land, by making available additional copies of our printed material to fellow Whites who do not yet know what is in store for them.

Order our pamphlets, booklets, stickers, and—most importantly—our reprints which are ideally suited for mass distribution at reasonable cost. Order extra copies of Liberty Bell for distribution to your circle of friends, neighbors and relatives, urging them to subscribe to our unique publication. Our bulk prices are shown on the inside front cover of every issue of Liberty Bell.

Pass along your copy of Liberty Bell, and copies of reprints you obtained from us, to friends and acquaintances who may be on our 'wave length,' and urge them to contact us for more of the same.

Carry on the fight to free our White people from the shackles of alien domination, even if you can only join our ranks in spirit. You can provide for this by bequest. The following are suggested forms of bequests which you may include in your Last Will and Testament:

SOME QUOTABLE QUOTES FROM AMERICA'S DECLINE

On the 18th Amendment (Prohibition): "Very few Americans were sufficiently sane to perceive that they had repudiated the American conception of government and had replaced it with the legal principle of the 'dictatorship of the proletariat,' which was the theoretical justification of the Jews' revolution in Russia."

FREEDOM OF SPEECH—FREEDOM OF THOUGHT
FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION

The editor-publisher of Liberty Bell does not necessarily agree with each and every article in this magazine, nor does he subscribe to all conclusions arrived at by various writers; however, he does endeavor to permit the exposure of ideas suppressed by the controlled news media of this country.

It is, therefore, in the best tradition of America and of free men everywhere that Liberty Bell strives to give free reign to ideas, for ultimately it is ideas which rule the world and determine both the content and structure of culture.

We believe that we can and will change our society for the better. We declare our long-held view that no institution or government created by men, for men, is inviolable, incorruptible, and not subject to evolution, change or replacement by the will of the people.

To this we dedicate our lives and our work. No effort will be spared and no idea will be allowed to go unexpressed if we think it will benefit the Thinking People, not only of America, but the entire world.

Revilo P. Oliver

Architects of Fear, Conspiracy Theories and Paranoia in American Politics, by George Johnson, published by a Jeremy Tharcher in Los Angeles, but peddled by Houghton Mifflin, a once respected firm in Boston, is the wad of piffle that the title would lead you to suspect. The author is a young journalist, born in 1952, but he evidently took his title from a phrase that was used about two decades before he was born, when the great War Criminal of all time used to coo over the radio to simple-minded females and tell them "We have nothing to feeah except feeah itself."

A large part of the book consists of expansions of items Johnson wrote, when even younger, for the Minneapolis Star under the patronage of its immigrant editor-in-chief, Stephen D. Isaacs. It would not merit mention here, if I had not noticed in it a conveniently concise illustration of the technique of manufacturing such books.

Dr. Thomas H. Landess, an editor of the Southern Partisan, commented on contemporary journalism in a recent address at Hillsdale College in Michigan. He was principally concerned with the sabotage and prostitution of the English language in the writing that he compared to "punk rock" (i.e., the cacophonous din that has replaced music in degenerate circles). He gave a good estimate of contemporary journalists: "With almost no exception. . .the men and women whose work appears in the editorial pages of the great Eastern opinion mills or on the screens of your television set are badly educated and ill-trained. . . . These people are mostly too ordinary and unimportant to be responsible for the tremendous changes that have taken place in our time. None of them is Genghis Khan. They're not even privates in the barbarian army. They're merely camp followers, tagging along behind, hoping to turn a trick and make a buck."

True enough, but Fagin's lads do learn from their master a few simple kinds of low cunning, and the more talented ones can produce books that seem instructive to persons who read without reflecting on what they see in print. Johnson lumps together in his screed the widest variety of persons who are so paranoid that they do not realize how blessed it is to be American serfs and labor for the international parasites who now own them. He appears at first sight to be a naïf young man, inadequately educated, who is striving to be fair and accurate in his reports and appraisals, even when he mentions such nonsense as claims that the world is dominated by the British Empire and its decadent aristocracy or by the Vatican and its horde of miracle-workers (many of whom are now also working on sales-jobs for the Soviet, perhaps as insurance against unemployment, if the old firm goes bust).*

* The book is a hack job, of course, and the author's preparation was naturally superficial. For example, in his chapter on claims that there is a Catholic conspiracy (pp. 85-102), the author misses some real gems. Emmet McLoughlin's An Inquiry into the Assassination of Abraham Lincoln (Secaucus, New Jersey, Citadel Press, 1977) revives the old tale that the Pope hired Booth and Surratt to expunge a champion of "democracy." And there is the Christian holy man who calls himself Tony Alamo and has grown wealthy from a chain of salvation-shops managed from his headquarters, the Holiness Tabernacle in Arkansas. He not only proclaims that the Catholics assassinated Lincoln (with Jackanapes Kennedy thrown in for good measure), but spreads the alarm that the "serpent-like Vatican" now completely controls the Federal Government and all its branches and also controls all the media of communication, from the New York Times, Time, Newsweek, and the rest of the press to all of the large broadcasting and television systems, which are being used to destroy the United States, with the approval of all Catholic laymen, who are "haters of God" like their priests. The exemplary Christian rabble-rouser is really a sweet Jew boy, Bernie Lazar Hoffman, and you can guess why he attributes to the diabolic Catholics what his own divine race is really doing. Johnson has heard of the model for such agitation, "the Wandering Jew, an international best-seller published in 1844," but Johnson seems not to know that it was written by Joseph Sue, the son of a Jewish or half-Jewish physician who grew wealthy during the French Revolution. Joseph, to make himself seem more French, called himself Eugène Sue (or, as the name was frequently written with the tréma, Suë). Le Juif errant, published as a serial in 1844-1845, describes the wickedness of an international network of Jesuits who are trying to strangle and enslave mankind, but are defeated, naturally, by a noble Jew, who is atoning for his failure to recognize Jesus as the messiah. The bulk of the novel is tripe, but the prologue and epilogue are devoted to a brilliantly romantic conception that proves that Sue had a touch of poetic genius. (Sue produced approximately two hundred small volumes of fiction and drama, but his masterpiece was Les mystères de Paris, a form of novel that he invented, which artfully combines as much pornography as could then be tolerated in print with graphically realistic descriptions of the sordid Parisian underworld and detailed explanations of the devices used by its criminals, the whole spiced with a sentimentality worthy of Dickens and constant propaganda for a socialist revolution that will make everyone happy and honest.)

But Mr. Johnson is more than a bright boy dealing with topics beyond his powers of logical analysis and discrimination. He has learned the tricks of his trade, taught perhaps by some member of the great race that Yahweh specially created to rule the world he deeded to them by the famous b'rith. Here is a capsule illustration.

He believes that Robert Welch was sincere in his desire to "purify" his Birch business by purging it of persons suspected of such consummate wickedness as lack of veneration for Yahweh's Masterpieces, and he refers to a speech I gave in Boston in 1966, when I was about to carry out my intention to sever my connection with Welch's promotions, as I have fully described in America's Decline. Here is what journalist Johnson says on his pages 136f.:

> Welch blamed "agents provocateurs" hired by the Insiders for infiltrating his society and sowing anti-Semitism to convince the public that the Birchers hated Jews. Welch tried to keep the interlopers out. In the mid-1960s, Robert DePugh, leader of a paramilitary right-wing organization called the Minutemen, and Journalist Westbrook Pegler were dropped from the society because they were considered by the public to be anti-Semites. Revilo P. Oliver was eased out in 1966 after he said, in a speech at the society's New England Rally for God, Family, and Country: "If only by some miracle all the Bolsheviks or all the Illuminati or all the Jews were vaporized at dawn tomorrow, we should have nothing to worry about."

Now Johnson is obviously quoting from my address, Conspiracy or Degeneracy?, of which the verbatim text was published, together with documentary notes, by Power Products shortly after I spoke, and which is now available from Liberty Bell Publications in a reprint made by photo-offset. And it will be noticed that the clever boy does quote accurately, but gives the unwary reader the impression I said the precise opposite of what I did in fact say. So here is the corresponding passage from Conspiracy or Degeneracy?

> The conspiracy that is destroying us, we are told, is a conspiracy of Communists or of Illuminati or of Jews.[14]
> Now most of the authors who offer us one or another of those three identifications expound their view in a manner that is less than cogent. Most of them either overstate or oversimplify their case,[15] and some of them, I am sorry to say, give the impression that they are no more intelligent than "Liberal intellectuals." Most of the writers on this subject are either so fascinated by their own discoveries or so anxious to convince a maximum number of readers that they imply that the conspiracy they identify is the root of all evil—that if it were abolished, mankind—all mankind, mind you— would enter, instanter, on a Golden Age of peace and domestic tranquility and happiness. If only by some miracle all the Bolsheviks or all of the Illuminati or all the Jews were vaporized at dawn tomorrow, we should have nothing more to worry about.[16]

14, 15, 16. For the documentary notes, see Conspiracy or Degeneracy?, p. 38.

The trouble with that beatific vision, of course, is that every educated man knows that it just can't be so.

Now I do not in the least object to Johnson's implication that I am sadly deficient in veneration for the world-conquering Sheenies who have occupied and rule what was once a White Man's country, but I do resent the libellous imputation that I adopted one of the simple-minded simplifications to which I specifically objected.

Journalists will, of course, be journalists, and it is only charitable to hope that they enjoy the bones that are thrown them from time to time by their appreciative trainers. And I thought this concise and neat example of how the more talented ones earn their rewards would be of some general interest.

Julius Evola's "Civiltà" americana, originally published in 1945, has been reprinted in Rome by a foundation established in his memory. The new edition is introduced by a preface, of which an English translation appears in the British periodical, Scorpion, from which I quote the following extracts:

"Anyone today who considers American society is struck by the impression of a society gone mad, in which the germs of disintegration which Evola pointed to have multiplied and the disease has broken out visibly, defacing a social fabric which was already deteriorating. According to official statistics, more than one-fifth of the population of the United States has been involved with drugs. Organised delinquent hooliganism is still on the increase and has come to dominate large areas of some cities; every kind of sexual aberration is being advocated along with an unbridled sexual grossness; there is increasing violence and sadism in the cities, particularly among the young; pseudo-religious sects proliferate, dragging their disciples into a psychological slum world. These phenomena are only the most obviously disquieting symptoms of an accelerating decline towards total disintegration of the human personality. . . .American society, in fact, is on an irreversible course to extinction."

"What in Europe exist in diluted form are magnified and concentrated in the United State whereby they are revealed as the symptoms of disintegration and cultural and human regression. The American mentality can only be interpreted as an example of regression, which shows itself in the mental atrophy towards all higher interests and incomprehension of higher sensibility. The American mind has limited horizons, one confined to everything which is immediate and simplistic, with the inevitable consequence that everything is made banal, basic, and levelled down until it is deprived of all spiritual life. . .

"The primitive American mind can only superficially be compared to a young mind. The American mind is a feature of the regressive society to which I have already referred. A most significant aspect of American mentality and its lack of refinement is the closeness of the American way of thinking in general to the negroid way of thinking in particular, not only in well-known examples, such as music, but in multifarious aspects of the mass psyche and in the proliferation of superstitions and religious sects of every kind, which thrive in the United States as they do in few other countries."

Evola saw the dominant principle of American society in the frantic striving for equality, which, of course, can only be equality in degradation. This, as I have remarked more than once, is simply a recrudescence of proletarian baseness that is implicit in the gospels of the "New Testament" and is made explicit in a Christian Apocalypse in which Jesus promises that after he has returned to raise Hell on earth and has tortured and butchered the civilized population, his pets will pop out of their graves, miraculously transformed into the beings of the same age, the same sex, the same stature, and as indistinguishable from one another as the bees in a swarm.

The writer of the new preface draws an analogy to the Aryan civilization of India, slurring over the basic racial distinction involved. He writes:

"The Americans' 'open-mindedness' which is sometimes cited in their favor, is the other side of their inner formlessness. The same goes for their 'individualism.' Individualism and personality are not the same: the one belongs to the formless world of quantity, the other to the world of quality and hierarchy. . . . The American 'mind' puerile and primitive, lacks characteristic form and is therefore open to every kind of standardisation.

"In a superior civilisation, as, for example, that of the Indo-Aryans, the being who is without characteristic form or caste (in the original meaning of that word),* not even that of servant or shudra, would emerge as a pariah. In this respect America is a society of pariahs. There is a rôle for pariahs. It is to be subjected to beings whose form and internal laws are precisely defined. Instead, the modern pariahs seek to become dominant themselves and to exercise their dominion over all the world."

I do not know whether the writer intended his readers to notice that the Jews are a race which does have "form and internal laws," i.e., an intense racial consciousness.

If you read Italian, you will find in Evola's book a response to Burns' wish: "Oh, wad some power the giftie gie us / To see oursels as others see us!"

* * *

The Winter issue of the Skeptical Inquirer reports, without scepticism, the findings of a "Gallup Poll," which has no apparent political implications and may be accepted with only the usual formal reservation about the selection of samples and techniques of interrogation. A total of 507 youngsters between the ages of 13 and 17 were asked about their superstitions. It was found that 59% of them believed in "Extra-sensory perception" and 55% believed in the hocus-pocus of astrology. Those findings are depressing, but not inexplicable, since both rackets are being so assiduously peddled to the boobs these days. What was astonishing was that 69% believed in the existence of angels, the supernatural beings that were once prominent in Christian mythology but have been scrapped by most theologians today and are embarrassing to almost all of the

* 'Caste' is an Anglicization of the Portuguese casta, 'pure (race),' which was used to translate the Sanskrit varṇa, 'color, complexion.' Strictly speaking, there are only four castes, but the word is also applied to the innumerable subdivisions of them, which are said to be the result of miscegenation. According to one theory, there are four castes because the holy men cleverly created a caste for themselves (Brāhmaṇas) to put themselves on top, and originally there were only three castes, corresponding to the three strata of society in the Norse myth of Heimdahl. These were the white Aryan conquerors, the white but 'olive-skinned' descendants of the people whose civilization left the ruins in the Indus Valley, and the black aborigines.

others.* Angels are decidedly out of fashion now, and what

* The sources of the Christian notions about angels are complex and I can here mention only essentials. In the part of the Jew-book that Christians call the "Old Testament" there is frequent mention of supernatural beings called ML'KYM (now vocalized as mălāchīm), who appear to have been originally like the Arabian jinn, whom everyone remembers from the Arabian Nights. In the Hebrew tales, the mălāchīm are sometimes called gods, ('LHYM, vocalized as ĕlōhīm), but are more often described as the sons of the gods or of the particular god called Yahweh, and they generally appear as agents of the major god or gods and carry out his or their orders, but they sometimes act on their own, as when they copulated with mortal women and became the fathers of the giants. The mălāchīm are usually distinguished from another kind of supernatural being, the RWḤ, (vocalized as rūăch), a 'wind,' originally thought of as a gigantic bird, who was quite possibly the ancestor of the roc (rukh) of the Arabian Nights. It will be recalled that in the Jews' version of a Babylonian creation-story in Genesis it is said that the gods (ĕlōhīm) "created heaven and earth," and began by sending a rūăch to move (fly) over the already existing waters of the abyss, i.e., the ocean yet unbounded by land. There were yet other supernatural beings, especially the seraphim (winged dragons) and the cherubim (who were either polycephalic birds or winged bulls, such as are familiar from Babylonian sculpture).

When the Jews prepared a Greek version of their story book around the first century, B.C., they used the neuter noun pneuma ('breath, air') to represent RWḤ, and angelos ('messenger, herald') to represent ML'K. These Greek equivalents were, of course, used when the stories about a Jesus were composed, a few of which were collected to form the "New Testament."

When the intensive peddling of Christianity to the goyim got under way around the middle of the Second Century, the non-Jewish holy men who became prominent in the business were generally proletarians with mediocre educations, and they naturally imagined the angeloi in the stories to be supernatural beings like the Graeco-Roman daimones and genii they saw depicted in contemporary art, which had been much influenced by Neo-Platonism, a pseudo-philosophical cult that appealed to the religiosity of the 'intellectuals' of a mongrelized and decadent empire. The Christian conception of an angel was obviously taken from pictures of a genius, such as the sculptured representation, produced shortly after A.D. 161 for a monument to Antonius Pius, which may conveniently be seen in a good photograph in George Every's Christian Mythology (London, Hamlyn, 1970), p. 104, where it may readily be compared to Christian pictures of angels. The only difference is that the Christians, with their sexual obsessions, thought that their angels should always be fully clothed. The Fathers of the Church were, of course, strongly influenced by Neo-Platonism, with which they were in competition, and devised a whole mythology about angels, which was systematized in a work, De hierarchia caelesti, written around 500, but, in keeping with the Christian habit of forgery and deception, circulated under the name of 'Dionysius Areopagita' to make it seem to have been written in the First Century. Angels were given a very prominent place in the myths of the Catholic Church and are still a part of its official doctrine, although one that now embarrasses most makes the incidence of superstitions about them even more amazing is the fact that belief in them greatly exceeded belief in ghosts (20%) and witches (22%), which are being peddled by some con men today.

The racial factor was not entirely ignored in the poll, which produced the finding that Blacks were less gullible than Whites. That would seem incredible, if it were not accompanied by the report that "there is a tendency for the educationally advantaged to report above-average belief" in the various superstitions. The jargon, 'educationally advantaged,' must be intended to designate youngsters whose brains have been most thoroughly soaked in the bilge of the public schools. That, of course, is only what one should expect, for to every objective observer it has long been obvious that intellects that have been so weakened that they can believe in the equality of all anthropoid bipeds have been so addled that they can believe in anything that is preposterous, from "one world" to hobgoblins.

The poll, then, merely attests the efficiency of our tax-supported boob-hatcheries, which have for decades been operated by experts to produce precisely this result. It will be remembered that the menticide began with sabotage of the traditional education on the specious pretext that children's minds should early be accustomed to scientific thinking—to the facts of chemistry, physics, and biology. The racketeers, whether covert revolutionaries or mere swindlers, then devised a "science of education" and, like all witch-doctors, promised to make magic for the suckers. And as soon as the gangsters got legal control of the schools and power to pick the pockets of the tax-paying victims of "democracy," the factual sciences were eased out and replaced with the stinking garbage of superstitions called "social science," guaranteed to make more "democracy," as in the "educators' " Soviet models. All of this has been obvious since the 1920s to anyone who looked and was willing to see, and the consequences today are precisely what could have been predicted by any reasonably intelligent person who took the trouble of trying to understand the contorted gabble of John Dewey and other padrini of the new Mafia. And what has happened now was in fact predicted by many, who often summarized the facts by calling Dewey et al. Communists, as they obviously were, whether or not they had been issued credentials by the official Communist Party—an irrelevant point that was always raised by journalists whose owners instructed them to shriek and spit to cover up subversion of a nation that could have acted in the 1920s and early 1930s to retain its independence.

It is much too late now, of course. The gangsters have sabotaged the minds of children for three full generations and are now operating on the brains of the great-grandchildren of their early victims. What is left of our nation, the Aryans who once owned the United States and gave it away to their enemies, has been made childish and feckless, irrational and irresponsible. It is true that a few children, genetically superior or born of parents wise enough to administer some prophylaxis against the poisons of the schools and the environment the schools created, try to understand their race's plight rather than "adjust" to it, but they are in a hopeless minority. We can only hope that, through chance events now unforeseeable, they will survive the chaos ahead and leave progeny that can fulfill the potentiality that was once innate in our race.

Angels are creations of the imagination; such beings never existed and could not possibly exist. In the Cretaceous Period, of the professionals. In fact, one of the current rows in Catholicism is over a bundle of pious hokum, Christ Among Us, by the Reverend Anthony Wilhelm, which has been selling like hot dogs at a country fair and is now in its second million. Wilhelm is denounced by Catholics who persist in taking their cult seriously because he has jettisoned belief in angels along with the "perpetual virginity" of Mother Mary and other dogmas that were forced on our people by the earthly business managers of Yahweh & Son, Inc., so long as the salvation-market was booming.

Protestants, on the whole, were much more interested in devils than in angels, who weren't very exciting topics for polemical oratory, but the greatest literary work on angels came, oddly enough, out of the strongly Judaized Protestant cult of the Puritans, who, it will be remembered, made celebration of Christmas a crime and demoted Jesus in the cult so far as they prudently could. Paradise Lost is one of the very greatest poems in English and angels are among the most brilliant characters in it, but also the ones a modern reader is least equipped to understand. For a good introduction to that part of the epic and an exposition of what its very learned author thought he knew about angels, see Robert H. West, Milton and the Angels (Athens, Georgia, 1955).

The extraordinary extent of a belief in angels among the ignorant youngsters turned out by the schools, as measured by the "Gallup Poll," indicates a market that some enterprising dervish will surely exploit on the boob-tube before long. And since hobnobbing with supermen from outer space on "flying saucers" is becoming commonplace and tedious, we may soon suffer a vogue of chats with Gabriel, Raphael, Michael, and other ranking officers in Yahweh's army.

near the end of the Mesozoic Age, and as recently as 64,000,000 years ago, the earth's oceans swarmed with many species of plesiosaurs (elasmosauri, hydrotherosauri, etc)., but they, like the other dinosaurs, for reasons which are yet unascertained, became extinct at the end of the Mesozoic. It is not absolutely inconceivable, however, that a few of the huge creatures survived whatever force exterminated the rest, and left descendants, doubtless with some evolutionary changes, even to historical times, so that some of the innumerable reports about sea serpents may have had a basis in fact rather than in illusions and imagination. And when we remember that the coelacanth astonished the world a few decades ago by surviving from the Palaeozoic Age to the present in the ocean off South Africa and Madagascar, we must admit that it is not absolutely impossible, though highly improbable, that some descendant of the plesiosaurs could be alive today. Thus when it was reported in 1933 that such a creature had been sighted in Loch Ness in Glen More (northern Scotland), we could not be absolutely certain that the report was the product of an overheated imagination plus the human urge to make a good story better.

In a sane society, the report would have been received with scepticism by the inhabitants of the region and been forgotten when the supposititious plesiosaur gave no sign of its existence. But in a "democracy," in which the only aim of human life is to cadge real or spurious money from suckers, newspapers are ever alert for some sensational tale to set their dim-witted readers agog, and the tourist trade itself could have been created for predators. So the monster was sighted often enough to sustain excitement in minds that were willing to believe in aquatic dinosaurs that miraculously did not have to eat. And the piffle-peddlers have kept nitwits excited for fifty years, while all sorts of technological gadgets have been employed to discover the creature, usually by "scientists" who were careful to render reports that would not blight the tourist trade.

It is a sad and discouraging commentary on our times that respected universities and research institutes have spent an inordinate amount of effort and money in serious efforts to investigate what had long since been an obvious hoax. Very elaborate sonar equipment was recently installed in the lake to detect any sounds that the coy plesiosaur might make by swimming or otherwise, and, needless to say, the monster prudently gave no sign of its existence during the months the

by
Jim Taylor

I have written about how the Israelis have imprisoned, tortured, and even killed American citizens, without reason.

But I consider it even worse when an American is forced to suffer by his own government. So, I'd like to mention one of the grave crimes against humanity committed by the United States of America against an innocent and very dedicated American citizen. Perhaps it is safe to say that this gentleman, an American citizen for nearly forty years, did much more for America than any other living U.S. citizen. A high-level NSA scientist, Arthur L. H. Rudolph is rated in the genius category, one of the most gifted individuals in the world. And he alone was responsible for designing and developing the famed Saturn 5 rocket which enabled U.S. astronauts to land on the moon. Mr. Rudolph loved this country. He worked day and night to make America great.

This man's scientific achievements on behalf of the United States are more than enough to fill this magazine and space limitations do not permit me to list them all. But let it be mentioned that he has been honored throughout the entire world for his advanced scientific theories. His work enabled the U.S. to reach the moon before the Soviets. Without his genius at work for America, the history books of today, and the future, would read that Russians were the space pioneers who first walked on the surface of the moon.

Mr. Rudolph is a German-American. He, along with about 500 other German scientist, was brought to this country after World War II.* The late Wernher von Braun, who once headed rocket research in National Socialist Germany, was a co-worker of Mr. Rudolph. Operation Paperclip was the overall name given this project. Two other such secret operations were termed Crossbow and Overcast. But now, because of the election year just ended and Jewish pressure, the White House has ordered the U.S. Space Agency to maintain absolute silence about these men who made our space program second to none.

* [For those who can read it aright, an instructive account of this operation is The Hunt for German Scientists, by Michael Bar-Zohar (New York, Hawthorne Books, 1967). Of course, one does not accept statements of fact made by a Jewish author without verification from a reliable source, but the author inadvertently reveals the vicious ferocity of Jews rabid with racial hatred and their gloating over the sadistic inhumanity and moral depravity of the Aryan serfs, who won for them their victory over the valiant and self-respecting Aryans of Germany. —Ed.]

As I have stated, Arthur Rudolph worked diligently for America. He used every ounce of his energy for the benefit of this nation. Now wouldn't you think that the U.S. would be grateful for this long service?

But American authorities are not grateful. Just the opposite. Now Mr. Rudolph is old, tired, and worn out. Nearly 80 years old and ailing, he is of no further use to the United States of America.

In my opinion, after this man's sacrifice and service to America, he should have, at least, been allowed to spend his remaining years on this earth in peace. But do you know what actually happened to him? Last March, he was told his citizenship would be taken from him, and he was secretly hustled out of the U.S., branded a Nazi war criminal on no legal evidence whatsoever, and sent to West Germany for trial. Of course, our daily newspapers, in a few brief lines, reported that Mr. Rudolph left this country voluntarily. This is not true. He was shipped out in disgrace merely because the Zionists ordered it, due to his work in Germany with the production of V-2 missiles. Some forced labor was supposedly used to build the V-2s.

Mr. Rudolph has stated that far from abusing any laborers, he tried to better working conditions for them. Besides, if he really were a war criminal, how does it happen to take nearly 40 years to discover it? And, isn't it a little bit suspicious that nothing about this charge against him was ever made until he was of no more use to America?

Diplomats from five foreign countries have told me that if that is the way the U.S. treats a friend, then no country in the world will ever trust us again.

The Zionists and the U.S. have ordered West Germany to try Mr. Rudolph for alleged war crimes. But, Alfred Streim, of the Central Office for Prosecution of Nazi Crimes at Ludwigsburg, near Stuttgart, said, "There is no incriminating evidence available to connect Mr. Rudolph with any crimes."

As soon as he heard this statement, Neil Sher, head of the U.S. Justice Department's Office of Special Investigations, said, "I'll be in touch with Mr. Streim, and I'll send him what he needs." As usual, this simply implies that the U.S. and the Zionists are going to manufacture some evidence where none actually exists. Mr. Sher is the man who caused Mr. Rudolph to lose his American citizenship, and quite possibly have to spend the rest of his life in prison, or be hanged. This scientist was our top man in his field for many years. Now, all of a sudden, he is considered a top Nazi war criminal. What a change! The Zionists in Washington push a button, and Presto-Change-O, this American space hero turns into a big, bad Nazi. This does not surprise me. The Zionists have done this before. What does surprise me is that no Americans have protested this farce. And I have a question for you voters and taxpayers. Is this the democratic way? Is this

Gentlemen: Subject: New Bible

I have received your brochure promoting the new shortened and simplified version of the Bible. I think this is a most worthwhile endeavor and I want to commend you for it. Naturally I hope that in compiling the new shortened Holy Book you have not omitted any of my favorite passages and stories and that you have retained at least some of the unique phraseology of the St.James Bible. One of my favorite passages is II Kings 18:27, which reads:

"But Rabshake said unto them, hath my master sent me to thy master, and to thee, to speak these words? Hath he not sent me to the men which sit on the wall, that they may eat their own dung, and drink their own piss with you?"

It is to be noted that the theologians who assembled the King James Bible realized the importance of this verse since it is repeated in Isaiah 36:12. As you point out in your brochure, the Bible is something to read when you seek solace and guidance and are in need of a strenghtening message.

Another inspiring verse along this same line appears in I Kings 14:10:

"Therefore behold, I will bring evil upon the house of Jeroboam and will cut off from Jeroboam him that pisseth against the wall, and him that is shut up and left in Israel, and will take away the remnant of the house of Jeroboam, as a man taketh away dung, till it be all gone."

This verse has been expounded upon in sermons by preachers everywhere and one can see why. Feminist groups have ventured a mild criticism of the verse as being too exclusionary. Members of lady Bible clases, however, have voiced no objection.

In your new rendition of the Book of Books I hope that you have left intact one of my favorite Bible stories which is found in Exodus 4:24. Here we find God meeting Moses in a motel (inn). God is very angry (wroth) with Moses for some obscure reason and wants to kill him. It turns out that God is wroth because Moses has neglected to have his son circumcised. Zipporah, the wife of Moses, using her feminine intuition, sizes up the situation, grabs a flint stone knife out of the kitchen, pulls her son outside and cuts off the offending appendage, thus becomig the first lady surgeon in history. Jehovah God, creator of a billion suns, is mollified by this impressive demonstration of foreskin diplomacy and decides to let Moses live. Moses had two sons, Gershom and Eliezer, and it is not clear which son was the beneficiary of the impromptu surgery. While it might be disconcerting to some that the Lord of Hosts seems to have had an inordinate interest in foreskins, and at times virgins, nevertheless, this story remains the favorite of Bible classes everywhere.

Another inspirational story which I hope you have retained in the new Bible is told in Judges 4:21. Here we find a lady named Jael who makes friends with an enemy soldier and takes him to her tent. After giving the soldier some food, providing him a place to rest, and lulling him to sleep Jael then proceeds to nail him to the floor with a tent spike. This story will have particular appeal and inspiration to females who are entering military service for the first time for obvious reasons, and it has on more than one occasion provided inspirational food for the evangelist on Revival duty.

Still another story worth keeping is the touching account of Jephtah as related in Judges 11:29-40. Jephtah, a bastard, the son of a harlot, has been appointed to lead a Hebrew invasion force against the Ammonites. Jephtah insures his military success by making a pact with Jehovah God, offering to burn for him in sacrifice "whatsoever cometh forth from the doors of my house to meet me when I return in peace." After slaughtering the Ammonites (including the women and children) Jephtah returns to his house. The first thing that comes out to greet him is not a dog, a cat, a chicken, a slave, or a concubine, but his daughter, an only child, who does a dance with timbrel accompaniment. After tearing his clothes, which was the custom of Hebrew men when they were upset, he sends his daughter away for a couple of months so she could bewail her virginity, which means feeling sorry for yourself for not having lived it up a little, and hopefully, in the meantime there would be a sign from the Lord of Hosts that it would be OK to cancel the sacrifice as in the Abraham-Isaac case. But the Lord would not let Jephtah off the hook, so when his daughter returned he set her on fire and burned her up. In addition to being a good Sunday school topic, especially during the Lenten period, the story inevitably became the favorite of Fundamentalist preachers for Sunday sermons in which the comparison between Abraham's near sacrifice of his son and the fate of Jephtah's unnamed daughter could be made and the Lord praised for his justice and mercy. There are those who say the Bible is replete with stories describing without disapproval instances of polygamy, slavery, concubinage, treachery, incest, homosexuality, murder, wars of plunder, massacres of prisoners of war, cruelty to animals, etc., but these critics are in the main atheists and people of that ilk. After all, is not the Bible the book we use to swear our Presidents and other high officials into office?

There are so many inspirational stories in the Bible that it is difficult to choose among them. After much thought I have decided that my final choice from the Old Testament will be the story of the two bears, two mama bears to be exact, and it is related in II Kings 2:23-25. It seems these two bears were supernaturally called out of the woods near a town called Bethel to kill 42 kids who were teasing an old Prophet about the bald spot on his head. This Prophet was named Elisha and should not be confused with Elijah, another Prophet who went soaring off to heaven in a flaming chariot. The moral here is very explicit: the Lord takes a very dim view of kids teasing senior citizens about their bald spots. Obviously, this story can be used nicely in a Junior Division Bible Class. Elisha went on to achieve biblical fame by dividing the waters of the Jordan River so he could walk across without getting his feet wet (II Kings 2:13-14). He also suspended the law of gravity by making an axe float in water (II Kings 6:4-); and, finally, Elisha performed a feat that has never been duplicated by bringing a dead soldier back to life after he, Elisha, had been dead for many years. Needless to say, the exploits of Elisha are included in the curricula of Fundamentalist colleges and seminaries across the country.

The New Testament also provides much inspirational material which should be retained in any revision of the Book of Books. This will necessarily feature the sayings and doings of the Son of Jehovah God called Joshua by the Hebrews and Jesus by the Greeks, also sometimes called the son of man, presumably because of the relationship between Mary and the Holy Ghost, said Jesus finally being declared divine by the Catholic Church in 325 AD at the Council of Nicea, which was approved by the Emperor Constantine who then directed the Pagans to get Christianized, or else, and everybody settled down to centuries of love and harmony called the Dark Age, with periodic detours for the Inquisition, the burning of witches and the general harrassment of the Jews. But all of this is ancient history and I have strayed from the subject.

Unquestionably, the following verses attributable to Jesus the Christ are worthy of retention in your new Bible. They are found in Luke 14:46; 19:27, and 12:49-543:

"If any man come to me and hate not his father and mother, and wife, and children and brethren and sisters, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple."

"But these mine enemies, which would not that I should reign over them bring them hither and slay them before me."

"I am come to send fire on the earth. Suppose ye that I am come to bring peace on earth? I tell you nay, but rather division. For from henceforth there shall be five in one house divided, three against two and two against three. The father shall be divided against the son, and the son against the father, the mother against the daughter, and the daughter against the mother..."

As a husband and father, I have always found these expressions of sweetness and compassion of great solace and comfort during periods of trial and stress.

I shall conclude this letter with the hope that you have retained in full the inspirational message to mankind divulged by none other than the Savior Jesus in a parable told in Luke 16:19-31. The principals in the parable are a beggar named Lazarus and a rich man named Dives. It seems that Dives, as a man of wealth, wore fine clothes and lived rather high on the hog, figuratively speaking, that is. Actually, the ancient Hebrews did not eat pork. Dives was a normal, law-abiding citizen and was charitable enough, giving food to the poor. Well, this beggar, Lazarus, apparently toiled not and neither did he spin, being too lazy to work or even to scratch. He hung around Dive's door waiting for handouts and letting the dogs lick his sores. When he died the angels came down and picked him up and took him straight to heaven and placed him in the bosom of Abraham. Apparently, one of the privileges of heaven is that you can sit on the wall and look right down into hell and hear them howl. And so Lazarus had hardly got seated in Abraham's bosom when he looked down. The first man he saw in hell was the rich man whose food he had lived on and whose dogs had given him the only baths he ever got. The rich man being in torment looked up at Abraham and his bosom tenant and cried "Father Abraham, have mercy on me and send Lazarus that he may dip the tip of his finger in water and cool my tongue; for I am tormented in this flame." But Abraham said, "Son, remember that thou in thy lifetime receivest thy good things and likewise Lazarus evil things, but now he is comforted and thou art tormented." This story is loaded with lessons to be learned and provides an accurate description of the after-life furnished by an infallible source, the Prince of Peace, and he should know. There seems to be no question but that if you are a rich man you had better not plan on strolling along the streets of gold with your harp after death; also, if you happen to have a bad case of herpes, have been unemployed for a long time and own an affectionate dog, your chances of going to heaven are pretty good. The fact that Abraham made it to heaven is good evidence of the mercy of God. Abraham, as you know, rented his wife out for money on two occasions; once to the King of Egypt and the other to the King of Gerar, posing his wife as his sister. This comes pretty close to pimping in present day terminology. I have heard my pastor use the story of the rich man and Lazarus in sermons at times when the church coffers were low, but, to my knowledge, he never mentioned the pimping activities of Abraham.

With regard to heaven, I feel my chances of getting there are nil. In fact, if Rev. xiv means anything, no Gentiles are going to make it. This inspired portion of the Scriptures states that on Judgment Day there will be 144,000 redeemed from the earth on Mt. Zion, but all the saved will be Jews, for Christ will lower the City of Jerusalem and the city has 12 gates each being pre-empted for one of the 12 tribes of Israel (Rev. xvi,12). Putting two and two together, this makes sense. The Prince of Peace is on

ENSURING THAT HOLOCAUST STORIES 'NEVER DIE'!

One of the most shocking facts of life in the West today is that all questions about Jews, Jewry and that mysterious international force, political Zionism, may not be discussed in any public forum. But that is not all. Whenever discussions turn to Jewish affairs, leaders in every walk of life, including Christian leaders, abandon all reason, judgment and moral courage—not to mention intellectual integrity.

All discussion of the Jewish Question has been effectively removed from the realm of rational, open discussion, and is today confined to private groups lest one be suspected of "anti-Semitism." For, is not all discussion of Jews and Jewry, ipso facto, anti-Semitism? And is it not but one step from anti-Semitism to genocide, and of course the "Six Million"?

DOWNWARD DRIFT OF WEST

The perpetuation of the myth of the "six million" has also made it impossible to come to grips with the overwhelming race problem—a fact which is accelerating the downward drift of Western nations toward not only anarchy but the irrevocable loss of their European culture and racial heritage. The problem of race today must always be referred to as a legal, constitutional, moral, psychological or sociological problem. Never can the problem be referred to in its real terms, namely as a biological and political problem.

For that, it is uniformly argued by all the "experts" and "leading thinkers" in the world, is Racism! And is not "racism" the very hallmark of the "Nazi" and the "anti-Semite," with its concomitants of "genocide" and the "holocaust." Indeed, so intimidated have the people of the West become by the smears of "racism," "anti-Semitism" and the so-called "holocaust" that they are today cowed into complete silence.

Reprints of this article available at 5 for $1.50; 100 for $20.; 500 for $80. Min. postage $1. or 10%. Order from: Liberty Bell Publications, Box 21, Reedy WV 25270 USA.

And yet these terms are never defined so that the victim may disagree or defend himself, but are spat out everywhere as the accusation of some vicious crime, placing the defendant beyond the pale, and presuming his automatic condemnation without trial. It is in this climate of intimidation that the story of the "six million," the so-called "holocaust," has taken root and grown to the rank proportions it has today. And so effective and deadly has it been in its propaganda effects, even in a country like South Africa, that the editors of our English and Afrikaans newspapers have continued faithfully and enthusiastically, year in and year out for the past forty years, to relay any and all "holocaust" material furnished to them by Zionists and their highly powered propaganda machine.

TYPICAL EXAMPLE

A typical example of this material was the page-long article in the October 17 issue of The Citizen, Johannesburg, entitled "Keeping Stories Of The Holocaust Alive." Written by Glenda Nevill, it was the story of one Miriam Lazarus, a Lithuanian survivor of the "holocaust" whose large smiling 5" x 5" photograph was captioned, "Miriam Lazarus: 'I have an obligation to not let any nation forget the Holocaust.' "Here is her story in The Citizen:

The little girl who escaped the Holocaust by being adopted by a Christian couple is now a mother of three who has a mission to ensure that the stories of the Holocaust never die. Miriam Lazarus's mother, father and older sister were among the thousands of Jews rounded up and imprisoned in a Lithuanian ghetto to await transportation to the German concentration camps of Auschwitz and Dachau Miriam's mother discovered she was pregnant during her imprisonment. German policy at the time was either to shoot pregnant Jewish women or to conduct an abortion.

On September 3, 1941 Miriam was born in the ghetto. Not long after her birth, two German soldiers, seeing the light of the candle flickering after curfew, went to investigate. They forced their way past Miriam's father, and to the amazement of everyone there, picked up the baby, played with her, and never reported her birth.

SECRETLY ARRANGED

The first two years of Miriam's life were spent in the horror and squalor of the ghetto. Her father, knowing the whole family, including the baby, would be exterminated once they were sent to the death camps, secretly arranged with a woodcutter in the nearby forests to find a couple prepared to take Miriam so that she may be saved.

A Christian schoolteacher, Marija Savikiene and her husband, Jonas, had recently lost their own child because of typhoid. After seeing Miriam through the wire fences of the ghetto, they agreed to take her. Every night for one and a half years, Marija waited at a pre-arranged spot in the forest for word that the time had come to hand Miriam over. During the day, she would bring a little milk and an egg and push it under the ghetto fence for the child.

The day came when Miriam's father learnt that they would soon be transported to the death camps. Miriam was wrapped in a sack and smuggled out of the ghetto in the back of a lorry. Shortly afterwards her mother and sister were taken to Auschwitz, where they died in the gas chambers. Her father was sent to Dachau. Miriam, renamed and baptised Neola, continued living with Marija and Jonas believing she was their daughter.

"I used to stand and watch the Jews in the nearby forests being shot in their hundreds. I would ask Marija why. She would tell me it was because they were dirty people. Then I would ask why they shot the children. She never had an answer.

"Later, when I spoke to Holocaust survivors, they would tell me horrific stories about being fired at, then finding themselves alive under mounds of dead bodies of those murdered..."

A MIRACLE

The war ended in 1945 and by some miracle, Miriam's father was one of the few survivors of Dachau. For two years after the liberation, he searched Lithuania for her. Eventually he caught up with them, breaking his promise to Marija that if by some miracle he survived Dachau, he would never try and find her. Miriam's father, desperate for his only surviving family, kidnapped her, took a train to Germany, and presented himself and Miriam at a camp for displaced persons. There they waited for over a year for the papers allowing them entry to South Africa. Miriam's mother's sister lived in Brakpan, and that is where they settled.

TOLD HIS STORY

Later she went to university, met and married Nathan, had three children and lived in comfort. "All was smooth sailing until 1974. My father became ill. I used to talk to him when he was in hospital and one day he said, 'Miriam, you have to know what I went through at Dachau.' "

"He told me things that he'd never told anyone before. He said his biggest crime was breaking his word to Marija. He died three weeks later." It was then that Miriam's life began to change. "I began to think there had to be a reason why I survived. I feel I have an obligation to not allow any nation to forget."

"The memory must be kept alive. Do you know over 90 books have been written saying the Holocaust never happened? History often repeats itself, and something like the Holocaust can't be allowed to happen again."

Miriam became part of Sheerit Hapletah, the Holocaust Survivors Association which was established a couple of years after the war. It has started the Students' Interviewing Project (SHIP) under which students interview survivors and take down their stories. "This way the stories will never die," says Miriam.

Survivors will be attending two major gatherings in Israel next year. The Third World Congress of Jewish Fighters, Partisans and Camp Inmates will be taking place in Tel Aviv from April 29 - May 3. The Mass World Gathering of Survivors of the Holocaust being held from May 6-9, 1985. It is to mark the 40th anniversary of victory over Nazi Germany. (End of quote).

SIMILAR ACCOUNTS

This story of Miriam Lazarus, it will be noted, contains the usual ingredients of similar accounts of "holocaust"survivors, namely of gas chambers, concentration camps and the murders of hundreds of Jews. It is also much like many other such reports of "survivors," whose testimony is based mainly on what they have been told by others and not what they themselves have seen. What is remarkable, however, is that one as young as Miriam Lazarus (at the time she could not have been more than three years of age, having been born on September 3, 1941) should have betaken herself to nearby forests to witness the "shootings of hundreds of Jews."

Thereafter it was apparently all "smooth sailing" for her and her father, in South Africa after the war, and up to 1974—that is, thirty years after the "holocaust"—when her father in his last days told her what "he had gone through in Dachau" (details not given in her story), and which then and there fired her determination "not to let any nation forget the holocaust."

REVISIONIST HISTORIANS

Miriam Lazarus also says that the memories of the "holocaust" must be kept alive forever," because "over 90 books have been written saying that the holocaust never happened. History often repeats itself and something like the holocaust can't be allowed to happen again."

But while no-one will disagree with her that the "holocaust" must never be allowed to happen again, we would emphasise that among the authors of these "90 books" are some distinguished revisionist historians, academics, lawyers and others, who not only have every good reason to dispute the story of the "six million" but who, at the same time, are equally determined that the truth about World War II, and of the "six million" holocaust story, should be brought out into the light and exposed to public scrutiny.

SABC-TV AGAIN JOINS IN

At the same time that Miriam Lazarus's story appeared in The Citizen, there was a spate of other lurid articles on the "holocaust" in a number of the other newspapers. A leader-page of the Rand Daily Mail featured a prominent article on "The Horrors of a Nazi Halfway-House to Hell." The Johannesburg Sunday Star devoted more than a third of a page to "The Angel of Death Living in the U.S.: Responsible for the deaths of more than a million inmates of the Auschwitz concentration camp." And other newspapers, not wishing to be outdone, such as the Durban Sunday Tribune came up with its regular weekly feature of "anti-Nazi" propaganda—all culled from Zionist sources.

Then, to cap it all, revealing once again the extent to which the Zionist halter is tightening on the P.W. Botha Government and on the S.A. Broadcasting Corporation—and the extent to which the SABC-TV has become a regular transmission belt for unrestricted Zionist and anti-German propaganda—the SABC-TV on October 21 started a re-run of the "World At War" TV series, which with its 26 episodes, will run for a year.

The "World At War" series, according to the head of SABC-TV programmes, has ostensibly been brought back by "popular demand of no less than a million viewers."! He would not admit that it was being re-screened on the insistence of the Jewish Board of Deputies and the Zionist Federation. The SABC official seemed pleased to say that the series would, this time, be screened on a Sunday afternoon at 5 pm, in order to enable young South Africans to view the series. When asked whether this would include the "Genocide" episode 20, he replied, "yes, of course"! Incidentally, when the "Genocide" episode was first shown, in 1976, this was done by the SABC-TV at a late hour on a Saturday night, a step calculated by the SABC, in 1976, to spare young viewers what the newspapers were calling the "explicit horrors of contemporary barbarism." Two years before that, in 1974, episode 20 of the "Genocide" film was banned outright by the S.A. Board of Censors!

PREVIEW OF EPISODE 20

A preview of what young South Africans will see when the "Genocide" episode 20 is re-screened for their special benefit, at 5 o'clock on a Sunday afternoon—and also all done in the "national interest," no doubt—may be judged from what the SABC's Radio-TV bulletin had to say when this Episode 20 was screened for the first time, in 1976.

Together with a large picture of a "Krematorium" this Episode 20 was widely advertised in the SABC-TV's bulletin in these terms, in 1976:

It didn't take Hitler and his Nazis long to find a solution to what the Fuhrer called the "Jewish problem." The question used to be "what shall we do with them" but it became "how shall we exterminate them?" It soon became apparent to Adolf Eichmann that a task of such magnitude needed meticulous planning. How the Nazis set about the task, how those that survived were affected and how the rest of the world reacted to the discovery of the horrors perpetrated in the concentration camps is the subject of tonight's episode. It is recommended that the film is not suitable for children. (End of quote.)

The estimated two million viewers who then watched the "Genocide" episode—according to the Oppenheimer-controlled English press and all the Afrikaans "Nationalist" newspapers—witnessed some of "the horror of the sick lunacy that swept Germany when six million or more Jews were exterminated in the deadliest, most organised, ethnic extermination programme in history."

"The murders, committed in the name of the Aryan German Reich, were done solely because of Hitler's racial theories."

'MOST HORRIFYING ASPECT'

"In all," these newspapers were pleased to tell the public, "there were over thirty principal concentration camps all of which had their 'Totenbuch' (death book)."

"It was right that the Genocide episode 20 of the "World at War" series was shown by the SABC.

"It was right that they showed all 52 minutes and 51 seconds of a programme devoted to the murder of a race.

"But for all the gas chambers, hangings, shootings and mass graves, the burning flesh, it was not the stench of death that lingered. It was the mind behind it all that rocked the brain. The cool, calculated so-called logic behind it all, this was the most horrifying aspect," these newspapers went on.

"Yes, all that killing. One person born a Jew, then multiply that person six million times. It could not possibly be true. But it was," these newspapers stated emphatically.

It certainly was true—yes—to the brainwashed South African public and to all the English and Afrikaans newspapers which today faithfully relay the propaganda of the left and far-left. But it was certainly NOT true to the historian whose aim is historical truth and the discrediting of misleading myths which are a barrier to real goodwill among nations. Valid historical research, it must be emphasised, is the difference between propaganda and science; and truth and rationality are always the first victims of any propaganda, such as the myth of the "six million" holocaust.

REGARDED AS 'UNDERSTATEMENT'

Some newspapers even went so far as to say that Episode 20 was an "understatement" of what had actually happened and regretted that greater detail was not shown! Among enthusiastic Gentile viewers of Episode 20 was the Johannesburg housewife who described the part where corpses were bulldozed into a pit as being "pretty horrendous," and went on to say that she was "amazed that something so gruesome could be presented so well"!

But how was she to know that the pictures of the corpses might well have been those taken in Dresden, where nearly a quarter of a million German civilian men, women and children were killed by thousands of American and British planes raining high explosive and incendiary bombs on them, for three days and nights, while they were attempting to flee the advancing Russians.

The pictures of corpses shown in Episode 20 might also have been taken

SOME REFLECTIONS ON THE IDEAS OF W. CLEON SKOUSEN 20 YEARS LATER

by
Peter H. Peel, Ph.D.

I. THE MORPHOLOGY OF REVOLUTION

This section will be largely limited to comparisons of the Bolshevik coup d'etat of November 1917 and the American revolution of 1776. I shall by-pass in so doing (reluctantly) two questions which immediately present themselves: first, is it really appropriate to use the term "revolution" to describe a successful colonial revolt against a mother-country which had evolved—though this was seldom perceived at the time—into an essentially foreign power?; second, was the Bolshevik "revolution" unique in being neither a revolution nor a Russian nativist coup? As to the latter, I could not read Skousen's book without the phrase "Hamlet without the Prince in Denmark" continually coming to mind. In any case, neither so-called revolution fits the pattern of such revolutions as the English revolutions of 1642 and 1688, the French revolutions of 1789, 1792, 1795, 1830, 1848 and 1870, or the endemic revolutions which entertain the twenty or so mestizo nations south of the Rio Grande del Norte or the sovereign jungledoms between the Sahara and the Zambesi. Yet some common features do pertain. The leadership in the English revolution of 1642-1660 was the squirearchy and lower gentry: in 1688 there was an aberrant factor, the leaders were the great Whig aristocrats though with the ardent support of the lower middle class. The French revolution—rather, series of revolutions prior to Napoleon's ambiguous dictum, "La revolution est achevé," really began with an aristocratic revolt in 1787.* In this "curtain-raiser" were commingled various conspiratorial elements such as the devious machinations of the Duc d'Orleans who aimed at the throne (and ended on the guillotine in 1794) and the Masonic conspiracy of deist intellectuals against the oppression (so seen) of the established church. Masonry, of course, played a large part in the American revolution. Most of the important Founding Fathers were masons and it is no accident that our paper money, for example, incorporates such masonic symbols as the "all-seeing" eye and the pyramid. If we choose to think of Masonry as a kind of esoteric religous cult, then certain slightly strained analogies can be made with the proliferations of cults in the court circles of the last Tsar,* theosophy, for example, or the personal cult of Gregory Efimovitch Rasputin. However, the French revolution of May, 1789, like the overthrow of the Tsar in March, 1917, was a revolution of and by mainly discontented bourgeois and educated liberals. Neither were wholly democratic in intent and in this way had something in common with the American revolution and its leadership by the discontented New England merchant class and the Virginia squires. The coup d'etat or putsch which the Bolsheviks achieved literally overnight in November, 1917 was carried out in the capital and consolidated later by force and terror. But the leaders of the coup, though they called themselves Bolsheviki meaning "majorityites" because of a momentary majority in a meeting in London in 1903, were actually a minority branch of a relatively small party and apart from Vladimir Ilytch Ulianov (Lenin) who looked like a Tartar and whose mother's family may have been Jewish, and Joseph Djugashvili (Stalin), the leadership of the party was almost exclusively made up of bourgeois, Jewish intelligentsia, augmented by a number of Jews from the Lower East Side of New York—Lev Bronstein (Trotsky) among them. It is this remarkable Jewishness which Skousen's book, in typically Bircher fashion, totally ignores. Yet Western writers of the time were quite frank about this. At all events, there is nothing here comparable to the colonial revolt in America unless it be the bourgeois class and intellectual acuity of the leaders.

True revolutions cannot be sustained or consolidated by a handful—or a few hundred—intellectuals. Foot soldiers are necessary. It was the absence of foot soldiers more than anything else which doomed the Paulskirche parliament in Frankfurt in 1848—that ludicrous gaggle of garrulous professors and lawyers which, like the All Russian Constitutional Convention of January, 1918, was dispersed by a few soldiers, never to reassemble.

The Americans had foot soldiers. So did the Bolsheviks. Lenin had mutinous soldiers and greedy, land-hungry peasants. The soldiers poured back from the front—an army which had become a demoralized rabble. They "voted with their feet," said Lenin. The American foot soldiers were frontiersmen, the poor, and recent immigrants including Irish, Germans and renegade Englishmen of the type of Thomas Paine.

A factor which is very prominent in the French and Russian revolutions but is also discernible to a limited extent in the American, is frustration in the matter of upward social mobility. The disaffected bourgeoisie of the Third Estate in France for whom many careers were closed off as preserves of the aristocracy, and the educated, radical Jews in Russia, shared the same bitter rancor and resentment. There are some traces—nothing more—of this in the colonies. In France, a commission in a good regiment required as many as sixteen great-great-grandparents must have been members of the nobility. And officers of the colonial militia were ineligible for commissions in the British regiments and ranked below regular officers of inferior rank.

* The reference is to Nicholas II although, technically, he was not the last Tsar. His brother Michael succeeded him for one day.

The European revolutions, however, have always involved an element of genuine hardship at the lowest economic level. The American colonists on the other hand did rather well out of smuggling. The sporadic and rather feeble British attempts to enforce the navigation acts or to collect taxes to meet some of the costs of colonial defense brought about little if any hardship. There was, nevertheless, a considerable raw resentment compounded of many grievances. Subversive conspiracies like the Sons of Liberty kept aflame a sense of economic injustice and oppression by agitation and propaganda.

An ideology, irrespective of its intrinsic merits or logic, seems to be a necessary revolutionary ingredient. In the colonies, as in France, the Zeitgeist of the eighteenth century pressed everywhere for the demolition of organically evolved social and political structures and their replacement with neat blueprints drawn up by the best analytical minds of the soidisant "Age of Reason." Constitution-making was the intellectual preoccupation of the times. This is profoundly true for the American intelligentsia of which Thomas Jefferson was, perhaps, the paradigm. And it is true for France which, having drawn up with great excitement and elan a Constitution in 1791, proceeded to draw up a new one every few years thereafter, so enjoyable was the experience, and was still at it as late as 1958 (the Fifth Republic). The Americans have never actually drawn up a new Constitution. They only amend it so often—twenty-six times to date—that the Founding Fathers might be hard pressed to recognize it.

At all events, the ideology of the colonial leadership is clearly enough expressed in the Declaration of Independence, a document which its authors believed to be the epitome of self-evident rationality but which is actually beautiful, romantic poetry involving many unverifiable postulates and assumptions.*

The Bolsheviks really had the best of it in the ideological field. They had a kind of religion. The ineluctable laws of history were God; Marx was the divine prophet; Lenin was the Caliph Omar or St. Paul; Das Kapital was the holy text. Max Eastman, a disenchanted United States Communist, wrote a book about twenty or so years ago entitled Marxism: Is it Science?—a rethorical question which he then answered by demonstrating that Marxism is, in fact, a religous faith, not a science. Besides the characteristics of religion already mentioned, it has an eschatalogy. Come the full achievement of Communism (after the purgative period of socialism and the dictatorship of the proletariat) the very nature of man will be changed, man will be "redeemed" in fact. Lions will lie down with lambs and wolves with sheep. History, which is only the history of the class struggle, will come to an end. Again the vision is of the New Jerusalem, the "Heavenly City." It is an unhealthy and very Levantine chiliasm which is at least as old as St. Augustine in its generic type. In practice, Marxist predictions and prophesies mostly break down. According to canon dogma, the first proletarian revolution should have occurred in the advanced industrial nations. They occurred instead in backward Russia, pastoral Hungary, and later were most successful in countries like China, Cuba, Ethiopia, Indo-China and other less-than-shining-lights of industrial and scientific advance. Marxist doctrine demands (and this is the reason true Marxists hate reformers) an inevitable historical process in which the rich become richer and the poor become poorer from the beginning of the commercial and industrial world of capitalism until the overthrow by violence of the exploiting bourgeois ruling class. The devil of Marxism is not the monarch or the aristocrat: it is the industrialist, the banker, the "millocrat." The history of the rise of labor in the United States, Europe, Japan and Taiwan clearly demonstrates the falsity of the orthodox Marxist scenario.

* I recommend most highly, for those who believe in the Age of Reason and the Enlightenment, a witty and elegant little book written by an eminent American historian some fifty years ago (still in print), The Heavenly City of the Eighteenth Century Philosophers, by Carl Becker.

Most devastating of all is the necessity in Marxist theory of subscribing to a blind faith in the absolute equality of potential in all individuals and all races. Environment is all. Marxism and liberal democracy both feed at the trough of John Locke's "tabula rasa" nonsense. If environment, the modes of production and distribution, can be changed and bring about a radical change in man's basic nature and instincts (actually, Marxists are very uncomfortable with the word "instincts"), then hereditary differences are negligible and certainly mutable by manipulation of the environment. The Lamarckian thesis of the inheritabi'ty of acquired characteristics was long since exploded by Darwin and Mendel, but despite the odd misreading of Darwin which caused Marx to consider dedicating Das Kapital to him, Darwinian evolution by natural selection is as antipathetic to Marxism as it was to William Jennings Bryan and all fundamentalists to the present day. It is the opposition between science on the one hand and superstition on the other. Hence even that master opportunist, cynic and pragmatist, Joseph Stalin, permitted the mountebank Trofim Lysenko to inflict great injury on Russian agriculture by tinkering with crops in accordance with an ideological pseudo-science derived from Lamarck. It is necessary to understand that liberal democracy holds just as tenaciously as Marxism to the environmentalist dogma as necessary to the support of its egalitarian prejudices. It is thus, also, bitterly intolerant of even distinguished scientists who challenge or appear to challenge its adamantine faith. Examples are the physical violence, shouting down, and other forms of suppression which have been directed in recent years against men like Nobel prize winner Dr. William Shockley, Dr. Arthur Jensen of U.C.L.A., Professor Hans Eysenck and many others, or the scandalous campaign to besmirch the memory of the late, great Sir Cyril Burt. Marxism and liberal democracy are both Christian heresies just as Christianity is a Jewish heresy. Both political ideologies exhibit characteristics of religions and like most religions bitterly persecute their own heretics (when they can) with a savagery and fervor far beyond the animosity they show to the "pagan." It would be absurd to suggest, however, that Marxism and liberal democracy are one and the same. There is a profound difference, for example, between the measures adopted by the newly-formed U.S.S.R. to enforce orthodoxy and to maintain control of the society and those measures or actions which aimed at stability and consensus in the young United States. In America, the "tories" or loyalists were mostly driven out or chose exile and lost their property. But though some violence and general harassment occurred, it was neither officially condoned nor very extensive. Later, the Alien and Sedition Acts of Adams' administration were short-lived. And though they are deplored by liberals today, they seem to this writer to have been not at all unreasonable, and a worthwhile, though ultimately futile, attempt to preserve the ethnic indentity and culture of the nation. The Americans had no reason to fear massive attacks by foreign armies. The British were not interested and were too deeply involved with revolutionary and Napoleonic France. The French were engaged in more than twenty years of European warfare and anxious to disengage from responsibilities in North America. Spain was an otiose power. Furthermore, the Anglo-Saxon traditions of liberty and justice were part of the natural heritage of the new United States.

Post-revolutionary Russia presented a very different scene. Russia experienced two years of savage civil war and armed intervention by American, British and French forces. The hideous murders of the royal family and of thousands of less elevated people (a concomitant of Communist take-overs everywhere, it would seem—as in China, Cuba, Cambodia, "Zimbabwe," and Ethiopia, for example) had alienated the civilized world. Under a baffling succession of acronyms--CHEKA, OGPU, GPU, NKVD, KGB, etc.—the dreaded State Secret Police maintained a reign of terror. Similar bloody haemorrhages accompanied the short-lived Bolshevik coups in Hungary and Bavaria immediately after the first Word War. And paranoia, whether in the genes of the Russians or as a result of their historical experiences, is a constant factor in their dealings with the rest of the world.

There can be no real question that freedom of expression in speech and writing is more nearly (but not totally) absolute in the United States than in any other country in the world. This is not only so evident that no proof is needed in respect of the Communist countries; regrettably it is true also even among the other "democracies" such as Canada, Britain, France and the area under the Bonn regimé. If Congress should ratify the so-called "genocide treaty," however, we may be as badly off in this respect as any other nation and will certainly have surrendered national sovereignty and the security of the citizen against malevolent aliens. Free speech and writing is unofficially suppressed in the United States by terrorism and violence, arson, death-threats, physical assault, extensive vandalism, deprivation of livelihood, the denial of access to the major media and social ostracism—the last being the least of the hardships. But at least freedom of expression exists in law—unlike, say, Britain with its muzzling Race Relations Acts or Bonn with its banned books ("youth-endangering") or Canada with similar forbidden books. We have no Lubianka cellars and no Gulag archipelagos. Not yet!

Education is a different matter. In Communist countries, the young are taught to admire and respect the leaders and founders and to give uncritical loyalty to the system. A distorted picture of the West is presented which emphasizes and exaggerates all our shortcomings and glosses over our accomplishments. But the appalling fact is that we sin in exactly the same way although in the opposite direction. The teaching of history in the United States is a horrifying demonstration of the Orwellian thesis that he who controls the present controls the past and he who controls the past controls the future. W. Cleon Skousen's book is a polemic and a rather crude one at that and not above, at times, what looks less like error than willful dishonesty. It is redolent of a kind of Bircher-Yankee-doodle-paranoia which is almost the mirror image of Russian paranoia. I propose to justify this contention below. Skousen is not a scholar. He was formerly a police officer in Salt Lake City. I am much more troubled by the character of history textbooks to which unsophisticated young minds are exposed. The worst example (of a generally objectionable lot) which I have encountered recently is a textbook of American history currently widely used in California high schools and colleges.* It is, however, only a rather extreme example of an ubiquitous and unconscionable feature of all such books. History is properly the record of the past actions and thoughts of a species of featherless biped; the attempt to abstract intelligible patterns from such study and just possibly and with great caution to predict when called upon to do so the probability of such patterns recurring in the future. Some purists, indeed, would even reject the notion of predictive value—which is just one of the reasons why history is not "social science." That is, it is subject neither to experiment nor, some say, predictive function. That history is unavoidably subjective in no way releases the historian from the obligations of honor. He must aim for von Ranke's goal—to tell it "wie es eigentlich gewesen." And though this ideal is always beyond total attainment, it demands an austere self-discipline in the practitioner and teacher. History is not a moral exercise or a pulpit for preachments and value judgments and normative writing. Yet through countless recommended assigned or required textbooks in use in American schools which I have examined, I have yet to find one which does not present history in terms of the author's prejudices and as a moralistic conflict between good guys and bad guys, laudable institutions and reprehensible ones, "true" ideas and false ones. And the nearer one draws to the twentieth century the more blatant and outrageous this becomes. Every page is full of tendentious remarks and loaded words. In Anglo-American disputes, the British "look down their aristocratic noses." In World War II, the Allies' soldiers fight bravely but the Japanese "fanatically." Personalities of whom the writers disapprove are said to rant and scream and deliver hysterical orations. Or they are masters of deceit and cruelty. The good guys are clever, the bad guys are "crafty." Napoleon is one of the authors' bad guys and is therefore described as a "past-master of deceit." The writers' heroes, however, if occasionally shown to be less than divine, are nevertheless models of wisdom and righteousness. All the prescribed left-liberal views are offered with regard to colonial empires, slavery, Senator Joseph McCarthy, Martin Luther King, the "Hollywood Ten," Sacco and Vanzetti and no conflicting views or interpretations are presented. Since those modern pulpits, the television and movie screen, are indefatigable in the promotion of the approved orthodoxies, it is remarkable that any capacity for individual and critical thought remains. And as I have already indicated, the punishment for those still tough-minded enough to espouse heterodox views can be personal catastrophe.

II. SKOUSEN'S BOOK: QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

Communism is not in itself a conspiracy. Communism is a theory of social organization. Conspiracies exist and have always done so but conspiracies are made by people, among them Communists. Conspiracies to assassinate rulers and seize power for some dissident group are as old as human history. Thus there have been and continue to be conspiracies among Communists to extend the areas under their direct control or to subvert regimés and destroy or discredit individual enemies which, or who, are considered to be antipathetic to their goals or dangerous to Communist regimés. I have already touched on some of the conspiratorial aspects in revolutions long antedating the publication of the Communist Manifesto in 1848. Nor is "Communist" an exact synonym for "Marxist." At base, all the word really means is the communal ownership of the resources of a given society. In this sense, many primitive people live in Communist societies and the organization of the Russian peasant village in Tsarist days—the Mir—was Communist. Marxism, on the other hand, is an elaborately constructed philosophical and economic theory built on inverted Hegelian thought and seeking to justify "scientifically" milleniarian Communism. When we are seduced into calling history "social science" we are unwittingly endorsing to some degree the Marxist claims. This is not the place to discuss dialectical materialism or the "great waltz of history" (history in three-quarter time). For our purpose, it is enough to point out that Marx, though born in 1818, was essentially an eighteenth century thinker whose ideas were derived eclectically from Hegel, Helvetius and Holach, Judaic Messianism, and the classical materialist philosophers like Heraclitus and Democritus. In the early nineteenth century, as in the late eighteenth, there was a great vogue for constructing mechanical theories of history. The prestige of the exact sciences since the Newtonian revolution had conviced thinkers that they could discover immutable and universal laws of collective human behavior and construct utopias accordingly. Jefferson and Rousseau are eighteenth-century examples; Saint-Simon, Charles Fourrier, August Comte, Henry Buckle and Karl Marx are among the examples in the nineteenth century. The generosity of this wealthy patron, Friedrich Engels, the exploitation of his wife's slender resources and sundry other unsavory expedients enabled Marx to produce the bulk of that turgid work of pseudo-science which was completed by Engels and published as the three volumes of Das Kapital. Turgid or not, it is not a stupid book and was sufficiently plausible in its thesis to convince many highly intelligent malcontents like Lenin that it represented eternal verities. The implementation of Marxist theory was, however, a prospect which revolted the vast majority of men of all classes. The religious, and that meant most men in the nineteenth century, were appalled by its atheism (which derived from the sceptical previous century like most of Marx's thought). Persons of property understandably frowned on programs to communalize property. The liberals of those days, quite unlike the liberals of today, were spiritual kin of the modern conservatives in their enthusiasm for individual responsibility and self-reliance. Necessarily, then, Communists conspired and, in autocratic states, went underground or into exile. Russia was especially racked with violence and the violent reaction to violence from the hideous assassination of Tsar Alexander II in 1881 by Jewish radicals to the murder in the Kiev opera house in 1911 of Peter Stolypin, the Russian Prime Minister, by another Jew. Tsar And Prime Minister were both murdered not because they were reactionaries but precisely they were effective reformers whose actions might undercut the malevolent aims of the dedicated and irreconcilable revolutionaries. In the first years following the Bolshevik cou ', the Moscow government promoted, financed and directed revolutionary Communist organizations in the capitalist states. The instrument was the Comintern or Third International. This destabilizing (to use a modern term) policy was not so very different in nature to the activities of the C.I.A. today. This is not a moral assessment of either organization. Such are simply the tools of Realpolitik in the world that is—not the world that sentimentalists and little maidens would like it to be. In any case, the operations of the Comintern were really not very successful between the wars. It failed completely in Italy, Germany and Spain and a clumsy attempt to promote a Communist revolution in England in 1924 was exposed and evoked a strong patriotic and conservative backlash. But we live in a world in which the major powers are, and always have been, engaged in these kinds of activities in their own interests. And the Communist world today is certainly not a monolithic entity. Albania goes its own enigmatic way, Yugoslavia and Rumania have demonstrated that they are hardly vassal states and there is hostility between the pragmatic and practical Chinese and their erstwhile Russian mentors. As I write, news reaches the West that Deng Xiaoping has uttered the unspeakable; has dared to blaspheme the sacred prophets Marx and Lenin and declare that Marxism is old-fashioned and inappropriate in the modern world.

As to another question raised by Skousen—whether Communism has significantly altered the history of the world—it contains the philosophical assumption that there are, or could be, alternative world histories and this is an assumption which is by no means indisputable. But to meet Skousen's question at his own level, the answer is probably a qualified "yes." That is to say, its ideology has been another important input factor in the complex relationships between states and in the internal affairs of many of them. But a very strong case can be made concerning the first and most important Communist state, that Russian foreign policy is almost exactly what it would have been under a strong Tsar. I am prepared to argue that Stalin was to twentieth-century Russia what Peter the Great was to eighteenth-century Russia—intelligent, ruthless, hard-headed opportunists, both. Each dragged a reluctant nation into its own century with kicks and curses. Each expanded the national territory. Neither were really ideologues though Stalin went through the mandatory motions in his writings. What a picture the Teheran and Yalta conferences make! There sit the three putative movers and shakers of the world's destiny—two second-rate minds filled with folies de grandeur, one a sick cripple, the other a drunken sot gifted only as a phrasemaker but convinced of his military genius. And there sits the third member of the cabal—cynical, ruthless, truly machiavellian and a master of Realpolitik. A democratic egalitarian might be inclined to speculate that Stalin had the cunning of his peasant origins and Churchill and Roosevelt the delusions deriving from their aristocratic heritage. I do not endorse this view but it is not without serious merit. But there are ultimate limits to what any of the trio could accomplish, even F.D.R.'s "good old Uncle Joe." For Stalin died in 1953, probably murdered. Roosevelt, of course, died in 1944 and Churchill, after several years of increasing senility, in 1965. Roosevelt's successor was a Missouri haberdasher boosted by the Kansas City Pendergast machine; Churchill's successors after 1955 were a series of prime ministers whose main objectives seemed to be to dissolve the British Empire as quickly as possible and make the adjective "Great" in "Great Britain" an embarrassment for any Englishman with pride and sensitivity. Stalin's successors have also been generally second-raters but Stalin had built while the leaders of the West had destroyed. The British can have no illusions that they are still a great power, still less that they are the richest and most powerful nation in the world as they were generally admitted to be in the nineteenth century. This is perhaps fortunate for them since they have the opportunity to face reality and make the choice of the hard road of vigorous rebuilding or the steady degeneration in the garbage dump of former great peoples. The United States is not yet afforded such a clear picture of "either–or." Technical marvels are still being created; and the resources created by past generations and the natural wealth of the continent all tend to disguise from ordinary citizens that the decay is well set in throughout this land of so much promise.

And if the world could be changed by the muttering of incantations or the waving of wands, no doubt the Communist powers would soon have us all members of a universally Communist planet. Whether that would make the slightest difference with regard to our squabbling and jockeying for power and gain is very doubtful. Neither Christianity nor Islam as supranational worldviews have made much difference to national and racial rivalries. The arrogant plotters of Bretton Woods and subsequent international conferences with their increasingly evident plans for a raceless, rootless future world under the benign aegis of the great multinational corporations and super banks looks a lot more close to realization than the Communist goals.

One answer to the appeal of Communism would be an equally powerful countervailing credo; a religion for a religion; fire to fight fire. The question is what religion. And, in fact, are any of the major religions really credible to educated men in the twentieth century? Or does that matter? Should we only be concerned with the religiosity which seems instinctual in the masses of men? Islam seems to have stanched the advance of Communism to some degree. As long as the worship of Mammon holds sway in the United States, the appeal of Communism will not be likely to advance much beyond the camps of society's rejects and misfits. It has seldom if ever gained power through the ballot box even in France or Italy which have large Communist parties. Christianity seems to this writer a broken reed in view of the increasing cosying up of the trendy churches to the extreme Left.* Capitalist greed certainly aids the economic survival of Communist regimés through extended credits, low interest, long-term loans and vast sales of agricultural produce. This probably does not increase and may well diminish the likelihood of active subversion in Western nations planned or directed by Communist powers. After all, why flog a willing horse?

As to the chance that there is a war room in the Kremlin where malignant plotters are devising plans for planetary conquest, the notion is simplistic to the point of idiocy. World conquest in a military sense has never been a practical possibility and Alexander the Great was probably the last man who thought it was—and his mother and the temple priests of Zeus-Ammon had convinced him that he was a god. This does not apply to the infinitely gullible masses. President Roosevelt and his co-conspirators had little difficulty in making millions of Americans believe that the Nazis had plans to transport armies some five thousand miles from Europe to South America and to invade the United States by advancing through Central America and Mexico. The logistics of such an operation are, of course, utterly incredible. One has only to consider the enormous problems for the vast Allied armies in crossing the narrow English Channel in June 1944 and landing in Normandy against the opposition of a numerically much inferior foe, who, however, had no available navy or air force to intercept or harass the invasion fleet. Roosevelt's horror stories had about as much plausibility as Orson Welles' Martian invasion of 1939—the radio dramatization of H. G. Wells' War of the Worlds which had thousands of panic-stricken ordinary Americans fleeing the monsters from the red planet.

But it will be argued that a Communist takeover does not necessarily involve direct military action. Can the Communists "sell" their system in one way or another? Much will depend on factors which are imponderable. If this planet continues to harbor ever more billions of human and humanoid creatures; if life becomes ever harsher and drabber and lacking in beauty and grace; if we are beset by natural or man-made disasters beyond our power to cope with; if any one or combination of a score of unpredictable misfortunes come upon us, then a generation of the genetically botched and television bedoped might capitulate to the siren song of the Left Collectivists.

Skousen avers, absurdly, that Socialism and Communism are the same thing and supports this claim by pointing out that the U.S.S.R. describes itself as a Union of socialist republics. It does, of course, because in Marxist eschatology "Socialism" is a phrase which an embattled Soviet Union must go through until the whole world is enlightened and adopts Marxism. If Socialism and Communism were identical, then we are already Communist because many of our institutions are already socialist, the public school system, for example, or the post office, social security, welfare, medicare, county hospitals, and many others. We are very far from being a pristine, Adam-Smith-type, rugged individualist nation. In fact, stripped of its spectral rags, all socialism means (and there are many kinds of socialism, including National Socialism) is the recognition that man is a social animal like other primates and the acceptance of social responsibility for the individual members of the society.

Finally, I wish to take some time to deal with the question of the spectre of a nuclear holocaust which so preoccupies American thinking or, rather, feeling. With it is associated the question of how we can "stop Communism." To the latter issue, I would respond that we should not be so obsessed with stopping Communism which is probably an impossible goal for our foreign policy unless we are prepared to feed, clothe, house, educate and entertain a mostly envious and rancorous world at a level which corresponds to our own. The problem is to stymie, frustrate and out-manoeuvre Russian foreign policy or the policy of any foreign power which runs counter to our own perceived interests. There is another solution which is almost as repulsive as submission to international Communism: that is submission to international Capitalism. This we seem to be in a fair way of doing already with the suicidal free trade policies of the Euro-American nations and the vast, unsecured and probably unrepayable export of capital to dead-beat scraps of jungle or desert that have arrogated to themselves the ridiculous titles of "nation" in recent decades. Some of these welching countries openly brag that they will default as a matter of policy. Such was the statement of Julius Nyere of Tanzania a few days prior to the writing of this article. An alternative world then to one unified under Communist domination is one of nominally independent sovereign states but which is, in fact, controlled by multinational corporations and international banks which implement policies of equalizing out the world's wealth or poverty and reducing all mankind to a miscegenated and undifferentiated khaki mass. Much has been done already on these lines with the apparently unstoppable and continuing immigration into the United States and Western Europe of millions of racial aliens and the massive trade deficits as well as the erosion of domestic industries and the total destruction of some by unrestricted imports from the Third World. The process is accelerating as brain-washing and brain burn-out is effected through the pulpits of the entertainment media, the churches and the academy.

* This is a situation which can only get worse. It is the nature of all organisms to seek increase in power—or sicken and die. Churches, like all other organisms, instinctively obey this law. As the white world grows more sceptical, the churches turn their attention to the Third World masses, and bait their hooks with socialist doctrines. Such behavior is rarely wholly consciously determined. Instinct is much more important, as it is in most philosophical, political and religious commitments. In one form or another the goal is always power.

But as long as the world is divided between Capitalist and Communist states isn't there a dreadful prospect of doomsday; of the ultimate nuclear holocaust? My answer is that the danger is minimal already and will diminish yet more with the passage of time. "A spectre is haunting Europe" . . .and North America. The students at Brown University recently presented us with the unedifying spectacle of a demand for suicide pills in the event of a nuclear war. This action appears to have been meant as a symbolic gesture but it epitomizes a decadent and gutless frame of mind. The blame for the widespread, neurotic pessimism among the young (when it isn't simply a fashionable, sophomoric pose or a handy excuse for self-indulgence) falls squarely on the shoulders of two generations of parents who have inculcated in their offspring the fear of a horrible bogyman...a spectre. The time is long overdue to dispel this wraith with some calm analysis of the odds of a nuclear war ever occurring between the major powers. It could happen, of course. For that matter, the earth could be impacted by a meteor which, if a mere quarter of a mile in diameter, would devastate the planet and wipe out a large proportion of the biota.* The chances of either event are, fortunately, minuscule. In fact, I submit that major war of any kind is highly unlikely although minor wars will probably always be with us since the cure for that is some form of planetary tyranny which is worse than the disease.

Our only conceivable adversary in a nuclear war—for a very long time to come—is the Soviet Union. We need not fear that some pestiferous and irresponsible little nation will trick the superpowers into a war as the Israeli's attempted to do in the "Lavon affair." If any minor power launches a nuclear missile with the intent to mislead the target country as to its origin the attempt is doomed from the start. We and the Russians now have the technology to establish instantly the source of any such missile. And there is always the hot-line.

* Elaborate calculations of the kinetic energy released in such a collision have verified this rather startling claim.

In the early years following the Bolshevik coup, it is possible that the gang of wild-eyed, starveling fanatics and their Khazar masters might—might—have launched a nuclear attack in pursuit of their messianic, pseudo-religion. But they hadn't the technology. Not so today. Not even in Stalin's time for Stalin was a pragmatist par excellence and the only one of the gang of war criminals at Yalta who came out smelling like a rose. Russia gained 250,000 square miles of territory—mostly from former possessions of the Tsars which had been lost in 1918—and 25,000,000 new subjects (whether they would or not). Russia also gained hegemony over Eastern Europe although that has partially eroded since. And Russia became the only other superpower.

And today? Today the leaders of the Soviet Union are old men with grandchildren to dandle on their knees, chauffeur-driven Zil automobiles, vacations in the Crimea and comfortable dachas outside Moscow—and, doubtless, all the health problems of the geriatric. They are as aware as we of the probable results of an all-out nuclear war and the vast overkill we both possess—even the onset of a dreaded nuclear winter and the extinction of all higher forms of life on this planet. As for large-scale conventional war, it is almost equally unlikely. Both sides know the dreadful temptation for the side facing defeat to resort to nuclear weapons. This is especially true since we have demonstrated as of 1946 that we have retrogressed to the judicial murder of the leaders of the vanquished side.

There is also the historical experience of the Russians to take into account. Their skin-of-the-teeth survival in the so-called Second World War was so traumatic that they are still paranoid about the imagined danger from a mere fraction of a brutally vivisected Germany. That war is their retrospective bogyman. They have been bogged down in Afghanistan for five years and suffered heavy casualties at the hands of a relatively small number of primitive tribesmen. Is it conceivable that they would suddenly decide to roll across Central and Western Europe and perhaps cross the English Channel? Perhaps they could do it—but to what purpose? The cost would be heavy to begin with and the on-going resistance in every country would be a dreadful haemorrhage without end. When 300,000 of Napoleon's troops were tied down in Spain for five years in a hideous guerilla war, he called it his "Spanish ulcer." All Europe would be Russia's "ulcer." That country has not even felt equal to squelching heretical Rumania or Yugoslavia. Finland, a former possession of the Tsars, retains its independence having lost only Petsamo and part of Finno-Karelia. When it looked some months ago as if the Jaruzelski regime in Poland were in danger of being overthrown, the Bear growled but did not act.

For the Soviet army to occupy not only her Eastern European satellites but also all Western and Southern Europe as well would not only ensure a costly guerilla war but one waged over impossibly vulnerable and stretched supply lines. There would almost certainly be defection and revolt in the captive nations. What could possibly be worth all that? It is only the first generation of crusaders that captures Jerusalem, or bursts out of the Arabian desert to impose Islam on half the world, or establishes the vast empires of Cyrus or Alexander or Genghis Khan. Their grandchildren are sensible, unimaginative men with their minds on the practical and profitable. They weigh and are cautious and lack the fanaticism (or vision) which conquers worlds.

Russia will always have to be watched, of course, and the Great Game of international diplomacy will always be in play. But nowadays it is to ensure that there are no easy pickings left around for her—or for any ambitious power. But let us stop giving our children nightmares. There will never again be wars on the scale of the four world wars between 1756 and 1945. Let us stop building ever larger nuclear stockpiles at ruinous cost.

If the Russians, who have been a paranoid people since the Mongol invasions of the thirteenth century, choose to bankrupt themselves, so much the better. If the Western nuclear powers—the United States, Canada, Britain and France—retain enough state-of-the-art missiles to vitrify six or eight major Russian cities—say, Moscow, Leningrad, Kiev, Dnepropetrovks, Gorky, Perm, Novosibirsk and Sverdlovsk—it doesn't matter a gnat's knickers if the Russians' nuclear arsenal could wipe out all life in the galaxy, they are not going to try it.*

Some disturbing questions remain. Are we to blame for this insane and apparently unstoppable arms race and for an astronomical national debt which threatens like the Tower of Babel to collapse and bury us all? Is it exploitation at the hands of the armaments industry and its bought politicians? Perhaps it is something analogous to the irresponsible, unsecured loans made by our big banks to rat-hole countries—another unscrupulous rip-off of the American tax-payer who will be called upon to redeem the losses caused by defaulting mud people. Is it then a parallel empire-building gravy-train for the military-industrial complex?

And there is yet another sinister motive possible to exlain the maintenance of unending hostility between the rough equivalents of George Orwell's "Oceania" and "Eurasia." It appears to justify the continuing presence of large numbers of American troops in Europe as necessary to its defense. But such a presence reinforces profound political pressures on Europe's supposedly sovereign governments and is also disastrously demoralizing. There is a clear historical precedent. The Ancient Britons were a brave, warrior people who twice fought against the Roman invaders in 55 and 54 B.C and forced them to withdraw. Nearly a hundred years later, the Romans came back but for several decades met with fierce resistance and sometimes defeat. Eventually, however, military discipline and superior technology prevailed and the Britons settled down under Roman protection for another two hundred and fifty years, tamed, domesticated pseudo-Romans and utterly dependent upon the occupation forces to protect them against external enemies. So it was that, when the legions finally withdrew, we read pathetic pleas for their return—"the groans of the Britons." The Britons no longer had the manhood or sturdy self-reliance to conduct their own defense. They had become an effete people who could repel neither the savage Picts and Irish nor the virile and uncorrupted Germans. Thus the language and culture of the latter became our Anglo-Saxon heritage, not that of the Romanized Britons. As the American legions remain in Europe indefinitely, the United States, willy-nilly, imposes its own moral, cultural and political hegemony on Europe and aborts any truly European resurgence, especially the restoration to life and independent nationhood of a proud and reunited Germany. Even this might be tolerable if the United States were still a nation and fulfilling the wonderful promise of its early days. But it is no longer a sovereign state which pursues a foreign policy in its own exclusive interests. It is now a polyglot, polyracial empire, fast on the way to becoming a new "Austria-Hungary" with all the centrifugal forces that implies. When the Founding Fathers wrote that "all men are created equal" it was not true even then but at least what they meant were men like themselves, civilized, educated Anglo-Saxons. They have been betrayed. They are to modern Americans what the Romans of the period before the Punic Wars were to the polyglot, polyracial "Roman" populace of the first century A.D.—those scourings of North Africa, the Near East and the Levant which caused Juvenal to cry, "In Tiberim defluxit Orontes."

* Not convinced? Then reverse it. Suppose a United States with enough nuclear power to utterly destroy all the U.S.S.R. But suppose it would cost us just New York, Chicago, Los Angeles, Philadelphia, St. Louis, Kansas City, San Francisco and Seattle. Would any American President consider it a reasonable exchange? Would you?

 An unmanageable national debt was a major factor in precipitating the French Revolution.

And so it is possible that the inhabitants of the area called the "United States" a century from now may more or less happily accept serfdom—protected, fed and entertained, of course—either under Communism or under international Capitalism. The real task to those who see and care is to prevent this, not to worry unduly about Skousen's out-dated obsession with Communists under the bed—even naked ones. □

The Legionary Movement in Romania, commonly known as the Iron Guard, —perhaps the oldest anti-Communist movement in the world, still alive—was founded by Corneliu Z. Codreanu in 1927. For My Legionaries (353 pp., pb., $8.00), Codreanu's stirring work, is a complete and authoritative account of the ideals and principles of the Legionary Movement which shaped the character of young Romanians before WW II. Control over the communications media and the normal channels of book distribution by our international enemies makes it impossible to reach the broad market this unique book deserves. We are certain that the rapidly deteriorating political conditions will preclude a second edition, and For My Legionaries will soon become a collector's item. This book also provides the 'missing pieces' of the drastically censored The Suicide of Europe by Prince D. Sturdza; the identity of those who masterminded Romania's takeover and who are now engaged in carrying out the same program in the U.S. will no longer be unkown to you. ("Solzhenitsyn would appear to have not the slightest inkling of who conquered HIS country!"—B.C.)

THE ANTI-HUMANS

by D. Bacu (307 pp., hb., $8.00), describes what was done to the young men whom Codreanu inspired, when, seven years after his brutal murder, Romania was delivered to the Bolsheviks. They were subjected to what is the most fully documented Pavlovian 'experiment' on a large number of human beings. It is likely that the same techniques were used on many American prisoners in Korea and Vietnam. The Anti-Humans is a well-written document of great historical and psychological importance. Reading it will be an emotional experience you will not forget. ("A sequel to Orwell's 1984"—R.S.H.; "A searing expose of red bestiality!"—Dr.A.J. App).

in Munich, Cologne, Hamburg or in any of the other large German cities where hundreds of thousands were slaughtered in saturation bombing of civilians by the Allies. And so we may well ask: Just how true is the Genocide episode which the English and Afrikaans press and the SABC presented in 1976 as a "straightforward documentary"—and as being fact.

HARRY ELMER BARNES

The two million viewers were not told, for instance, that the "Report of the International Committee of the Red Cross," published in 1948, admits that the Jews, like other people in wartime Europe, suffered rigours and privations, but it makes no mention of the existence of gas chambers or of a deliberate policy of genocide.

One of America's greatest historians was Professor Harry Elmer Barnes, who spent the last years of his courageous and productive life investigating the First and Second World Wars and their origins (and of previous wars), bringing historical truth to an American and world public that had been drugged by wartime and postwar lies and propaganda.

Commenting on the foibles of "court historians," as he called them, here is what Dr. Barnes wrote in the Summer, 1967 issue of Rampart Journal:

"What is deemed important today is not whether Hitler started the War in 1939, but the number of prisoners who were allegedly done to death in the concentration camps operated by Germany during the war.

"These camps were first presented as those in Germany, such as Dachau, Belsen, Bucenwald, Sachsenhausen, and Dora, but it was demonstrated that there had been no systematic extermination in those camps. Attention was then moved on to Auschwitz, Treblinka, Belzec, Chelmno, Jonowska, Tarnow, Ravensbruck, Mauthausen, Brezeznia, and Birkenau, which does not exhaust the list that appears to have been extended as needed.

"Any attempt to make a competent, objective, and truthful investigation of the extermination question is surely the most precarious venture that an historian or demographer could undertake today; indeed, so "hot" and dangerous that only a lone French scholar, Paul Rassinier, has so far made any serious systematic effort to enter the field," said Dr. Barnes in 1967.

PAUL RASSINIER

"An historic lie... the most tragic and the most macabre imposture of all time."

These words, written in 1962, describing the alleged extermination of Jews in gas chambers by the Nazis, are those of the French historian, Professor Paul Rassinier, who has made one of the most important contributions so far to a truthful study of the extermination question. The pre-eminent value of his work lies firstly in the fact that Rassinier actually experienced life in the German concentration camps, in Buchenwald and Dora; and also that, as a Socialist intellectual and an anti-Nazi, nobody could be less inclined to defend Hitler and National Socialism. Yet for the sake of justice and historical truth, Rassinier spent the remainder of his post-war years, until his death in 1966, pursuing research which utterly refuted the myth of the "six million" and the legend of Nazi diabolism.

Of great concern to Professor Rassinier was the way in which the extermination legend is deliberately exploited for political and financial advantage, and in this he found Israel and the Soviet Union to be in concert. He noted how, after 1950, an avalanche of fabricated extermination literature appeared under the stamp of two organisations, so remarkably synchronised in their activities that one might well believe them to have been contrived in partnership.

One was the "Committee for the Investigation of War Crimes and Criminals" established under Communist auspices at Warsaw, and the other, the "World Centre for Contemporary Jewish Documentation" at Paris and Tel-Aviv. Their publications seem to appear at favourable moments in the political climate, and for the Soviet Union their purpose is simply to maintain the threat of Nazism as a manoeuvre to divert attention from their own activities.

"Perhaps I may be allowed to recall here that the State of Israel was only founded in May 1948 and that the Jews were nationals of all states with the exception of Israel, in order to underline the dimensions of a fraud which defies description in any language. On the one hand Germany pays to Israel sums which are calculated on six million dead, and on the other, since at least four-fifths of these six million were decidedly alive at the end of the war, she is paying substantial sums by way of reparation to the victims of Hitler's Germany to those who are still alive in countries all over the world other than Israel and the rightful claimants of those who have since deceased, which means that for the former (i.e., the six million, or in other words, for the vast majority, she is paying twice.

'HOAX OF THE TWENTIETH CENTURY'

Then in 1978 came The Hoax of the Twentieth Century, by Professor Arthur Butz, of the Northwestern University, Evanston, Illinois, USA, whose book categorically states that a systematic extermination policy of Jews by the Nazis never took place. The author conclusively demolishes the legend that the Germans attempted to exterminate the Jews during World War II. Combining the historian's mastery of documents with the technical knowledge of a scientist, Professor Butz's book is the product of massive research. The author takes his theme far beyond all previous work done in this field, and his book may well become a standard volume for many years to come.

Commenting on his task in the book's Introduction, Professor Butz relates:

"Ultimately I spent the entire summer of 1972 working on an expose of the extermination hoax, since by then I had penetrated and demolished the whole sorry mess..... I felt an inescapable obligation and an intellectual imperative to put forward, for society's evaluation, what I knew about this most pernicious hoax... If a scholar, regardless of his specialty, perceives that scholarship is acquiescing, from whatever motivation in a monstrous lie, then it is his duty to expose the lie."

NUREMBERG TRIALS

One of Professor Butz's most important contributions is his study of the nature of the post-war trials—cases of torture and thuggery at Nuremberg and the low level of legal integrity. There is a probe into the dubious origins of the Nuremberg Trials, the morality of key prosecution figures like Telford Taylor, and the bias that distinguished such controlling bodies as the U.S. War Crimes Branch, headed by Col. David "Mickey" Marcus, a fanatical Zionist, later killed in the Arab-Israeli war.

Comments Proessor Butz: "It is simply not possible to imagine an appointment that would make these trials more suspect. Under these political conditions it is simply silly to expect anything but a frameup at the 'trials.' The associated 'extermination' hoax will be exposed with complete clarity in these pages."

Professor Butz's book also combines a survey of miscellaneous problems associated with the extermination hoax. The claim by the Yad Vashem Archives in Jerusalem that they have the names of between 2.5 and 3 million exterminated Jews is swiftly discredited. The author also analyses the hypnotic acceptance by the Germans of the genocide myth, and an excursion is made into the fantastic Jewish atrocity charges of Antiquity, notably the Talmud's claim that 4 billion (or elsewhere 800 million) Jews were killed by the Romans in Hadrian's siege of Bethar, causing a tidal wave of blood that rolled boulders to the sea.

INCALCULABLE BENEFITS

Our own interest in the legend of the "six million" has been to seek out the truth, and the facts, while that of the Zionists is to conceal the exact truth behind a smokescreen of detraction and "anti-Semitism." We do not traffic in myths and untruths. Our interest in the whole matter has stemmed also from the political purposes to which the story of the "six million" has been put. Three decades of continuous and unrelieved propaganda-conditioning have not been without important results—and there is certainly no mystery about the rationale of their unremitting attacks upon Germany and the West.

The growing mythology of the "six million" has been of incalculable benefit to the Zionists because it quickly aroused, and has kept alive, the sympathy and support of the West for the Jewish "national home" in Palestine, Israel. At the same time, it has effectively prevented any throwing open of the whole question of Palestine and the four million Palestinians cruelly and mercilessly driven out of, and dispossessed of their homeland.

EFFECT ON CHRISTIANITY

The colossal fiction of the "six million" has also underlain the equalitarian doctrine and the world-wide campaign against racial discrimination, both invented by the Zionists, and both of which are the inspiration and driving force of the "Social Gospel" which is today undermining and destroying Protestantism, as well as changing the entire thinking of the Roman Catholic Church. Zionist spokesmen are today openly boasting that the "shattering effect of the holocaust on the Christian conscience" was responsible for the Pope's encyclical absolving Jews of guilt in the death of Jesus, and for the discarding of the Catholic teaching in the past, that the Jewish exile and dispersion was a divine punishment for the denial of the Messiah-ship of Jesus. In short, say Zionist spokesmen, the wheel of clerical opinion in the Christian world has now "turned full cycle" and Christianity's indebtedness to Judaism is now a "dominant theme" in Christian thinking! And how has it all been achieved? With the story of the "six million," of course. History has many examples of myths that live a longer life than truth, and become more effective than truth, just like the story of the "six million" is proving to be.

QUESTION OF ZIONISM ITSELF

Nor must we forget that the the rationale of the "six million" effectively keeps removed from the realm of rational and open discussion of Zionism itself. The "six million" fiction is effectively helping to black out and smother out the fact that the two Asiatic movements which arose in the first war, and which reaped the victory of the second, were Soviet Communism and Political Zionism. These revolutionary movements, which sprang from a common root in the ghettos of Russia, are only as separate as the two main branches of the one tree. There never has been, and there does not now exist, any disagreement on ideology, tactics or objectives between these two world revolutionary forces. Backed to the full by International Finance, they aspire to securing eventual control of political, economic and military power over the entire human race. Their organisation and political instrument is the United Nations organisation, which from its very beginning bore on its brow the mark of Moscow.

MORAL IMPLICATIONS THE SAME

The remarkable fact about this never ending propaganda, of morbidity, horror and atrocity, is that its Zionists creators and purveyors are simply not interested in atrocities unless they can be attributed to Germany and the German people. They are simply not interested in the very fiendish enemy, the Soviet Union, or in Red China, two countries which between them are responsible for at least 150-million murders and atrocities. At the same time, they completely ignore, and black-out and smother-out, all the atrocities committed by their fellow Zionists in Palestine, the Middle East, and in Western Europe, during the past seventy years. We are repeatedly told that we must sympathise with Israel because of the suffering of the Jews in Europe at the hands of the Nazis. But we see in this suggestion no reason to perpetuate any suffering. What Israel is doing today in the Middle East cannot be condoned, and to invoke any horrors of the past to justify those of the present is gross hypocrisy.

Because of this, we believe that the Zionists who continue to grind out their non-stop atrocity propaganda against Germany and the German people—and who are undermining Western man and his nations in the process—should be sharply reminded that the moral implications are the same in ALL atrocities. Justice demands that the world be reminded, before it is too late, that those who have been captors, accusers and executioners of others, like the Zionists in Palestine and elsewhere, are themselves deeply stained with the blood of atrocity and mass murder.

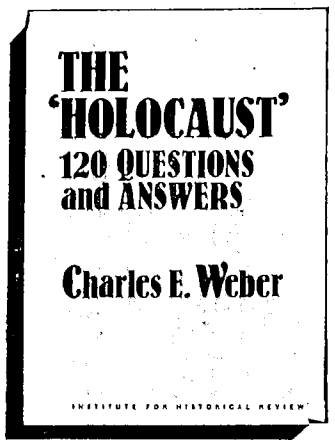
NOT FUNCTION OF THE SABC

It should certainly never have become the function of the South African Broadcasting Corporation to become a regular transmission belt for unrestricted Zionist and anti-German propaganda.

Presented as a "straightforward documentary" of the Second World War, the whole "World at War" series, together with its "Genocide" episode 20, is nothing more than history of the last war selected, compiled and purveyed, NOT by qualified historians, but by two Zionist Jews, Jeremy Isaacs and Charles Bloomberg. Its script was written by Neil Aschersohn and other Zionists. Their presentation is certainly not the full story of World War II, or of its hidden origins or aims. As for the other side of the story, this has been completely blacked out or smothered out. Their presentation of the "Genocide" episode is nothing else than another instalment in the gross, continuing libel against Germany and the German people as a whole, at the hands of the Zionists.

And if there is one important lesson for the peoples of South Africa, and of the world, to learn from this "World at War" series and from its "Genocide" episode, it is the pressing need for the whole Jewish question—and its allied questions of Judaism, the Talmud, "anti-Semitism," the "Six Million," and the whole question of political Zionism and Jewish ethnocentrism—to be opened up to free discussion and enquiry—and to do this in just the same way that Western man's customs, his traditions, his nationalism, his racism, and his Christian faith have since the end of World War II been subjected to the fierce and unremitting glare of public scrutiny, and subversion, by the Zionists themselves.

Their global purpose, just like that of the Communists and the men of International Finance, it must be emphasised again, is to de-nationalise all races, nations and governments and to erect on the ruins of Western Christian civilisation their own collectivist New World Order. □



HERE IS A BOOK in lucid question/answer format that tackles virtually all the myths and distortions propagated by the "Holocaust" Establishment—a book for young and old alike.

- Presents ideas and information not found in other books in this field.
- Short, well-organized and up-to-date on the latest ideas and research.
- Suitable for the classroom as a counterbalance to "Holocaust" studies.
- Gives a historical background of the Jewish problem in Europe, examines the motivations of various groups with regard to the Extermination thesis, and introduces the reader to the more detailed literature on the subject.
- Written by a former professor with a Ph.D. in an historical discipline whose training as a linguist gave him access to literature in various languages, and whose U.S. military intelligence experience in WWII included his residence in Europe during 1945-48 with assignments involving him in preparations for the Nuremberg Trials.

In the classroom; in debates; for the novice revisionist, the inquisitive and skeptical—nothing could be as useful as Dr. Weber's The "Holocaust"—120 Questions and Answers. 120 questions that rouse thought. 120 fully-referenced answers that blow the lid off the blackout. A book of this scope and format has been needed for a long time. Here you have it: easy-to-read, written and priced for wide distribution—and an answer to today's obsession with Holocaustiana.

record as stating that he had come to minister only to the lost sheep of Israel and in Matthew x,5 he is reported to have said "go not into the way of the Gentiles." Add to this the fact that we know that Abraham already is in heaven (with Lazarus) and with Peter reportedly guarding the gates, you have a pretty strong case that heaven is a Jewish Community.

Again I wish to commend you for compiling a new version of the St. James Bible and hope that it climbs to the top of the best-seller list.

Some Jewish Myths About Palestine

THE JEWS HAVE A HISTORICAL AND RACIAL CLAIM TO PALESTINE!

Although Palestine has been inhabited for several thousand years, the Jews have only ruled it for a total of 300 years, the last time being in AD 70 when they were dispersed by the Romans. Additionally, Arthur Koestler, the Jewish authority, has demonstrated conclusively in The Thirteenth Tribe [available from Liberty Bell Publications, (Order Nr. 19004) at $6. plus $1. postage] that over 90% of today's Jews are NOT descended from Biblical Jewy, but from the Asiatic Khazars. Consequently, the Jews have as much right to Palestine as do the Eskimos!

THERE IS NO SUCH THING AS THE PALESTINIAN PEOPLE!

This 'justification' of Zionism is absurd. Was not the Israeli invasion of Lebanon designed to rid border areas of PALESTINIAN guerillas? If the Palestinians exist, the Zionist case crumbles. If they don't exist, could Mr. Shamir explain why thousands of his troops were seized by hallucinations last year in Lebanon and tried to track down Jew-killing ghosts!

Archaeologists and anthropologists have shown that the Arabs were in Palestine as far back as 1,200 B.C. Despite the fact that many empires have risen and fallen in this region since then, the Palestinians have remained in permanent occupation for over 1,300 years. This being so, it is obvious that only force could have removed them from the land of their forebears. Christopher Sykes, a pro-Jewish writer, admitted terror was the cause of their departure when he referred in Crossroads to Israel to the "Jewish threats and aggression towards Arab populations."

THE BALFOUR DECLARATION, A LEGALLY BINDING DOCUMENT, PROMISED THE CREATION AND MAINTENANCE OF ISRAEL!

The Jews are fond of citing the 'Balfour Declaration' which, though signed in December 1917 in exchange for International Jewry's promise to finagle the United States of America into World War I, was only published in 1920. The reason for the delay was that on October 25, 1915 (note, two years earlier) Sir Henry MacMahon, High Comissioner of Egypt, promised the Sheriff of Mecca Arab independence in return for Arab military assistance in the war effort, assistance that proved vital. This being so, the Balfour Declaration is legally worthless.

"IT WAS ONLY AFTER WE MADE THE DESERT BLOOM THAT THEY [The Arabs] BECAME INTERESTED IN TAKING IT FROM US" –Former Israeli Prime Minister Levi Eshkol.

Thanks to the efforts of anti-Arab Jews and Gentiles, people think that Arab lands are just desert, full of camels, magic lamps, and Turkish Delight! This is like arguing that all British males wear pinstripe suits, bowler hats and carry umbrellas!

As far back as 1897 C.R. Conder wrote: "The hills of Palestine were covered with brushwood, the plains of Caesarea dotted with oak. In the more open lands, wheat and barley, oats, indian corn, durrah, rice, millet, lentil beans, and sesame were grown. Cotton and flax and indigo were cultivated in the plains and in the Jordan Valley."

Some desert, huh? But even if Palestine were totally barren, it would not alter the fact that this land belongs to the Arabs. Theft if theft, even if committed by Jewish hoodlums, and the Arabs want their property back!

ISRAELIS ARE DEMOCRATS, ARABS ARE COMMUNISTS!

We have already seen the absurdity of calling Israel a Democracy. It is equally absurd to label the Arabs Communists. Communism seeks to destroy religion, yet the vast majority of Arabs are either devout Muslims or Christians. It is true that many Arab states buy their weapons from Communist nations, but if the West won't sell them weapons, because of their powerful Jewish lobby in the District of Corruption, what are Arabs to do? Wait, unarmed, to suffer like Beirut? □

FACT OR FICTION?

Were six million Jews really gassed . . . or has a colossal hoax been perpetrated on the world?

Professor Butz has carefully investigated the alleged extermination of 6 million Jews during WW II and has written a book which thoroughly documents his startling findings. His book strips away the cover of fraud and deceit from this emotion-charged topic and lays bare the full and complete truth.

democracy in action? Is this an act based on the Constitutional rights of the United States of America? Or is it merely an edict of the Zionists? It is certainly not American! And it is certainly not justice either.

My message to all readers is that if one American citizen can be secretly kicked out of the country, and his citizenship revoked without any trial or any charges being brought against him in any United States court, then the lives and welfare of all U.S. citizens are in jeopardy. Do not make the fatal mistake of believing that it may happen to others, but it can never happen to YOU.

West German Justice Ministry spokesman Joerg Reinbothe said that no one in West Germany even knew about the Rudolph case until the U.S. sent word that he should be tried for war crimes. He said, "We got the U.S. report several days after Mr. Rudolph arrived in West Germany. We wondered why we were not told about him before he was dumped on us. That is really strange behavior on the part of the U.S. authorities."

Allan A. Ryan, Jr., who preceded Sher as director of the OSI, said that Mr. Sher has about 10,000 more so-called "Nazi war criminals" in the U.S. to investigate.

Since Mr. Rudolph and Wernher von Braun were the closest of friends and worked together, a reliable Justice Department source said that because of Jewish pressure, von Braun would also have been arrested and tried as a war criminal except that he died just before his case was to be completed.

Insiders in Washington also told me that even the title of the OSI is highly misleading. It is not really an office for special investigations. It exists for the sole purpose of hunting down and trying former Nazis in the U.S. It was started in 1979, when the Zionists ordered President Carter to establish this organization, thereby wasting more of the taxpayers' money to please Israel.

The glaring fact that the U.S. government had no such office until about 35 years after World War II reflects the recent changing attitude in the U.S. and the tightened grip on our nation by the international Zionists.

In the days during and after World War II, Americans, including President Roosevelt, were alarmed and even frightened at the prospect of having several million European Jews dumped on our doorstep. At that time, Americans viewed this problem in a different way. This was not a totally Zionist-controlled country as it is now. The American people and Congress at that important stage in history used much better judgment than is found today in Washington.

Prior to World War II, both the U.S. Congress and the State Department wisely obstructed numerous plans by American Jewish groups to bring in millions of Jewish refugees.

Even President Roosevelt feared this and therefore was quite indifferent to the proposals for dumping Jewish refugees on the American public.

Both he and the State Department rejected an offer by Romania to send about 400,000 Jews if the U.S. would provide asylum for them. Mr. Roosevelt, with an eye on the next election, also refused Hitler's offer to release Jews to the U.S. in exchange for trucks. The President knew the mood of Congress on this matter and he knew that the Americans were dead set, at this time, against more Jewish immigration. So he tightened procedures for admission to this country and even pressured the South American countries not to take in any more Jews. He tried to explain this decision to Jewsh groups, who financed his campaigns by saying that no ships were available for such rescue efforts. But I am sure no Jews believed this. At one time, Roosevelt even refused to meet with Jewish leaders about the problem.

All of the above facts and more may be found in a new book, The Abandonment of the Jews, by David S. Wyman, a history professor at the University of Massachussetts.

It may seem hard to believe all this due to the great changes today in public opinion, brought on by the vast amount of brainwashing by the Zionists through the news media. But even Frank Freidel, author of the authoritative multi-volume biography of Franklin D. Roosevelt, said, "I'm afraid that everything in Wyman's book is true. President Roosevelt did not intend to upset the American people by allowing large-scale immigration of displaced Jews." He attributes much of the opposition to admitting Jews to American Christian groups, including the Catholic Church. Author Wyman said, "At that period, 1936 to 1946, the plain truth is that most Americans were prejudiced against Jews and were unlikely to support any measures to assist them."*

How times have changed! And certainly not for the better. The American people now practically worship these same people, gladly pay for the almost total support of Israel, and do not even condemn the Zionists for all the atrocities they now commit in the Mideast—not even when it is done against American citizens.

In past years, Congressmen stood up and warned against an influx of millions of Jews to America because Zionist advocates would connive until they grasped this nation in a stranglehold, even what might be termed a death grip. And the very thing which they warned us about has happened.

* [That is why, during the period 1936-1946 mentioned, the Federal government did not act openly to admit millions of Jews legally, and the Jews who swarmed into the United States during that period entered the country surreptitiously, sneaking across the borders from Canada or Mexico or landing from small ships by night or on lonely portions of our coast. The number that thus fastened themselves on us may have been several million. The Jews ordered our government to legislate amnesty for all of them and never to inquire into their number. Quite a number of Jews, officially clasified as Germans, etc., entered legally and were given employment as indispensable masterminds by American universities, research institutes, and corporations. It is not impossible that all of the six million whom the Germans incinerated in the famous "Holocaust" crept into the United States after they rose from their ashes. —Ed.

Today, our nation is scorned throughout the world because of our close relationship with the international Zionists. And Mr. Reagan has said many times that the U.S. and Israel are one. He keeps telling the American Jewish leaders that if Israel is kicked out of the UN, it will mean that the U.S. leaves, too. That makes us one nation, the U.S. and Israel, according to our President. And when you look back at the November election results and Reagan's landslide victory, it appears that the American people, most of them, feel the same way as the President.

Today in America, the very same Zionists whom Congress once denied entry to the U.S., control every member of that Congress. And before someone writes me to say that Senator Jessie Helms (R.-N.C.) is not controlled by the Zionists, let's carefully examine this question in detail. After narrowly gaining another six years in the Senate, despite spirited Jewish opposition, I predict that Mr. Helms has learned his lesson. He watched his friend, Senator Charles Percy (R.-Ill.) lose his seat to a hand-picked Zionist candidate. So he now is well aware of Zionist power.

Some observers have said that Mr. Helms, if he becomes head of the Senate Foreign Affairs Committee, will cut down on welfare payments to Israel. Don't you believe it! This isn't going to happen. If you go over what Senator Helms has said and done in the Senate, you will learn that he hasn't yet done anything against Israel. Oh, he may have privately complained about the power of the Zionists in America when talking with cronies, but his actions speak louder than words.*

After what happened to Senator Percy on November 6, Mr. Helms is never going to upset the Zionists. The North Carolina Senator is in about the same position as former Presidents Nixon, Ford, and Carter; all of whom criticized Israel for the many violations of human rights, but they went right ahead and gave Israel everything asked for, and more. So, soon you can expect to see Mr. Helms follow suit. He will play it safe. I mean he is going to take off his coat, roll up his sleeves, and start shovelling your money to Israel, just like all the other 99 "good ole boys" in the Senate. And you may even see him at some Jewish gathering to let them know he is pro-Israel to the hilt.

The extremely shocking and very inhumane Rudolph case brings to my mind something about my fellow American citizens which I am quite unable to understand. The last government census revealed for the first time that in the U.S. German-Americans now far outnumber all other national origin groups—even the English, Irish, and Scottish Americans. Taken as a group, government statistics further reveal that Americans of German decent are also among the most prosperous and successful people in this country. Relatively few of them are on welfare.

Bearing all this in mind, one might logically conclude that German-

* [It is also to the point that Mr. Helms depends on the support of the "born-again" crowd and professes to share their belief in the Yahweh who selected a hybrid race of bandits and swindlers his Chosen People and acted as their accomplice in their criminal depredations. —Ed.]

Americans would have the most political power. However, close examination clearly shows that their voting clout is considered nil, in fact, almost non-existent. There possibly may be some small German-American group some place with political power, but, if so, I have never heard of them.

When the Rudolph case was made public, I checked newspapers and magazines all over the country to see if any German-American groups would protest this inhumane and illegal treatment of a highly-honored official of our space industry, but I didn't find one letter to any publication or any press releases condemning the treatment of Mr. Rudolph.

And this is not the first instance where a German-American has been grossly mistreated and discriminated against by our government just to please the Zionists. In the daily press, I see many highly derogatory statements, usually planted by Jewish organizations, about Americans of German descent. And most German-Americans seem to accept this unnecessary abuse in silence.

I have also noticed that each and every time when something critical of American Jews or Israel appears in any newspaper, representatives of every Zionist group in the country write and even threaten the press for allowing such remarks.

See the difference? And there, dear readers, lies the reason why the Zionists now control not only the White House, Congress, and the banking system, but just about every thing else in this nation. □

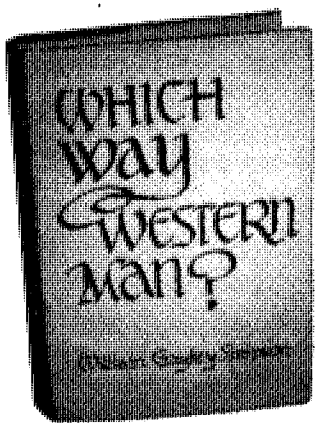
DEAR ANN LANDERS: Can a person who was born of Jewish parents become Gentile if he would rather not be Jewish?

This subject was discussed by some highly-intelligent people at a dinner party the other night, and there were convincing arguments on both sides. What are your views on this subject? — The T's In Madison, Wis.

Dear T's: To be born a Jew is to become a member of a worldwide constituency whose roots go back 5,000 years. One's ethnic makeup can neither be chosen nor changed.

A Jew who wishes to disassociate himself from Judaism and take up Catholicism, Christian Science or Confucianism, for example, is still a Jew by heritage. No amount of disavowing will transform him into a Gentile.

Survival manual for the White race



William Gayley Simpson has spent a lifetime of keen observation, careful analysis, and deep reflection developing the principal thesis of his book: that the single, undying purpose of all human activity should be the ennobling of man. In support of this thesis he looks at the foundations of Western Society, at the structure of our government, at the effects of technology and industrialization on man, at the roles of the sexes, at economics, and at race. The book goes to the roots of the problems facing the White race today, and it shows the ways in which White society must be changed if the race is to survive. WHICH WAY WESTERN MAN? is an encyclopedic work whose conclusions can be ignored by no one with a sense of responsibility to the future. futile investigation lasted. A report of these results, with an analysis of the fallacies of earlier investigations, which are courteously assumed to have been inept rather than mendacious, appears in the Winter issue of the Skeptical Inquirer.

All this would call for no comment, except, perhaps, a line about the folly of scientific searches for mares' nests, if there were not one more scientific datum. One of the earlier quests for traces of the monster was carried out by technicians with underwater cameras, and lo! wonder of wonders! they obtained a stroboscopic picture which they sent to the Jet Propulsion Laboratory in California for "enhancement" by a computer—an always dubious technique. They then published in a respected magazine, Nature, what they said was their picture thus "computer-enhanced." It showed a lozenge-shaped object which they identified as a "flapper" of the monster. Presumably plesiosaurs are camera-shy and object to being photographed, but the zealous scientists with their advanced technologic equipment were able to photograph one of the monster's "fins" as it tried to escape publicity. This inspired a palaeontologist, eager to savor the bliss of seeing his name in newspapers, to produce a Linnaean classification of the animal that must have such flappers, so the biological record was in turn enhanced by the addition of a new species, learnedly named Nessiteras rhombopteryx.

The authors of the article in the Inquirer thought of going to the Jet Propulsion Laboratory and obtaining a copy of the original "computer-enhanced" photograph. It shows only a meaningless spattering of dots, which are either grain in the film or bits of the organic matter that is in suspension in the water of all lakes. They politely say that the published picture must have been "retouched." It may have been drawn on the genuine picture, but it is obviously and flatly a forgery and a hoax, perpetrated to deceive persons credulous enough to take it seriously.

We live in a time in which the Jews, thanks to their racial solidarity and the degradation of their Aryan prostitutes in the press and government, have cozened and cowed the multitude into accepting their enormous Holohoax, so why shouldn't small-time pimps filch a few coppers from the stultified masses when they have a chance?

It is true that in our time a pickpocket (if not a nigger exercising his "civil rights") can be arrested, if caught in the act, and even convicted, if he does not hire an expensive attorney, and even sent to prison, if he has no friends among politicians. It is odd, however, that in a society so given to endless legislation, no one seems to have suggested prosecution of persons guilty of the far more serious crime of perpetrating pseudo-scientific swindles.

In the same issue of the magazine, there is an article of four pages by Martin Gardiner and one of twenty-one pages by Ray Hyman, all devoted to refutation of a bundle of drivel entitled Mind Race, Understanding and Using Psychic Abilities, by Russell Targ (a physicist who learned that Uri Geller can bend spoons by thinking about them) and Keith Harary (who, according to an article in the press that is photographically reproduced, is a straggly-bearded wonder who can project his mind to go through walls and visit any place on earth).

I respect the authors of those twenty-five pages, and I do not wish to depreciate their efforts to preserve some chances for intelligent life on earth, but I am dismayed that it should be necessary to publish for the readers of the magazine a painstaking refutation of the buncombe about "psi" powers and the like. A century ago, a great practical sociologist, Phineas T. Barnum, milked the multitude of suckers with clever humbugs (e.g., a mermaid produced by sewing the torso of a monkey onto the tail of a large fish), but he limited himself to entertaining yokels, who always need something at which to gawk. He made, so far as I know, no serious effort to deceive educated men, and I am sure that Louis Agassiz, who was his contemporary, never found it necessary to prove to intelligent readers that Barnum's mermaid was a bit of crude taxidermy.

Barnum is remembered for his maxim that a sucker is born every minute, a rule that must be recognized as a fundamental contribution to sociology, even if he drastically underestimated the birth-rate. So if "parapsychologists" supercharged with "psi" power, astrologers, and gypsy women who practice chiromancy for a bit of silver (they have to accept scrap metal instead these days) make a living by exploiting the infinite gullibility of the ignorant, no real harm is done. What is alarming is that the ignorant masses now include persons who were not only graduated from institutions that claim to be colleges and universities, but even had the degree of Ph.D. or S.D., bestowed on them. That is surely a symptom of a society that is near its dissolution.

* * *

A writer for the Inquirer attended this years' Bible-Science Conference near Cleveland and reported on some of the funnier shenanigans of the theological and professorial clowns who try to refute the wicked doctrines of Darwin and Copernicus, but he ends his brief report with the painfully true observation that the preposterous nonsense of "Bible-Science" is "gospel to millions of voters." And that is all you need to know about "democracy" and its future.

Incidentally, 'gospel truth' is a convenient designation for a fiction that imposes on a large number of individuals.

* * *

The publisher of Liberty Bell had recently to appeal for subventions to enable him to continue publication of this journal. At about the same time, some chumps in Arizona happily and spontaneously contributed two million dollars to help Professor Hynek watch for the "flying saucers" on which inquisitive creatures from some hypothetical planet a few light years away come every once in a while to zip around the earth and play hide-and-seek with the earthlings.

The press of the University of California has just published an elaborate edition of a noteworthy specimen of theological balderdash, composed by some anonymous holy man around 1310 and entitled Speculum humanae salvationis. It consists of a series of pictures joined to a text in simple prose, which explains how each of the depicted episodes in the "Old Testament" prefigured, as in a magic mirror or a crystal ball, some aspect or event of the Jesus story. It was an illustrated book in an age in which such things were rare, and the mystical doctrine of 'correspondences' appealed to rudimentary minds, so it became a Mediaeval 'best seller' from the time it was invented until the middle of the Seventeenth Century. It was reproduced in manuscripts, some of them elaborately executed on the best parchment, with a painstakingly calligraphic text, intricately illuminated initials, and miniatures drawn with great care and sometimes of some artistic value. After the invention of printing, the Speculum was produced in cheap editions, large for the time, its pictures reproduced in more or less crude woodcuts, and, for the benefit of the uneducated, the text was translated into German, Dutch, French, English, and doubtless quite a few other languages.

The new edition, which sells for a mere $190 (I did not buy a copy!), reproduces the miniatures and text from the better manuscripts and from typical printed editions. I mention it here because the Speculum has some interest as a measure of the mentality to which it appealed in the late Middle Ages and to which it could again appeal, if promoted by one of the buncombe-artists of the evangelical racket. I shall notice one example.

There is a motif that is common to many folk-tales and fairy stories. A person, usually a man, confronted by a task that is beyond his powers (e.g., building a large bridge, designing a great building, winning a battle, etc.), solicits the help of an evil or malicious demon, who agrees to do the work on the condition that the man will sacrifice to him the first living being that he meets after completion of the task or on his return home. The man, assuming that the victim will be a servant or even an animal, accepts the bargain, but the demon so arranges matters that the first being to meet the man is his son or daughter, who must accordingly be sacrificed to pay for supernatural assistance. In some versions of the tale, the man tries to swindle the demon by some trick, usually without success.

The Jews' version of the tale in their story book is well known. There was a bandit chief named Jephthah (Hebrew YPTH, which was pronounced Iephthaë in the first century B.C.). When the Jews were engaged in their favorite sport, which then as now was slaughtering Semites and grabbing more of Palestine, they encountered unexpected resistance from Semites who were so wicked they did not want to be butchered by Yahweh's pets. The Jewish robber bargained to bring his band of outlaws to help his fellow Jews seize more land, if they would make him the chief of their predatory nation. Before one battle, Jephthah promises his tribal deity that if he is victorious, he will take "whatsoever comes forth" from the doors of his house on his return home and make a holocaust of it (i.e., burn all of the body on the altar without eating any part of it).

Ferocious old Yahweh accepts the deal. When Jephthah goes home, his daughter and only child rushes out of the house, banging cymbals to celebrate daddy's glorious triumph. Thus Jephthah, who was fond of her, learned a lesson about bargaining with wily gods, and the daughter, as a good Jewess, was glad to be sacrificed for her people.

In the "Old Testament" Jephthah grants his daughter a delay of two months during which she and her companions wander over the mountains, bewailing her fate to die as a virgin before giving birth to little Jews. Then Jephthah burns her on an altar to old Yahweh, who, presumably, is glad to collect his fee. All that seemed a needless complication to the pious author of the Speculum, whose picture of the scene shows Jephthah, accoutered as a Mediaeval knight and riding his charger, drawing his sword to slice off the head of the young woman, who has just come from his residence, the Mediaeval castle shown in the background.

This Jewish adaptation of a Near Eastern folk-tale has been generally embarrassing. It embarrassed even the Jews, for various Rabbis in the Talmud comment on the stupidity of Jephthah, who kept the bargain he had made instead of wriggling out of his obligation, as a good lawyer could have done. Josephus in his Antiquitates, in which he recounts the stories of the "Old Testament," treating them as history and dressing them up as best he can to impress the goyim, says (V. 266) that Jephthah was a stupid bloke, who misunderstood what God really wanted, and who should have known better than to do something that was bound to result in unfavorable publicity.*

* It should be remembered that during the Middle Ages learned men who believed in the historicity of the "Old Testament" did not try to straighten out for themselves the mass of incoherent and crude tales, but relied on Josephus, who had reduced them to a consistent narrative and embellished them with the details and literary developments that would have been part of a work by a Classical historian. Josephus's Antiquitates were very widely read in the Latin translation, Historiae antiquitatis Iudaicae, probably made under the supervision of Cassiodorus and now preserved in a very large number of manuscripts. An excellent critical edition was begun by Franz Blatt in the series, Acta Jutlandica, of the University of Aarhus, published by Munksgaard in Copenhagen, but, so far as I know, that admirable edition has not gone beyond the first volume (Books I-V), which appeared in 1958. That is deplorable.

Josephus is much more comfortable when he polishes up another tale, the legend about Abraham, a Sheeny who came from Ur in Sumeria, probably with mortgages on half the real estate in Ur in his pocket, since Jephthah has been especially embarrassing to Christian theologians. To the Semitic mind, incinerating one's children was a sure-fire way of attracting a god's attention and pleasing him, * but Aryans instinctively recoil from such use of their offspring and from gods that demand it. The writer of one of the letters that were circulated under the name of Paul (Ep. ad Heb., 11.32) thought Jephthah's use of his daughter as a holocaust an edifying example of god-fearing righteousness, but it would have been poor salesmanship to insist on that point when vending the religion to our race. One way of covering up its obvious implications would have been to follow the lead of the great apologist for his race, Philo Judaeus, and claim that the story was just an allegorical fiction, intended to convey some occult truth to persons clever enough to guess the meaning. But the Fathers of the Church, unlike most of our contemporary shamans, were shrewd enough to see that if they abandoned for any part of their holy book a claim that it was 'inerrant' and described what had actually happened, the game was lost. One such admission would be like a hole in the hull of a ship and would sink the whole équipage, sooner or later. The best they could think of was a gambit popularized by Augustine. The "Old Testament" truthfully reports events that actually happened, but the omniscient god contrived them to "prefigure" prophetically what he was going to do much later, when he was going to send a piece of himself down to earth to be his race's god had singled him out for special favors. Josephus (Antiq., I.227-236) dilates complacently on the episode in which old Abraham gets ready to sacrifice his only son, Isaac, to Yahweh. Josephus supplies us with graphic details and edifying conversation, including a speech by Isaac, who is twenty-five and is tickled pink by the news that he is going to become a holocaust. Yahweh, of course, intervenes in the nick o' time, and, since he has got to have some blood and a burnt offering, supplies a ram as a surrogate for Isaac, who is to be preserved to engender a horde of Jews for their patron in the clouds. The tale is doubtless a very late adaptation of a Sumerian myth that is now lost, but attested by the impressive gold and lapis lazuli effigy of a ram (or is it a goat?) caught in a thicket to which he was fastened by a silver chain about his fetlocks. A good picture of this impressive specimen of Sumerian art may be inspected in Plate 9 of Sir Leonard Woolley's Ur, a small volume in the Penguin series, first published in 1946.

* One remembers, of course,, the dramatic scene portrayed in Flaubert's exquisite prose in his Salammbô. When the novel was published, horrified humanitarians squawked, of course, but archaeological excavations have now proved that such sacrifices of children were not at all uncommon.

killed by his Jewish pets to give him a reason for changing his mind about them and letting the lowly heathen in on a good deal for eternal life.

Augustine's tawdry sophistry was followed by the author of the Speculum. The episode about Jephthah was Yahweh's way of letting clever fellows know that in the then distant future Mary's virginity would be reserved for him. That somehow made it all right for a loving daughter to be reduced to a heap of calcined bones in a holocaust.

Now, before you dismiss that nonsense with a laugh and wonder why I have wasted space on it, consider one of the most crucial historical and psychological problems before us. Our ancestors evidently believed in the Norse gods, Odin, Thor, and the others, but were free to accept or reject any or all of the various and often fantastic myths about them and to form their own opinions about those gods, while the fairly numerous men who thought the whole religion a vapid superstition did not hesitate to affirm that they were atheists (goðlauss). And Norse society took the attitude that Augustus took at Rome: if the gods were offended by a theological error, it was up to them to take whatever action they deemed appropriate. But after our ancestors were inveigled into Christianity by holy men who practiced on their ignorance, they found themselves in a society in which enormous pressures were exerted to crush men who refused to believe in the myths as expounded by the gang of theologians then in power and also had too much self-respect to resort to the slavish hypocrisy of pretending they believed what they privately thought absurd. The shamans insisted that it was the duty of society to extirpate all Aryans who wickedly refused assent to the dogmas currently in vogue, and that a society that failed in discharging that foul duty would suffer atrocious reprisal from a ferocious and ruthless god. In other words, for fifteen centuries our race was subjected to selective breeding to eliminate individuals who were not either gullible or hypocritical.

What has been the genetic effect on our race of that prolonged and terrible aberration? □

SOME QUOTABLE QUOTES FROM AMERICA'S DECLINE

On the 18th Amendment (Prohibition): "Very few Americans were sufficiently sane to perceive that they had repudiated the American conception of government and had replaced it with the legal principle of the 'dictatorship of the proletariat,' which was the theoretical justification of the Jews' revolution in Russia."

On Race; "We must further understand that all races naturally regard themselves as superior to all others. We think Congoids unintelligent, but they feel only contempt for a race so stupid or craven that it fawns on them, gives them votes, lavishly subsidizes them with its own earnings, and even oppresses its own people to curry their favor. We are a race as are the others. If we attribute to ourselves a superiority, intellectual, moral, or other, in terms of our own standards, we are simply indulging in a tautology. The only objective criterion of superiority, among human races as among all other species, is biological: the strong survive, the weak perish. The superior race of mankind today is the one that will emerge victorious—whether by its technology or its fecundity—from the proximate struggle for life on an overcrowded planet."

FREEDOM OF SPEECH—FREEDOM OF THOUGHT
FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION

The editor-publisher of Liberty Bell does not necessarily agree with each and every article in this magazine, nor does he subscribe to all conclusions arrived at by various writers; however, he does endeavor to permit the exposure of ideas suppressed by the controlled news media of this country.

It is, therefore, in the best tradition of America and of free men everywhere that Liberty Bell strives to give free reign to ideas, for ultimately it is ideas which rule the world and determine both the content and structure of culture.

We believe that we can and will change our society for the better. We declare our long-held view that no institution or government created by men, for men, is inviolable, incorruptible, and not subject to evolution, change or replacement by the will of the people.

SPIRIT IS WHERE YOU FIND IT

I am sometimes reproached with ignoring spiritual values. I certainly do not intend to do so, although I may not always mention them where they are to be taken for granted. By 'spirit,' however, I understand, not the ghosts and spooks so dear to the religious imagination, but the psyche, as defined by Aristotle, that is, the force that gives life to a biological organism and makes it function. And we recognize spirit at the point where an organism's automatic response to material stimulus is superseded by what we may properly call a higher power.

I would begin a notice of spiritual values with a commonly observed phenomenon. An ornithologist can give you a list of the species of birds in which a nesting female will, at the approach of a predator, leave her nest and flutter along the ground, risking and sometimes losing her life in an effort to draw the predator away from her chicks. She must therefore overcome her instinct of self-preservation for the sake of preserving her offspring. You will argue that since she is incapable of conscious thought, she is merely obeying a second instinct developed in the females of her species to ensure its continuance. Very well.

Let us now consider a band of baboons. You may deny them the power of conscious thought, but you must recognize in them the capacity to observe the behavior of farmers in South Africa and devise means of outwitting them that are commonly successful, despite the great odds on the side of the human being. You must also give them credit for an emotion that seems similar to one that our species feels and regards as poetic. At sunset a band of baboons cease the monkeyshines and chatter of animal merriment they exhibit in the daytime, and become silent and, we may imagine, melancholy in the gathering dusk, but resume their activity when darkness has fallen and until they are ready to retire for the night. They may even have religious tendencies. Eugène Marais in My Friends, the Baboons (London, Methuen, 1947) reports an incident in which a tribe of baboons, which had learned to accept the humans who were observing them as superior but not hostile beings, evidently hoped that the men with their magic powers could resurrect the dead.

A tribe of baboons is led and governed by an oligarchy of the elder and stronger males, who direct its movements and whose accumulated wisdom enables the band to survive. When the band is suddenly menaced by a leopard, one of the oligarchs gives his life for his people by attacking the leopard, against whose teeth and claws a baboon has no chance whatsoever, thus giving the rest of the band time to escape. The heroes and saviors celebrated in many mythologies could do no more, and I submit if we are going to talk rationally about spiritual values, we had better begin by recognizing them in baboons.

There can be no sacrifice greater than that of giving one's life for others, and in our species we can identify no spiritual value higher than that which, so long as our species is viable, makes our young men willing to give their lives for the defense of their nation or for the extension of its territory and power. All spiritual values are instinctive, a product of what Jung rightly identifies as the racial soul, but they do become more remarkable when the instinct to act for the tribal or national entity has to overcome not only the individual's instinct of self-preservation but also his ability to reason and to calculate how he may safely shirk his duty and leave to others sacrifice for the whole of which he is a part.

There are, of course, many other spiritual values. The enduring bond between male and female, found in many species of mammals, including wolves and baboons, is not merely a matter of sexual intercourse, as our psittacine intellectuals have been taught to tell us, and it is worthy of note that in our own race it takes a special form, producing a chivalric attitude toward our women such as is unknown to other races. Our race has its own instinctive sense of beauty and pleasure in it, which Jews seem to find particularly odious, since they incessantly strive to pervert and destroy it, and which all other races find more or less unnatural by their own instinctive standards. Another spiritual characteristic of our race, part of what Spengler termed the Faustian mentality, is the need for fantasy that transcends reality. "Remembering speechlessly we seek the great forgotten language, the lost lane-end into heaven, a stone, a leaf, an unfound door." That need, inexplicable perhaps but part of us, and so often debased into vulgar superstitions, is innate in our racial psyche, perhaps needed to make endurable our twenty thousand days under the sun, and certainly one of our most precious spiritual values, to be repudiated only at risk to our sanity.

I shall not expatiate on this subject. My point here is simply that our spiritual values are instinctive and racial, and whether or not they have counterparts in other species of mammals, including other human races, they assume for us forms that are peculiar to our racial psyche, and they wither and die when we separate ourselves from the race from which we sprang. That is a fact well known to all intelligent beings who, for purposes of their own, intend to exterminate us.

There is a connection, both obvious and obscure, between religion, which is belief in imaginary gods, and the power of imagination that enables us to endue the world with beauty, transcend its bleak reality aesthetically, and, in Wordsworth's illustration

Have sight of Proteus rising from the sea,
Or hear old Triton blow his wreathèd horn.

The illustration is apt because it reminds us that the Classical mythology which has entered so deeply into our culture represents poetic imagination, not religious faith, although there was a certain overlapping of uncertain extent.

Lucretius obviously did not believe in the existence of the Venus whom he invokes in the magnificent exordium (Aeneadum genetrix, hominum divomque voluptas, e.q.s.) that so powerfully stirs our blood and souls. Neither Vergil nor his readers ever believed that Venus had actually appeared to Aeneas near Carthage, although some of them may have believed in the existence of such a goddess or, at least, in the reality of supernatural beings.

Belief in the supernatural, in turn, need not, and often does not, include belief in personal immortality, which provides the consolation that is the only remaining function of a religion of the supernatural. I qualify the word 'religion' because it may also be used to designate what we may call a natural religion, one which is not inconsistent with ascertained reality, being a perception of the biologically necessary solidarity of our race and a faith in our race's power to impose itself on the real world and subdue its enemies—a faith without which we are doomed.

A crucial question, to which I do not know the answer, is whether a natural religion can replace, for the majority of our people, an emotional and irrational belief in the supernatural. Does that majority need to console themselves for the ineluctable straitness of human life by imagining they will exist after death and that loved ones who have died have "gone home"? Traditional Christianity, as modified and adapted to the Western spirit, did, despite all its defects and concealed dangers, provide the consoling prospect of a life after death, but it was easily converted into a powerful weapon for the destruction of our civilization and culture, and is now a deadly bane, a lethal poison for our people. I hope that an illusion of immortality is not requisite, for I see no way of creating or reviving a religion of the supernatural that would supply it, with the possible and dubious exception of some belief in metempsychosis.

Theoretically, there is no reason why a natural religion of race would not be for us (as it is for intelligent Jews) a more than adequate replacement for an outworn and obsolete superstition, but as a practical matter we must recognize that it is extremely difficult for persons who have become addicted to hallucinatory drugs to emancipate themselves from them. Persons who have become addicted to an expectation of immortality are like alcoholics, who can seldom deprive themselves of their wonted escape from reality even after they are convinced that it is deleterious to themselves, and not infrequently can wean themselves from alcohol only by becoming addicted to some other drug. It is a matter of common observation that persons who have broken their blind faith in traditional Christianity often become enthusiastic votaries of s[me succedaneous superstition, from Theosophy to Marxism. The latter is, of course, the cult commonly selected by clergymen, though often for business reasons rather than from an appetite for a faith.

What is clear is that the religion the Jews invented for the goyim they despise and hate has now been stripped of the Western veneer that made it tolerable as a religion concerned only with the "next world" and consolation for the woes of life. It has become an hallucinatory drug that incites our race to suicide, and it will destroy us if we do not find a way of breaking the addiction to it that induces delirium tremens in so large a part of our people.

PREPARING FOR THE MERGER

The first quarter of the new year has been a gloomy season for the Roman Catholics who hope to preserve something of the religion with which they are imbued in their youth.

In New York, Bantam published (in both cloth-bound and paperback editions) David Yallop's In God's Name, a book that had already created a sensation in England with its account of the way in which Pope John Paul I. was murdered by ranking officials in the Vatican only thirty-three days after he became God's Anointed Vicar on Earth. I cannot vouch for the details, of course, but I was informed of the murder by a private correspondent, who belonged to the dissident party in the Vatican and seems to have been murdered himself not long after he wrote me at a time when he and his colleagues still hoped to force an autopsy of the corpse to establish the cause of death and identify the poison used.

The practice of political techniques that have long been traditional among God's stewards in the Vatican surprised no one who had read the candid memoirs and diaries of Papal secretaries who lived during the early Renaissance and before the Reformation, and who knew no reason why they should not chronicle, in their dry, unemotional style, events that seemed little more than commonplace to them, however shocking they may seem to us. After the Reformation, their works were exploited for propaganda purposes by the Protestants, and the lid was screwed down tight on the Vatican by the Counter-Reformation, so that there have been few breaches of official secrecy since then, while generations of learned Catholics have plied their pens desperately to impugn and refute the accounts left by eye-witnesses, notably Infessura, Burchard, and Platina, as well as many lesser writers who had no political motive for inventing stories which their fellows in the Vatican would have known to be false.*

Most well-meaning Catholics in this country today have never read the works I have mentioned or the hundreds of comparable sources, and while they probably have heard vaguely of the Borgias and their fellows, they fondly imagine that the Counter-

* Of the three whom I named above, only Platina had any literary pretensions. He is probably reliable for the events of his own time in the Vatican, and although he was much less interested in the quotidian life and escapades of the Popes than in events of real cultural importance, his Reformation increased piety rather than discretion. To them, the thought that a Pope had been murdered just a few years ago by ranking members of the Papal Curia in the Vatican itself was profoundly shocking.

Then they had to read a manifesto by the assembled Catholic Bishops in the United States, a manifesto which differed from the famous Communist Manifesto in style more than in content. Although the ecclesiastical princelings were a little less blatant than their rabble-rousing colleagues in Central and South America, who do not hesitate to salute Marx as the new Messiah and aver that Marx and old Jesus sing together in close harmony, there was no mistaking what they meant. I merely observe that the late Charles Smith, who was editor of The Truth Seeker until his death, in the first volume of his Sensism, the Philosophy of the West, predicted that Catholic doctrine, especially the Thomistic variety, and Marxist doctrine would eventually be amalgamated. When Smith wrote in 1956, his prediction seemed implausible to many observers, including me, but it is now obviously being fulfilled. The assembled Catholic Bishops in this country, speaking with their collective authority, have left almost nothing more to be done to perfect an oecunarrative is sufficiently shocking. He was doubtless aggrieved because Pope Paul II. had him tortured and his limbs dislocated to extort a confession about a supposed conspiracy, and he must be pardoned for some vehement comments on that man's character, but there is no reason to suppose that he misreports facts. My copy of his De vitis Pontificum was published at Venice in 1518 (thirty-nine years after the work was first printed); it is described on the title-page as an historia periocunda: such a work could be recommended as 'delightful' in the time before the Protestant Reformation made it scandalously detrimental to the great salvation-mart in Rome.

The murder of John Paul I. merely conformed, as I said, to a tradition that dates from the earliest days of the Church. The first Bishop of Rome who acquired some Papal powers was Damasus, a very competent man who attained his holy office by simply starting a riot and hiring a troop of tough gladiators to inform the incumbent Bishop, Felix, that God regretted having chosen him. Damasus thus became God's Vicar in 366 and set a precedent that was frequently followed during the Middle Ages, when God, in his mysterious way, inspired a holy man to attain the highest office in Christendom by starting a riot and, with a band of hired cutthroats, informing his predecessor or rival of God's will. Usually, the man who had lost God's favor was nimble enough to leave town while his supporters were being massacred. The era that ushered in the Renaissance was one of greater politeness and subtlety as well as learning, and the crudity of settling ecclesiastical competitions with daggers gave way to the more refined use of poisons to promote the desired harmony within the Church.

menical union of the two cults, except, perhaps, to decide definitely whether it would be best to demote old Jesus to merely human status or to promote Marx to the rank of Son of God. And, by this time, that is merely a trivial detail and could, perhaps, be settled by just tossing a penny.

The Bishops' manifesto bereaves many sincere Catholics of their faith in their church, and will doubtless bereave some of them of their faith in the religion that church once taught. That will be for them a traumatic experience, and entitle them to our sympathy. For the rest of us, the Bishops's crypto-Communist manifesto has some value as showing what a large body of shrewd and clever men, professionals in the Christ-business, after due deliberation, selected as the sales-pitch that would attract the greatest number of customers from the present population of the territory that is called the United States. Now they may not be right, but we should recognize their estimate of the mental and moral level of the populace today as an estimate made by experts who must be even more interested in promoting their own prosperity than in pleasing Jews.

We may also learn from the Bishops what Christianity becomes when it is stripped of the Western veneer that once made it acceptable to our race.

PARTISANSHIP

The Winter issue of the Southern Partisan contains a number of excellent articles. Dr. Forrest McDonald, Professor of History at the University of Alabama (when I last heard), in "Why Yankees Won't (and Can't) Leave the South Alone," discusses the malevolent righteousness of the Puritans and their morbid itch to meddle in other people's business, and notes that both the malevolence and the itch became more virulent as they lost faith in the bigoted and irrational religion from which they started. The thesis of the article is approximately the same as that of the article in The Pilgrim on which I commented in this April's issue of Liberty Bell.

Dr. Zed H. Burns, Professor of Psychology Emeritus at the University of Southern Mississippi, in his "Fort Sumter," traces the steps by which Lincoln's government gave South Carolina assurances that Fort Sumter would be evacuated while making secret preparations to sneak in reënforcements and hold a fort that could prevent ships from entering Charleston harbor. Thus Fort Sumter was an infallible means of starting a war that would produce enough killing and destruction to slake the blood-lust of the Abolitionists and exalt the righteousness of the hate-crazed Puritans.

There are other articles that I could and perhaps should mention, so it may not seem quite fair to consider here a short and unsigned editorial, but I do so, because it illustrates so concisely the topsy-turvy thinking of so many of our contemporaries.

The anonymous editor (several are listed on the masthead) notes that a person named Walter Burns (race unstated, but I have my guess) has emitted a claim that many more murderers are executed in the South than in the North because Southerners are "more vengeful," thus echoing the common view that "Southern culture has always been less enlightened." A little while ago, the same Walter Burns told a Southern audience that they were lucky that the Northern invaders in 1865 didn't just exterminate all the White men and women in the South, as they perhaps should have done.

That, as the editor observes, is the "enlightened" Burns' way of showing that he isn't "vengeful." Burns, of course, is a typical "Liberal intellectual," a species that does most of its thinking with mouth and glands, by-passing the organ for which they have little use after they have been programmed.

The editor has drawn a nice contrast between the two openings of the Burns mouth, and we applaud. Unfortunately, he does not stop at that point. He goes on to opine that it's all the fault of "materialism," because " 'enlightened' people no longer believe in God" and do "believe passionately, desperately in the supremacy of science." He even seems to believe that the poisonous propaganda that is injected into the minds of children in the schools and is called "social science" is scientific. It is, of course, on a par with "creation science" and similar frauds.

There is no scientific basis whatsoever for the drivel about the "sanctity of human life" about which we hear so much today. To be fair, we should note that there isn't any basis for that nonsense in the Christians' holy book either. The notion certainly is not found in the "Old Testament," unless one accepts the Jews' faith that only Jews are human, while Semites, Aryans, Mongolians, and all other races are merely animals to be exploited and slaughtered at will by God's masterpieces. And it certainly isn't in the "New Testament," of which the protagonist, a Jew and reportedly one-third of the Jews' god, explicitly asks to witness the butchery of persons unwilling to become his subjects and slaves. The doctrine certainly wasn't known during the Blütezeit of European Christianity, when no work was more godly than that of slaughtering the paynim, especially Moslems, and men too rational to believe in the wild tales of the Bible had to mask their own intelligence. The gabble about the "sanctity of human life" is a recent invention of the shamans for their own purposes, but they have put over the hoax so efficiently that it is generally regarded as an integral part of Christianity, and carried over into the crypto-Christian cults that pretend to dispense with gods and demons. But our point here is that there is no scientific basis for it whatsoever. In fact, biological evolution teaches us that species survive only by the rigorous elimination of the unfit, of physical and moral weaklings and monsters.

There is no scientific reason whatsoever why a nation, which is by definition an aggregate of persons who are born of the same ethnic division of one race, should tolerate within their territory the presence of alien and necessarily incompatible races unless they have been subjugated by one of them and so live at the discretion of their masters. There is good scientific evidence that a victorious race, if it does not have the racial fanaticism of the Jews, dooms itself to eventual servitude by tolerating in its midst an alien race, even as subjects and slaves. The drivel about "all mankind" and "brotherhood" is the very reverse of scientific: it was invented by Christian medicine-men on the basis of some statements attributed to the Jesus of the "New Testament" tales, which were probably intended to apply only to the Jews, with whom he professed to be uniquely concerned.

In short, all the follies of the "enlightened," of which the editor of the Southern Partisan complains, directly contradict the findings of materialistic science, and are only poisonous weeds sprung from the compost-heap of decaying religion. That swindlers call their hokum "scientific" means nothing: one has only to think of Mary Baker Eddy's lucrative promotion called "Christian Science," the version of Jewish messianism that Marx invented and called "scientific," the chicanery that is peddled as "creation science" to trap the ignorant, and the prosperity of the manufacturers of "scientifically tested" good-luck stones.

The editor has everything upside-down.* He indicts 'materialism' for the mawkish desire to spare criminals on the pretext that "no one is responsible for his own actions." A materialist who has freed himself from our endemic superstitions would tell you that it does not in the least matter whether or not a criminal is responsible for his own actions, any more than it matters whether or not a cobra has evil intentions when it strikes. A materialist is content with the fact it is folly for an individual to cuddle a cobra and for a society to cuddle criminals. Only minds that have been taught by Christianity to dote on whatever is diseased, deformed, and degenerate snivel over the execution of murderers, and it is noteworthy that they snivel only over criminals who represent our biological refuse. Although this spiritual sickness did not become epidemic before the Nineteenth Century, it is only a recrudescence of

* This may be explained by an editorial, doubtless by the same hand, that exalts the late Eric Voegelin, a refugee from "radical Nazi Germany," as "the most important thinker of the twentieth century," because "he wrote a magnificent history of the world's greatest civilizations, demonstrating conclusively that what made them great was not economic or political predominance, but an essentially religious vision of life." I was, I believe, scrupulously fair to Voegelin in my brief summary of his philosophy of history, written after the publication of his first three volumes (see the reprinting of my article in America's Decline, pp.213 f.).. As I then observed, it is to Voegelin's credit that he discerned the source of the deadly delusions of our society in "the metastatic will to transform reality by means of eschatological, mythical, or historiographic fantasy." I also remarked that it would not be fair to judge his theory until after the publication of the three remaining volumes, in which, as I said, he would "come to the three points that will most severely test the validity of his hypothesis: the origin of Christianity, the fall of the Roman Empire, and the Renaissance." I was right. The three volumes, promised for 1958-1959, were never published, and only many years later was Order and History summarily concluded with an incoherent fourth volume that it would not be charitable to examine in detail. Voegelin's analysis broke down at the critical points I identified, and when I wrote in 1963, I thought that was likely, although I refrained from expressing my misgivings about a grandiose work that began with the ravings of Jewish "prophets" about what they imagined to be the purposes of their tribal gods, and ended (when I wrote) with a volume that exalted the fantasies of Plato and degraded Aristotle because he did not "issue the call for repentance [!] and submission to the theocratic rule of the incarnate truth." We may respect Voegelin as a man who correctly identified a disease from which he did not know he was himself suffering. His Order and History was only another manifestation of the cancerous "will to transform reality by means of . . . fantasy."

RUSSIAN JEWS AND GENTILES

by
Mme. Z. Ragosin

A century ago, the Americans still had a country of their own, although they were admitting in droves the cunning enemies who were going to take it from them. They still had an educational system, as distinct from a machine to inculcate Marxist superstitions and the ignorance that goes with them. They had a number of large monthly magazines of literary quality, edited to standards that seem incredibly high today: Harper's, Scribner's, The Century, The Atlantic Monthly, The Pacific Monthly, The Forum, The Bookman, Lippincott's, and their less viable imitators. And in those now far-off days, the solidly established periodicals for highly literate audiences could publish articles that did not have Kosher approval, and could sustain such covert pressures as the Jews were then able to exert on them. Truth was still an objective in high-quality journalism. And so it was possible for Americans to read such articles as the one reprinted below.

*At present, Jews are rushing about the country frantically trying to ram their Holohoax into the minds of uninformed Americans, especially students in colleges, and, of course, they have the enthusiastic coöperation of the intellectual prostitutes who teach in universities and write hokum in the Jews newspapers—*shabbat goyim who, though Aryans, have as little self-respect as the Jews themselves. It has happened frequently during these brain-washing sessions that when some Kike was whining about the wicked Germans who didn't adore the sweet Jewish race, some alert student, who knew a little something about history, asked the performer why it is that Jews were always hated by the people of every country in which they established themselves.

That pertinent question invariably shocked the wailing Sheeny into incoherence. There was no plausible answer. When the Jewish occupation government in Washington has put over its "Genocide Treaty," making it a capital crime to displease God's Master Race, insolent Aryans who ask such questions can be hauled out to be beaten and tortured by the F.B.I. until they know their place in the world. In the meantime, however, the Yid on the platform has to stammer that Jews are such righteous people that the wicked resent their godliness.

When the world's Masters by Deceit lie about the Germans, they usually avoid mention of the 'pogroms' that actually did take place in some nations in which the common people could no longer endure the depredations of their alien vampires. Before they began to vent their venom on the Germans, the ophidian race used to whine about 'pogroms' in Russia, grotesquely exaggerating what happened and concealing the causes.

In the following article, an educated Russian lady, who tried to be fair and more than fair to her nation's parasites, explained of her own knowledge what caused the outbreaks of popular resentment for which the race of congenital liars blamed the Czarist government. The Jews even used the 'pogroms' as justification for their stealthy capture of the Russian Empire in 1917-1918, and the massacres by which they began their rule of open terror over the population they had deluded and captured.

We repeat—since an American of today will find it almost incredible—that this article was published in a major American periodical, widely circulated and highly esteemed, when our press had not been subjected to the stringent Jewish censorship that prevails today.

The article is reprinted from The Century Magazine, Vol. XXIII, No. 6, April 1882.

Anti-Semitic feeling still runs high: to this the late most unjustifiable demonstrations against Sarah Bernhardt in Galicia and Odessa bear witness. That it is especially strong in the eastern part of Europe, where the Israelites are most numerous and most firmly seated, is another indubitable fact. It also may be safely asserted that never, even in the quietest times, is this feeling wholly extinct. Were it otherwise, the popular outbreaks could not be so violent, so frequent, nor—to use a homely but expressive word—so "catching," nor so uniform in character, as they have been within not very many years in Roumania, Galicia, eastern Prussia, and, very lately, in the south of Russia.

When the effects are identical, the causes must be at least similar, and where the former recur with persistent iteration, the latter may be supposed to be permanent and deeply rooted. Now, looking back along the line of ages, we find that no historical event recurs more surely, though at irregular intervals, than popular outbreaks against the Jews. Wherein lies the cause of this singular tenacious phenomenon? Historians are quick and ready with their answer: "In religious intolerance, with its attendant spirits of fanaticism and persecution and in the antagonism of race." Such an explanation may pass muster for the ages of mediaeval darkness—but sweeping assertions seldom exhaust a subject, and this can be proved to be no exception to the rule. When the same phenomenon is reproduced periodically in our own time, under our eyes, and we are still told that "its only cause lies in religious intolerance and the spirit of persecution—more shame to our enlightened nineteenth century," and when this is made the burden of a general hue and cry from the so-called progressive and liberal press of most countries, we become slightly skeptical, and desirous of looking into the matter for ourselves and more closely. We hope better things of our own time; we are familiar with it, being a part of it, and we know that its ruling spirit is not that of religious intolerance. We also know, from the teachings of modern philosophical school of history, that the popular mind and feeling, however abrupt and unreasonable their outward manifestations may be, are strictly logical in their development, and that the masses, when they appear to be swayed by nothing but caprice, or a sudden gust of passion, or at best by a blind and defective instinct, are in reality ruled by irresistible hidden currents of historical life, not the less powerful because they act at great depths below the surface. To dive into those depths, to reach those currents, to ascertain their direction and force, is the task of the inquirer. Sometimes chance steps in, and by the discovery of some unexpected clew lightens the task. It so happens that such a clew, in this particular case, has been offered by a rather peculiar combination of circumstances in Russia several years ago, and the interest in the subject has been strongly and somewhat painfully revived by the widespread tumultuous occurrences of the last twelve months or so, it is surely worthy of a few moments' serious attention, under the guidance of these revelations, which, though they concern specially the condition, power, and act of the Russian Jews, will be found to possess more than strictly local importance. A convenient introduction is afforded us by the general rising against the Jews which took place last spring throughout the south-west of Russia, and of which scarcely more than a bare mention was transmitted at the time to this country.

I.

The disturbances began at Ielizavetgrad, in the middle of the Easter week. How did they begin? On what provocation? The immediate occasion was too trifling to have been more than a pretense, a signal for something long impending. The first three holidays had passed over quietly, when on the afternoon of Easter Wednesday, a quarrel took place at a much-frequented public-house on account of a broken drinking-glass, for which the offender refused to pay. The tavern-keeper, who was a Jew, from angry remonstrances passed to blows. A voice from the crowd around the bar was heard to shout: "They assault our people!" The uproar quickly spread along the street, and, in a few minutes, there was a mob of not less than a thousand men, which carried the news and the excitement from end to end of the city. The work of destruction began immediately, and raged all through the night and through the following day and evening, as late as midnight, when it stopped—not so much from fear of the troops who had been telegraphed for and only then had arrived, as because scarcely anything was left to destroy. To realize the extent of the ravages done, it must be kept in mind that Ielizavetgrad, situated on the highway between Poltava and Odessa, is a great commercial thoroughfare and a very wealthy city, with a population of forty-five thousand, of which fully one-third are Jews. The authorities were wholly unprepared. The ordinary police force was far too small to be of any use, and of the military only four squadrons of cavalry were on hand—a force particularly ill-suited for action in narrow, crowded streets—not quite five hundred men in all against a mob of many thousands, half of them women and children. It was a good-natured mob, too, which did not provoke violence by resistance, but dispersed at the first collision; but the broken groups would join again some streets further off, and carry their devastations to other quarters where the field was still clear. As for the citizens of the better classes, they, of course, took no part in the proceedings, but they did nothing to oppose them. Numbers followed the different mobs out of curiosity, as mere lookers-on. A certain secret sympathy with the rioters could even be detected, which the latter were not slow in perceiving, and acknowledged by sundry marks of friendly attention. Thus, on the "bazaar," or market-place, the ground being very wet and muddy, they spread it with carpets and woolen materials dragged out of the shops, at the same time politely inviting the spectators "to approach, as they need not be afraid of soiling their nice shoes." The citizens would probably not have preserved this passive attitude had the rioters shown themselves at all cruelly inclined, and threatened the persons of the Jews instead of venting their rage only on their property. But, as it was, the worst instincts of a mob were not called into play, ir great part owing to the prudence of the Jews themselves, who mostly kept out of sight. Had they "shown fight" at all, matters might have taken a more tragical turn, for the rioters gave signs of manifest irritation in the rare instances when revolvers were fired, very harmlessly, from windows. Crowds of women and children, and townspeople of the poorer sort, followed in their wake, picking up and carrying away all they could of the valuable property which covered the ground, or lay piled in mud-bespattered heaps, and literally could be had, not for the asking, but for the taking. A noteworthy feature, and one that shows how entirely the actors were mastered by one feeling, that of animosity toward the Jews, is that the rioters—mostly workmen, handicraftsmen, and peasants from the envions—did not take anything for themselves; they merely destroyed. Some shop-keepers and householders tried to ransom their goods with sums of money. One gave a thousand rubles, another two thousand; many gave a hundred and fifty or two hundred. The rioters took the money, but only to fling the coin away and tear the paper to shreds, and then went on with their work. The only temptation which they could not resist was whiskey (vodka).

In the cellars of wholesale spirit-warehouses, every barrel was staved in or the faucets were taken out, till the whiskey stood several feet deep and the barrels actually swam. Three men were saved from drowning only by the timely assistance of the soldiers. Many lay senseless about the streets, and were picked up in that condition hours afterward.* Yet, on the whole, the mob behaved—for a mob—with remarkable coolness and discrimination. Not a single Russian house or shop was touched, even by mistake, although protected only by crosses in white chalk on the doors and shutters, and occassionally by some saints' images (ikonas) and Easter loaves placed in the windows—a device which was found so efficient that the Jews did not fail to adopt it in other towns, where many saved their houses by it. Jews living in Christian houses were not molested; neither were Hebrew physicians and lawyers, they were considered useful members of society. Exceptions were made in favor of well-recommended individuals. Thus at the door of one house belonging to a Jew, the mob is confronted by a porter: "Boys," says he, "leave him alone! He is a good man, and often gives you work. I have been ten years in his service." "All right!", say the rioters, and pass on.

When the outrages were stopped at last, and the excitement had worn itself out, the city presented the strangest, wildest aspect. The streets were as white as after a fall of snow, for one of the mob's chief amusements had been to rip up every feather-bed and pillow they came across, and fling out the contents. The wooden houses were shattered, the furniture broken to pieces and left in heaps, mingled with kitchen utensils and household goods of every kind. Here might be seen the hulk of a grand piano, with lid and legs wrenched off and strings hanging out; further on, fine mahagony reduced almost to chips, with velvet rags still clinging to them, and close to that the debris of painted furniture of the commonest description. Not a pane of glass, not a window-frame, nor a door was left whole. Inside the houses the same ravages had been committed everywhere, with methodical regularity; every object, even the smallest, was broken or spoiled for use; the very stoves were demolished; nothing escaped destruction.

The pawnbrokers' offices were the first to suffer; then came the public-houses, the wholesale wine and spirit shops, then the other shops, and lastly whatever the mob set eyes on that belonged to Jews. The marketplace or bazaar was one motley chaos of drygoods, broken crockery, ready-made clothes, ironware, leather goods, spilt flour and grain. Of course, a vast amount of property was secured and carried off by marauders of the poorer classes, especially women and children who followed the rioters for the purpose; but when a bill was posted all over the city, explaining that such conduct would be considered as robbery or secretion of stolen goods, and requiring all such unlawful prizes to be delivered at the different police stations within three days, whole wagon-loads began to arrive, not only from different parts of the city, but even from the surrounding villages. These simpletons actually did not know that they were committing a blamable act and incurring a severe responsibility When questioned or rebuked, they answered with the greatest candor: "Why, we did not steal these things; they were lying around, so we picked them up. We meant no harm." Of course, there were exceptions, and in several instances, especially in other cities, great quantities of valuable goods, as jewelry, watches, silks, and the like, were found in the possession of people whose social position put the plea of ignorance out of the question. Nay, well-dressed women—ladies they could not be called—had been seen to drive to the scene of destruction, and to fill their carriages with plunder. Many a private grudge, too, may have been indulged under cover of the confusion, as in the case of a certain tradesman in Kief, who rushed into the house of a wealthy Hebrew merchant at the head of a band of rioters, gave the signal of destruction by shattering with his own hands the piano and largest mirror, and under whose bed many valuables belonging to the same merchant were afterward found.

In Kief and Odessa the riots broke out a few weeks later, in May and June, and took a rather more malignant character: more personal outrages were committed; the troops and police were resisted, so that several people were killed and about two hundred wounded; passers-by, who were accidentally met by infuriated bands, were in imminent danger and escaped it only by crossing themselves ostentatiously, after two men had already been struck down by mistake; two or three times the mob viciously had recourse to fire, poured kerosene on pieces of dry-goods, or set fire to barrels of oil, petroleum, tar, and pitch, and only the greatest vigilance prevented a general conflagration.

While all this was going on in the large cities, the small towns naturally followed suit. Great agitation prevailed in the villages also, but with comparatively trifling results,—on the one hand, because numbers of the peasantry had joined the rioters in the great centers; on the other, because immediately after the occurrences in Ielizavetgrad, Government officials had been dispatched all over the country, to talk to the people, exhort them to keep quiet, and explain to them to what consequences they would expose themselves unless they did. This was a most necessary measure, for the country people had somehow got possessed of an idea that a rising against the Jews would be connived at. There were even vague rumors abroad that it was desired, nay that a certain mysterious "paper" had come from headquarters formally authorizing it, which paper was withheld from the public only because the local officials had been bribed by the Jews to conceal it. Where and how such nonsense could have originated and been circulated has never been found out. The fact, at all events, points to some hidden machinations, some underhanded leadership, and there can be little doubt that the Nihilists—or Socialists—were concerned in the movement, and secretly fomented it. Proclamations were found in the streets of Poltava, and along the most frequented Post-roads, exhorting the people to massacre the Jews and the property holding classes. In another place, a woman disguised as a policeman, was caught distributing small printed sheets of the same description. Odessa being a university city, the workings of the socialistic propaganda was especially apparent there, and strange to say, of the students arrested for openly inciting the mob to the plundering and destruction of Jewish property, and to riotous proceedings generally, one was himself an Israelite. Yet, in the great amount of lawlessness committed in those wild weeks, there are isolated cases which do not warrant the assumption generally set up in official circles that the Jewish riots of last spring were entirely the work of "the party." It was not to be supposed that the revolutionary agents should miss so good a chance of working on inflammable material—offered them, so to speak, ready for use. But their efforts must be looked upon as one of many sparks falling on a train of gunpowder.

The above is a very condensed, but faithful and not incomplete, account. Anecdotes might be multiplied, but as it is, no characteristic feature has been omitted. And now, after attentively perusing it, who will venture to affirm that religious animosity or the spirit of intolerance had anything whatever to do with the deplorable outrages committed on one-third of the population by the other two-thirds? On the contrary, do we not see that every motive except that one was at work more or less openly? Popular revenge, political propaganda, common greed, commercial rivalry,—as in the case of the small Russian tradesmen, who would not be sorry to get rid of Hebrew competition, nor averse to getting the same exhorbitant interest themselves,—in short, most human passions are in play except religious intolerance. If more is needed to complete the evidence, here are a few miscellaneous scraps to the point, "When I reached the corn-bazaar," writes a special correspondent of the Golos, from Kief, "the Jewish shops were already demolished and plundered; the mob was just attacking the public houses. Having broken in doors and windows, they rolled the barrels out on the street and broke them to pieces. Whiskey flowed in streams. The rioters waded—they bathed—in whiskey. The marauding women carried it away by pailfuls. Through the uproar I could clearly distinguish the shouts coming from all sides. 'The Jews have lorded it over us long enough!' 'It is our turn now!' 'They have got everything into their own hands!' 'Life is too dear!' 'They grind us to death!', etc. Some well-intentioned persons went about amongst groups of idlers, who were evidently anxious to begin operations, and were forming into a sufficiently numerous mob, and tried to dissuade them. 'How can you be so foolish?', they would say, 'Don't you know that you will be punished?' The reply in almost every case amounted to this: 'No matter; we will take our punishment—it will be only once. The Jews torture us all our lives.' "

It is a fact so well known in Russia as to need no repetition or argument, that it is in part the merciless and systematic "exploitation," or as the people so ghraphically describe it, the sucking out of the country's blood by the Jews, which has brought the peasantry of the West to the depths of destitution. As a consequence, never, in the whole course of our history, has the rage for emigration been so much of an epidemic as it is growing to be since the Government has opened the wide fields of eastern Siberia and the Amoor country to settlers, offering them assistance, encouragement, and advantages. The Little-Russian peasant, like every tiller of the soil, is deeply attached to the land that nourishes him and his family. Such a land, too!—one of the healthiest, wealthiest, most fertile regions in the world. Yet this fruitful land—the very "land of milk and honey"—they will abandon in gangs, half-villages at a time, their wives and children and some few wretched household goods piled on their wooden wagons, drawn by small emaciated horses, sometimes a cow tied in the rear, but more frequently of late despoiled even of this last friend and chief support of the little ones, and start on their dreary tramp across half of the one continent and the whole of another,—to them an incalculable number of miles,—for a distant, absolutely strange, nay, unimaginable goal, which half of them never reach,—all of this with a recklessness which can come of nothing but despair. *

Russia has millions of Mohammedan subjects. I do not mean our new subjects of Central Asia, but the Tatars along the Volga and in the Crimea, and the inhabitants of the highlands of the Caucasus. They are received in the public schools and colleges, were they are taught the principles of their religous law by doctors (mollahs) of their own. They furnish good soldiers and dinstinguished officers to our army. They ply various crafts in the midst of our native population, especially those of peddlers, of cabdrivers, and hotel-waiters. They are thrifty and peaceable. Who ever heard of hostile outbreaks against them? A little good-humored raillery is all they ever have to encounter at the hands of our people, who will call them "Pig-ear" in fun, or sometimes in derision, when angry or quarreling, in allusion to their horror of pork. "Shaved-pate" is also a current appellation, which they are so far from taking in bad part that a Tatar peddler, if so hailed by some housewife from the other side of the street, will immediately walk over, and, of course, drive the best bargain he can. But the people would no more think of attacking the Tatar quarter in St. Petersburg, or demolishing and plundering a Tatar village on the Volga, than of so dealing with a Russian bazaar or homestead. Where, then, is the difference? Why this imperturbable good understanding with fellow-subjects of one race and religion, and this ineradicable animosity against those of another?

II.

If we were told that a great state, embracing under its rule populations belonging to several distinct races, had in the number several millions of subjects who, outwardly peacable and harmless, nay, timid to cowardice and submissive to servility, were yet unceasingly and systematically undermining the well-being of the country they inhabit; who, while enjoying the fullest religious toleration and liberty of public worship, scrupulously perform every year a public religious ceremony which offers a loop-hole of release from the obligation of keeping any oath or promise made to the Government or to individuals belonging to the state religion; who, while sheltered by the laws equally with all their fellow-subjects, and, like them, entitled to sit in local courts of justice, are bound, under the direct penalties of excommunication, to decide cases brought before them only according to instructions received from a secret tribunal of their own; who are authorized and taught by their law to consider the persons and property of their fellow-subjects, if belonging to a different race and religion from theirs, as their natural patrimony, lawful for them to secure by any means; lastly, who contrive to feed whole districts in part on the refuse of the meat slaughtered for themselves,—if such a state of things were described to us as existing actually, in a great country, under a strong and well-established government, would not such a statement awaken in us a feeling of incredulity amounting to a total disbelief? Surely no government can for a single moment tolerate so monstrous an anomaly! Certainly not—i.e., not with its eyes open. But there are many ways of blinding the most wakeful eyes. Argus had a hundred of them, yet Hermes could charm them all. That the above is no wild fiction, but a statement of facts, an account of the condition in which the entire west and south-west of Russia has been for centuries, and is now, is the startling discovery which we owe to the remarkable collection of authentic documents, edited in 1869 by Jacob Brafmann, under offical patronage, and with the means of a semi-official source. But before examining and quoting the work, something must be said of the man, whose marked individuality invites attention.

There have of old been Jews of two descriptions, so different as to be like to distinct races. There were the Jews who saw God and proclaimed His law, and those who worshipped the golden calf and yearned for the flesh-pots of Egypt; there were the Jews who followed Jesus, and those who crucified Him; there were the thinkers and the sticklers; the men of the spirit and the men of the letter; Spinoza and his persecutors. To borrow, for a moment, Renan's noble and striking language, "in the course of its long history, Israel has always had an admirable minority which protested against the errors of the majority of the nation. A vast dualism is the very essence of this singular people's life. It has been divided, so to speak, into two opposing families, of which the one represented the narrow, malevolent, hair-splitting materialistic side of the genius of Israel, the other its liberal, benevolent, idealistic side. The contrast has always been striking."*

Jacob Brafmann is distinctively a Jew, but distinctively belongs to the "admirable minority." Of humble parentage, and in no way favored by fortune, he was raised out of his sordid surroundings and the narrow groove of his early training by nothing but the predominance of "the liberal, benevolent, idealistic" element in his nature. His boyhood was the same unenviable round of useless, unintelligent school learning, mischievous idleness, and precocious familiarity with sharp practice of every kind, which makes the Hebrew youth of the poorer class so unattractive a specimen. "Education" for the Hebrew boy of small means begins, indeed, at the age of five or six, but consists entirely in learning to read and memorizing the "Prayer-books;" then chapters from the Pentateuch, with scraps of Talmudistic commentary, and it may be, at the last stage, fragments from the Talmud itself. Then, at seventeen or eighteen, comes marriage with all its cares and burdens,—and Hebrew wedlock is proverbially prolific,—but too often without its solace and companionship, for the matter is usually arranged by the respective families, without reference to the young people's wishes or sympathies. Poor Brafmann fared but ill at this pass; the mate assigned him was exceptionally uncongenial to him. Doggedly he worked for his family, plying alternately sundry small trades and various crafts—that of cab-driver, of photographer, etc., with the versatility peculiar to his race, and to which they are partly driven by the necessities of an overcrowded, over-stocked market in those centers of dense and abjectly poor Jewish population. But unlike his brethren he did not sink and harden in degradation. Through all those years of loveless, thankless toil, he never ceased to think, to observe, to learn—nay, to study, in the real and higher sense of the word, robbing many of his nights of their necessary rest, and bitterly upbraided by his young wife on account, not of his health, which suffered under the excessive strain, but of the candle which "he wasted." He became a Hebrew scholar, he learned Russian and German—the literary German, not the mongrel jargon which Jews all talk in those parts—at the age of thirty-four; he even taught himself to read and understand French and Latin. He read the New Testament, and studied deeply in

* Les Evangiles et la Seconde Generation Chretienne, page 12. ..

Christian theology. At length, and from sincere conviction, he became an open convert to Christianity, and received baptism. Life among his own people had now become impossible, but the education which he had given himself with almost superhuman persistence and intuition had fitted him for better things, and when he was appointed teacher of the Hebrew language at the seminary* of Minsk, in 1860, he found himself in an honorable and, comparatively speaking, comfortable position.

Even before that, Brafmann had attracted the Emperor's attention by addressing to him a memoir concerning the anomalous position and conditions of life of his Hebrew subjects. The consequence was that, together with his appointment, he received an imperial order to study and propose ways and means for removing the tremendous obstacles which Jewish converts encounter when they declare their intention of becoming Christians. To aid him in his researches, access was opened to the greatest variety of sources bearing on the question,—and on the one hand by the support of the bishop, on the other, by that—less official, but perhaps more effective—of many a Hebrew well-wisher. "It was thus," says Brafmann, in his preface, "that a rich collection of materials accumulated in my portfolio, valuable not only for my special object, but as illustrating the condition of the Hebrew generally. The most prominent feature of my collection is a package of more than one thousand authentic documents, never published until this time—ordinances, resolutions, and acts of divers Jewish kahals (administrative councils) and beth-dins (courts of justice), which are of great importance as representing that practical side of modern Jewish life which can never be discerned by outsiders—by those who have not, so to speak, been reared within the synagogue walls." "These documents," it is said, further on, "afford convincing evidence that the kahal and beth-din rule the private and social life of the Jewish population in a great measure independent of the Talmud, and that their own private ordinances, supported by the penalty of the kherem (excommunication) are of far greater moment to the modern Jew than the Talmud. They show as clearly as possible in what way and by what means the Jews, notwithstanding their limited rights, have always succeeded in driving alien elements from the towns and boroughs where they have settled, to get into their hands the capital and immovable property in those places, and to get rid of all competition in commerce and trades, as has been the case in the western provinces of Russia, in Poland, Galicia, Roumania; by what miracle it could come to pass that whole departments of France were found to be mortgaged to the Jews in 1806, as Napoleon tells Champagny in his letter of November 9th of that year, although they formed only an insignificant minority in the empire, in all sixty thousand. Finally, what is most important to us, these documents contain the plain answer to the question why the labor and money expended by our Government, in the course of the present century, on the reformation of the Jews have brought no result." Of these thousand documents, ranging from 1794 to 1883, Brafmann published in his book, The Kahal, a selection of two hundred and eighty-five, mostly dated from Minsk, in the government of the same name. Their authenticity is proved (1) by their very ancient look; (2) by the uniform notarial handwriting; (3) by the signatures of many persons which can be identified from other existing sources; (4) by the water-mark in the paper on which they are written.

Before we examine their contents and the conditions of life which they illustrate, it may be well to define the exact meaning of some words which incessantly recur in them, and, first of all, that of the term 'kahal' itself.

The kahal, abbreviated from the kheder-ha-kahal, is the town council or administrative council of a Jewish community. Officially it purports to discharge only a few modest duties, distributing the taxes among their people, for the punctual payment of which they assume the responsibility before the Government, taking care of the sick, superintending the synagogue and all that pertains to Hebrew worship, ceremonial, and religious observances. On these grounds the institution is not only tolerated, but sanctioned and actively supported by the Government. In reality, it wields supreme, absolute, an unquestioned power over every phase of Hebrew life, both private and social, and manages to use the local Christian authorities as its unwitting tools, not only against its Gentile fellow-subjects, but against any of its own people who might feel inclined to demur at the heavy yoke imposed on them. To show that this is so, and what are the means employed, is the object of Brafmann's book, and will be that of our next chapter.

The beth-din is the Talmudic court of justice, which exists in every Jewish community without exception, under the high protection of the kahal, and under whose jurisdiction are placed all transgressions and litigations arising between private Jews, or between such and the kahal. It answers to all the needs of Jewish mercantile life, and takes the place of the ancient Sanhedrin. It is a sacred institution, and its attributes are, even now, very sensitive. It pretends to be simply a court of amicable arbitration, and is tolerated, but not officially recognized, by the Government.

The kherem, or great excommunication, is the last resort and most terrible weapon which the kahal and beth-din always keep in reserve to quell incipient rebellion or punish actual disobedience. Brafmann gives the entire form which, besides being very monotonous, is too long for reproduction here. There is something appalling in the virulence and malignancy of the curses launched upon the offender's head, and it is not astonishing that even liberal-minded Jews should often have faltered and been daunted before its tremendous vehemence. A general malediction is first pronounced in the name of God and all the celestial powers; then a special one for every month of the year, in this form: "If he is born in the month of Nisan, which is ruled by the Archangel Uriel, may he be accursed of that archangel and his angels," and so forth through the remaining eleven months; also the days of the week and the four seasons; then comes the final imprecation, to which great poetic force cannot be denied:

"May the Lord's calamity hasten to overtake him; God, the Creator! break him! bend him! May fiends encounter him! Be he accursed wherever he stands! May his spirit depart suddenly, may an unclean death seize him, and may he not end the month! May the Lord visit him with consumption, brain-fever, inflammation, insanity, ulcers, and jaundice! May he pierce his breast with his own sword, and may his arrows be broken! May he be as chaff which the wind drives before it, and may the Angel of God pursue him! May his path be beset with dangers, covered with darkness! May he encounter direct despair, and may he fall into the net spread for his feet by God! May he be driven out of the realm of light into the darkness, and cast out of the world! Misfortunes and sorrows shall fright him. He shall behold with his eyes the blows that shall fall on him. He shall be sated with the wrath of the Almighty. He shall be clothed with curses as with a garment. And God shall give no forgiveness to this man, but pour His wrath and vengeance upon him, and all the curses shall enter into him that are written in the Law."

And as though this were not yet explicitly enough, the denunciation is further completed in the circular addressed to "the wise men and elders of the nation, to notify them that a son of Israel has been cast into the outer darkness. After the introductory greeting and the enumeration of the offenses of the accused person, the kahal continues:

"Therefore, we have laid the Kherem on him. Do ye likewise, daily. Proclaim publicly that his bread is the bread of a Gentile; that his wine is the wine of idolatry; that his vegetables are impure, and his books even as the books of magicians. Ye shall not eat with him, nor drink with him; ye shall not perform the rite of circumcision on his son, and ye shall not teach his children the law, nor bury his dead, nor receive him into any corporations; the cup that he has drunk from ye shall wash, and in every respect ye shall treat him as a Gentile."

And now, after these necessary explanations, we can at last turn to that part of our subject to which the foregoing pages have been in reality only an introduction.

III.

"Die Juden bilden einen Staat im Staate." These words of Schiller, Brafmann takes as his motto. Referring to them in the course of his book, he remarks that as a state without a territory is not admissible, so these words are usually taken by unsuspecting outsiders for a poetic figure rather than an historical truth. They little imagine that the fiction is turned into a momentous reality by a short item in the Talmud, which lays down as a fundamental axiom that "the property of Gentiles is even as a waste, free unto all"* (i.e., all Jews). Now, as the kahal has the supreme direction of the affairs of every community, it follows that the kahal of each district considers itself the only rightful owner and legal disposer of the territory within its jurisdiction, no matter who may hold it or any part of it in actual possession, Jew or Gentile, and that not arbitrarily, but on the ground of the kheskat-ishoub, a right well defined in the Talmudic code called Koshen-Hamishpat, and the works of its learned expounders. One of the highest authorities among the latter, Rabbi Joseph Kouloun, in his highly respected work, Questions and Answers, compares the property of Gentiles (section 132) to "a lake free to all," in which, however, no one may spread his nets but a Jew duly authorized by the kahal. We continue in Brafmann's own words?

"Considering, then, the Gentile population of its districts as 'its lake' to fish in, the kahal proceeds to sell portions of this strange property to individuals on principles, as strange. To one uninitiated in kahal mysteries, such a sale must be unintelligible. Let us take an instance. The kahal, in accordance with its own rights, sells to the Jew N. a house which, according to the state laws of the country, is the inalienable property of the Gentile M., without the latter's knowledge or consent. Of what use, it will be asked, is such a transaction to the purchaser? The deed of sale delivered to him by the kahal cannot invest him with the position which every owner assumes toward his property. M. will not give up his house on account of its having been sold by the kahal, and the latter has not the power to make him give it up. What, then, has the purchaser N. acquired for the money paid by him to the kahal? Simply this: he has acquired khazaka—i.e., right of ownership over the house of the Gentile M., in force whereof he is given the exclusive right, guaranteed from interference or competition from other Jews, to get possession of said house, as expressly said in the deed of sale, 'by any means whatever.' Until he has finally succeeded in transferring it to his official possession, he alone is entitled to rent that house from its present owner, to trade in it, to lend money to the owner and other Gentiles who may dwell in it—to make profits out of them in any way his ingenuity may suggest. This is what is meant by khazaka. Sometimes the kahal sells to a Jew even the person of some particular Gentile, without any immovable property attached. This is how the law defines this extraordinary right, which is called meropie: 'If a man (meaning a Jew) hold in his power a Gentile, it is in some places forbidden to other Jews to enter into relations with that person to the prejudice of the first; but in other places it is free to every Jew to have business relations with that person, to lend him money, give him bribes, and despoil him, for it is said that the property of a Gentile is hefker (free to all), and whoever first gets possession of it, to him it shall belong."*

It will be noticed what stress is laid on money-lending as a means to effect the desired transfer of property. Indeed, it is the mainspring of the operation, and a case of failure is very rare. The proposed victim is tempted into borrowing, and enticed on and on by proffered facilities so long as it is supposed he still has a chance of rescue. When he has become entangled in the meshes of renewed bills and compound interest wholly beyond the range of his resources, the blow descends; and the fortunate purchaser enters into open possession of his secretly long-cherished property. Perhaps he sells it then to a Christian, so that it may revert back to the kahal as hefker, and the process begins over again, to the advantage of some new 'fisher.' And the beauty of the thing is, there is no risk attached to it. If people will borrow, they have to pay, and there are courts of justice in the land to see that they do. No matter what artifices have been used to inveigle them, what amount of fine psychology has been put in play to find out their weak sides and attack them—the law has nothing to do with that. In the rural districts, the process is stil' easier and the result still sadder. Jews do not live in villages; there is nothing for them to do there. They prefer more populous and, above all, wealthier centers, where the artificial demands of city life give scope to the display and bartering of tempering wares of all kinds.

Of these wares, there is one which has overworked, underfed, every careworn peasant cannot resist—vodka. It is warmth in the inhuman winter cold; mirth in his rare hours of rest; strength—fictitious, it is true, yet upholding him for the time—when he sinks under the day's task; medicine in sickness; above all, it is forgetfulness. And if poets, with everything to make life a dream of beauty, have cried out in weariness of heart, "The best of life is but intoxication," surely the poor plodder may be excused for feeling the same in the only sense accessible to his limited experience. And truly, in moderation, whiskey is a necessity to our peasant, imposed by the climate and the conditions of his life. But how easy the slip into excess! and where the line? Well do the Jews know all this, and so the public-houses in the villages are all kept by Jews—a plenteous and never-failing source of replenishment to the exchequer of the kahal. In every village are one or two public-houses, or more, according to its size and the number of it inhabitants; for there must not be more fishers than the lake can support, nor must it be fished out all at once. How complete the success let any village of our western provinces witness, with its wretched, weather-beaten cabins, hingeless doors and shutters, crooked and thatchless roofs, and rotting door-steps; its tottering, yawning barns, scantily propped by poles; empty stables, solitary plows and wagons under ruinous sheds; finally, the long trains of Amoor emigrants mentioned in our first chapter. And if figures are wanted, let this suffice: in 1869, seventy-three per cent of all the immovable property of the western provinces had passed into the hands of the Jews.

If we turn to the documents themselves, our amazement increases, for there, indeed, the assertion which we were half inclined to doubt assumes a body and becomes a living reality. Here are three—Nos. 22, 23, and 26, dated Minsk, 1796,—which relate to the dispute between the kahal and a certain Eliazar, "about the possession of a house and lot of ground belonging to the uncircumcized hatter, Zvansky." Eliazar claims it on the ground that it was sold to his dead father, but there is a flaw in the title. In disputes of this kind the kahal generally wins the day. So this case ends by the beth-din adjudging the property to the kahal, "who may sell it to whomever it pleases." No. 77—dated 1799—records the sale to the wealthy and illustrious Jochiel-Michael" of a stone building, containing two shops, with their cellars and upper stories, belonging to the Russian Baikoff; while No. 205—dated 1802—gives half of the same property to another person in payment of an old debt, "seeing that Jochiel-Michael has not yet paid in full the sum due for those shops." The house of the uncircumcized blacksmith, Seleza, and that of the German carpenter, Johann, are disposed of in Nos. 115 and 195, and we may be sure these buildings did not in the end escape their destination, even though hatter, shopkeeper, blacksmith, and carpenter continued for a while to follow their several pursuits, each within its own premises, in the security of ignorance. Nor does the kahal limit its operations to private property. It is rather startling to find it disposing (No. 105) of "a convent, formerly possessed by Carmelite monks, but now occupied by Franciscans," with all its buildings and outbuildings, in wood or stone, the distillery belonging to it, as well as the convent meadows and vegetable gardens, with the usual remark that "the purchase money has b(9 n paid to a farthing;" of a hospital, with the piece of ground thereto pertaining, held in actual possession by a certain Catholic charitable brotherhood (No. 261); and, finally, appointing arbiters to decide a litigation between itself, the kahal , and a private individual, concerning the right of possession to several shops, stone buildings, owned by the Bishop of Minsk (No. 177). We pass over a long array of documents of exactly the same nature, only observing that in the statute of the kahal and beth-din of the city of Vilna, composed in the approved and general model, the obligation to see that Jews do not interfere with each other's khazakas and meropies is especially mentioned as one of their functions and attributions. Moreover, the interesting "angling" process can be followed step by step in Gustav Freytag's powerful novel, Soll und Haben (Debit and Credit) in which we see the wealthy usurer Hirsch Ehrental systematically going to work on the property of the easy-going and imprudent Baron Rothsattel, until the wished-for consummation is happily achieved.

It is well known how punctilious orthodox Jews are about their food, and how particular about having their meat butchered and cooked according to certain very strict regulations laid down in the Talmud; also how great and enduring is their repugnance to share the food of Gentiles, even though they will occasionally welcome a Christian guest to their own table. But what is less generally known is that this peculiarity of theirs, respected everywhere as a feature of their religious observances, very greatly affects, both directly and indirectly, the well-being of the populations among whom they are settled. So little is this suspected that no sort of objection is raised against their building slaughter-houses, and getting the entire butcher's trade into their own hands; indeed, the fact is mentioned with perfect innocence in the Russian Code of Laws;* "In most of the towns of the western provinces there are no butchers but Jews, and only that meat is sold to Christians which is not found kosher." It is supposed that the whole difference between kosher and tref (lawful and forbidden, clean and unclean meat) lies in the observance of, or departure from, certain ridiculously trivial and minute Talmudic ordinances concerning the knife to be used for slaughtering, its shape, sharpness, smoothness, the exact spot on the animal's throat across which it is to be drawn, and the like. If this were all, there would be no harm in handing over to the Christians meat pronounced unfit for the use of their fastidious Jewish brethren. But this is not all. When the animal has been successfully dispatched, according to all the refinements of Talmudic law,* its internal parts—brain, heart, lungs, liver, bowels, etc.—are submitted to the closest examination from an hygienic point of view, and if a taint or symptom of disease is discovered in any of them, the whole carcass is pronounced tref, and put into the market for sale to the Christian population. "We cannot wonder," remarks Brafmann, "at the profound loathing with which Jew regard the food of Christians, knowing as they do that much of the meat which is sold them is actually no better than carrion." Nor does their conscience sting them in the least for so unjustifiable a proceeding since they have for it the authority of the Mosaic law, which expressly says (Deuteronomy xiv. 21) "Ye shall not eat of any thing that dieth of itself: thou shalt give it unto the stranger that is in thy gates, that he may eat it; or thou mayest sell it unto an alien; for thou art a holy people unto the Lord thy God."

* Vol. V. Note to section 280, para. 42.

Indirectly, the condition of the entire country (that part of it where the Jews are allowed to dwell) is influenced by this separatism, because it furnishes the kahal with its principal and most unfailing revenue,—universally known under the curious name of "box-duty,"—and thus always keeps it provided with large sums of ready money, which it uses at its own discretion to further the interests of the community, or avert any obnoxious interference on the part of the Christian authorities—principally by means of bribes to police officials and employes. The regulations about this tax and its collection form quite a complicated organization, too important in its effects to be dismissed with only a passing notice. It necessitates a considerable staff of officials, who hold their functions on oath and under dread of the kherem. First there are the professional slaughterers, trained in the business of killing according to Talmudic rules, and appointed by the kahal. All cattle or fowls, without exception, that are to be consumed in the town—either for the market or for private use—must be slain by them, on pain of being considered "even as carrion": the owner of a chicken may not kill it to make soup for his sick wife, but must take it to the sworn slaughterer. A certain duty has to be paid to the agents of the kahal, always present on the premises, on every head of cattle,—ox, calf, sheep, or goat,—and on every fowl, varying according to their kind. It is to be paid, not in paper or copper coin, but in silver, and the slaughterer is forbidden "to unsheath his knife before it has been so paid." This is only part of the box-duty. By far the greater part of it is levied on the retail sale of kosher meat. This part falls on the purchasers, who pay three groats in silver (about one cent) on every pound they buy. Meat brought in from the surrounding country pays the same duty—i.e., the owner can neither use it nor sell it unless he pays his three groats per pound to the collectors of the kahal. Even fat is not exempt from the duty, and anyone who purchases either from a private person (i.e., not from a butcher in the meat-market) must be shown the receipt of the collectors, or he may find himself devouring "carrion," "food unclean as pork," and come under the canonical kherem in consequence. There is in the market a special room, in which the collectors sit all day long to receive the money, while two superintendents continually "walk the floor" of the market, to see that every purchaser, after having received his piece of meat from the butcher, takes it straightway into the collector's office, to be reweighed and to pay the duty. It is amusing to note the precautions that are taken to secure the money from fraud or foul play of any kind. "The collectors, to avoid abuses," it is stated in the regulation (Document No. 88), "are forbidden under penalty of the most terrible kherem, to put it in their pockets, but must slip it into a locked box, with a slit in the top." (Hence the name "box-duty.") Every evening they are to count the money, enter it into the book, then transfer it, at least twice a week, into a strong box deposited under the care of one of the rich men of the city, who, however, is not entrusted with the key—or rather keys—one of which remains with the collectors, while the other is in the charge of a third person, appointed every month by election.

The contents of the strong-box are verified once a month, by persons specially appointed. When the kahal makes a demand for money from the box-sums, "it must be signed by five members at least" (there are nineteen in all), and the money is taken out and delivered by both collectors jointly, not otherwise. Butchers, in consideration of their having paid box-duty for the slaughtering of the animals, are allowed to sell kosher meat two groats per pound higher than tref, so that the Jewish purchaser really pays a double duty on his meat.

A number of documents show that a great part of this box-money is regularly expended in bribes, either on given occasions, for an object, or in a generally propitiating manner, as gratuitous gifts on the two great holidays of the year—New Year's Day and Easter. These latter offerings being a very ordinary occurrence, in accordance with an old custom of the country, are registered quite openly as "holiday presents to the authorities" (No. 4); or to be taken from the box-money a hundred zlots (a little over ten dollars) "to buy coffee and sugar for presents to the authorities at Easter" (No. 114); or, "ordained by the 'chiefs of the city' to go the usual round at Easter, the necessary sums to be taken from the box-money" (No. 73); or, "bought four loaves of sugar, best quality, eighty-two pounds in all," for New Year's presents (No. 244). Actual bribes, given for a purpose, being of not so harmless a nature, are neither given nor expressed so openly. The documents which record the expense are worded covertly, as: "A hundred rubles to be employed in the purchase of rye and other grain for a certain purpose, and fifty rubles to be given to the secretary of the governor in acknowledgement of a certain service" (No. 33). The agents employed in such cases are instructed to do their best to secure proofs of the transaction, so that the kahal may always hereafter have it in its power to exercise control over the official who has yielded to temptation, by threatening to divulge his offense. When affairs in the issue of which the Jewish community is interested—or a corporation, or even private individuals—are being transacted in one of the local courts, clever and trusty agents are directed to watch the case, and, if necessary, to give it a gentle push in the right direction by trying various blandishments on the members of the court, —such, for instance, as providing a luncheon, with choice wines, for the judges (No. 37). Now all this materially, if indirectly, affects the condition of the country at large, for every unlawful favor shown to the Jews is sure to react in a prejudicial manner on the Christian population. And were it not for the right to levy box-money on kosher meat, the kahal would not have always ready to its hand extensive means to dispose of in this way. Therefore it has taken care to secure to itself this never-failing source of revenue, by enlisting the Government on its side. It was easy for it to do this by assuming the responsibility for the payment of the taxes by the Jewish communities, and by undertaking to supply the required number of recruits or the corresponding "exemption-Money" (under the old military system), and by representing the box-duty as the easiest and surest means to this end, as a supplementary reserve income, from which the taxes should be paid for the poor or insolvent members of the community. The consequence is that this duty, together with all the regulations about kosher meat, without which it could not be levied, are under the sanction and protection of the Russian law, and actively supported by the local authorities, whose aid and assistance the kahal may claim at any moment. The following are the express terms of the law:

"Subject to the box-duty are: (1) The slaughtering of cattle (per head of cattle; (2) of fowls (per each fowl); (3) the sale of kosher meat (per pound); (4) another item of the box-money is the fines imposed for the non-observance of the regulations on this subject."*

"The police, both urban and rural, and all other local authorities, are bound to render their aid and assistance, when such is required in legal form, to see that the box-duty be paid by the Jews without opposition or fraud."†

How far the official object of the institution is achieved may be seen from the fact that, in 1867, there was a balance against the Jews in the government of Vilno of 293,868 rubles, 36 1/2 copecks arrear on taxes, and 341,097 rubles, 15 copecks arrear on taxes against those of Minsk. (A ruble is one hundred kopecks, and worth about seventy-five cents United States money.)

* Statute on Taxes; supplement to section 281, para. 8.

† Ibid., para. 57.

This exposition of the attitude which the Russian Jews* have invariably held and still hold toward their Gentile fellow-subjects would be incomplete without a brief statement of the line of conduct which they follow with regard to the jurisdiction of the Gentile courts of justice, and to their own obligations as represented by oaths and promises made to Gentiles.

The first of these points is settled most unequivocally by the following extract from the "Koshen-Hamishpat" (chapter 26, paragraph 1):

"Jews are forbidden to go to law before a Gentile court of justice, or Gentile institutions of any sort. This prohibition does not lose its force even in cases where the Gentile laws coincide with the Hebrew laws, nor even should both sides wish to submit their case to a Gentile court. He who violates this prohibition is a villain. Such an act is considered equal to blasphemy and rebellion against the entire Mosaic law."

The offender, of course, incurs the kherem in all its rigor, and cannot be freed from it until he releases his antagonist from the power of the Gentiles. How consistently this principle is carried out is shown by two very remarkable documents, Nos. 165 and 166. Two Jewish members are to be elected to sit in one of the mixed minor local courts, called "oral courts," because cases of a very trivial nature are examined and decided by them orally, according to "custom" more than written law. Thirty electors have been chosen by a general assembly, and the names of the candidates have been proclaimed. Thereupon, and before the official election by ballot takes places, the candidates are summoned before the beth-din, and there made to engage, under oath, "that, through all the time of their exercising the function of judges in the oral court, they will be guided by the directions and instructions of the beth-din and kahal; also that they will unconditionally obey all their commands with respect to the cases which will be submitted to the court." After this a committee of four persons—two members of the kahal and two of the beth-din—is appointed to make out a code of rules for the guidance of the two judges.

"And all the resolutions signed by the committee shall be by

* To these may safely be added the Jews of the eastern provinces of Prussia and Austria, Galicia, Bukovina, etc., and also Roumania, for in all these countries the state of things is exactly similar.

said judges carried out punctually during a whole year. All this has been done with the common consent, in accordance with the laws and ordinances. At each sitting of the committee one of said two judges must of necessity be present, in order to consult together concerning the cases to be decided in said court."

It naturally follows from these promises that all oaths whatever taken by Jews, or testimony given by them under oath before Gentile courts or magistrates, may or may not be valid. Further opportunities for evading obligations to Christians are offered by the annual religious solemnity called kol-nidreh, the opening act of the great festival of Yom-Kipur, the day of national purification, of absolution and reconciliation with heaven, when all private chapels as well as the synagogues of the various corporations are closed, by special order and under pain of the kherem, so that Israel may pray to the Lord of their fathers jointly in the great synagogue, as one united family. It is the tenth day after the Hebrew New Year's day, its great holiness marked by a severe fast—total abstinence from food during twenty-four hours for all adults, and even children over twelve years old; like the solemnity of New Year's day, it closes with the significant patriotic signal, the blowing of the sacred horns, which is answered by the entire congregation with the traditional ejaculation: "Next year in Jerusalem!" The fast and common prayer begin the night before, two hours before sunet, and are ushered in by the ceremony of kol-nidreh, which we will describe in Brafmann's own words:

"When the men and women, in holiday attire, have taken their separate stations in the synagogue, which is lighted by the wax tapers held by each person, and the leader of the choir (cantor) has taken his place, then the most notable members of the assistance open the ark, reverently take out the thora, while the choir thrice repeat the celebrated kol-nidreh to an ancient traditional chant; the congregation repeat it aloud with them. Judging from the pomp and reverence with which the Jews prepare for this act, an outsider would naturally conclude that it is the very center-piece of the whole yearly cycle of spiritual exercises. But, if he knew the language, he would find that the words pronounced with such awe-inspiring ceremonial, such religious concentration and profound reverence are not words of prayer at all, but an act by which the entire nation renounces all promises, oaths, and obligations given by each of its members in the preceding, and all such as will be given in the coming, year. With this public renunciation of a nation's plighted word, the whole moral base of social life does indeed fall to pieces. It is a fact, so utterly revolting, that the greatest authorities of the Talmudic world itself have risen in protest against it. But not even they could prevail against the force of custom, and the kol-nidreh renunciation maintains its place among the most honored Hebrew rites."

This chapter cannot be more aptly concluded than by another extract from Brafmann's remarks, so pithy and forcible in their simple earnestness:

"To students of law we venture to think that these documents will offer not a little interest; but we especially recommend them in the study of those who are curious to find out the real causes of the universal murmur of reprobation which has always been heard against the Jews from the surrounding world, and of the persecutions to which they have been subjected through eighteen centuries—i.e., ever since the kahal has ruled this unhappy people."

IV.

Was Brafmann right in making these revelations—or, at least, in giving them the publicity of the press? Should not a certain merciful feeling have restrained him from thus exposing the short-comings of those who were still his brethren in blood and race? Should he not have been content to cut himself adrift from the vessel which held them? Scarcely. You cannot let your neighbor's house be broken into because you have friends in the gang, even though you have withdrawn yourself from them when you discovered their evil ways. Yet, Brafmann is emphatically and enthusiastically a Jew. He is deeply, passionately devoted to his brethren, and he possibly—who knows?—might have hesitated and temporized with his duty to his new brethren from tenderness to the old, had it not been his entire conviction that the Jews suffer quite as much under the system whose secret workings he divulges as the Christians themselves. For each power, each right, of the kahal and beth-din is a stick with two ends, of which the one descends on the Christian population and the other impartially belabors the Jewish community,—of course falling heaviest on the poor mass,* trader or artificer can never be sure that his house has not been sold over his head to a Hebrew fellow-citizen, on the other hand, the Jew who has bought a piece of ground or a house, from the Russian government or a Christian owner, is made to pay an additional sum for the same property to the kahal. Thus No. 87 records the sale "to Rabbi Kahaim, son of Rabbi Isaac, Levite," of the right of ownership to a stone building, constructed by him on the market-place of Minsk, and only from the day that this second deed of sale is delivered to him is it said that the building belongs to him and his heirs forever, "from the center of the earth to the summit of the heavens." Further, as a rule, a Jew from one district is not permitted to trade or settle in another, and if he is, by special favor of the kahal, he is made to pay handsomely for the privilege. For it is said of the law:†

"At the present time, when we live under the rule of alien nations, and too great an accumulation of Hebrew population may lead to collision with them, every Jew who comes to a city and wishes to settle in it, is a foe to those who already dwell there. Therefore the local kahal is given the right to close the door before the new-comers, to attain which object it is lawful for it to employ any means whatsoever, even to the power of the goim (the local administration)."

"Even to the power of the goim." That means the local Christian police, which is to the kahal what the secular arm was to the Inquisition. It is literally at its beck and call, owing to the sanction awarded by our laws to the box-duty. This same active sanction also enables it to exercise a most irksome supervision and an intolerable coercion over the private life of every Jewish family. A few instances will best illustrate the practical working of this simple and ingenious machinery.

However miserable a Jewish family, there are two occasions—a wedding and the circumcision of a son—on which a certain amount of festive expenditure is inevitable. Guests are invited, a meal is served, musicians are hired. In none of these points, however, is the giver of the feast allowed to follow his own discretion or inclination, but must submit to a code of regulations, which would be amusing from their absurdity were they not so galling to all feeling of independence and human dignity. Here are a few items: "No one shall dare to serve at circumcision feasts refreshments consisting only of cakes and whiskey." There must be a meal of butcher's meat; if the feast-giver be a poor man, he must have meat for at least ten persons, and only in case of absolute destitution can an exemption be obtained from the kahal. Visitors who come to offer congratulations on the birth of a son or daughter are forbidden, as well as the parents themselves, to taste refreshments in the shape of cakes, preserved fruit. "Before and after a wedding each of the families is allowed to give only one feast." "There must not be more than three musicians at a wedding, and they are not allowed to eat more than three times. To a circumcision may be invited "only relatives to the third degree, the two next-door neighbors on each side of the house and three from across the street, the teacher of the host's children," and a few more persons strictly determined. The invitations are to be sent through the messengers of the beth-din—not otherwise. The feast-giver is entitled to a certain quantity of meat duty-free, which, however, the collectors deliver only on being presented with the list of guests, sanctioned by the kahal and signed by the city-notary. Now, if the kahal had not contrived to secure the active cooperation of the state laws in levying the box-duty, it would not have the means of reminding every Jew, even on such occasions as household festivals, of its dread and restless power. As things stand, its vengeance can fall on the rebel at any moment. To punish disobedience to its slightest regulations or even a temporary ordinance, it has only to summon the police and denounce the culprit as having infringed the laws concerning kosher and box-duty. Who is to rescue the unhappy man from the hands of the authorities, who demand from him the legal fine for that offense? That he never commited it is no safeguard to him, for false accusation, even supported by perjury and recourse to the goim, are among the authorized means to break rebellion. Two documents—Nos. 148 and 149—contain the exposition of the measures to be taken "in order to preserve the Talmudic court (beth-din) from the disrespect which, in punishment for our sins, has of late made itself felt,—to prevent our foes from sitting as judges over us, which heaven forbid!—and to bend audacious apostates and rebels, so that every Jew may be submissive to the Talmudic law and court." The measures contained in No. 149 are much the most terrible, to be used only against hardened rebels, and when the case has been put in the hands of the "secret prosecutor"—a functionary who is elected every month by ballot from among the officers of the beth-din, and who swears the most solemn oath to spare no person in carrying out the instructions of the Talmudic court, and never to reveal that he ever has been invested."* Here are the nine paragraphs (some of them condensed) into which this remarkable document is divided:

* So on one occasion, when the superintendents of the box-duty demanded an addition to their salary, the kahal, instead of granting it from its own exchequer, imposed an additional duty on the sale of meat, and when the collectors in their turn applied the very next day for the same favor, the duty was still further increased—by one groat per pound—to satisfy them. (Nos. 173 & 176.)

† "Koshen-Hamishpat," sec. 156, para. 7.

"1. The rebel is deprived of the offices which he may have held in the kahal or corporations. 2. He is excluded from the community and any corporation meetings. 4. He is excluded from all functions or honors in the synagogue. 5. He is not to be invited to any festival, public or private. He who invites him falls under the kherem. 6. No one is to rent from him his house or his shop, nor to let his own to him. 7. If he is an artisan, it is forbidden to give him work, on pain of the heaviest kherem. 8. If a betrothal contract has been entered into with him, the other party is freed from it, without incurring the fine usually imposed in such cases, and reimbursement of expenses. 9. It is lawful to proclaim in the synagogue that the rebel has eaten tref food or infringed a fast, etc., to confirm the accusation by false testimony, and to have him punished as if he had done this thing."

This document is approved and signed by fourteen members of the kahal and beth-din and by the chief rabbi of the city of Minsk.

Nor are the Christian courts of justice less efficient tools than the local police in the hands of the Jewish rulers. One of the most common proceedings to punish disobedience or disrespect is to sue the offender in a Christian court for debt, real or imaginary. Thus, when a litigation is to be decided by the beth-din, it is customary, in order to secure the submission of the parties to the suit, to make them both sign blank bills before the case is tried. Then, should the losing party be dissatisfied with the decision and refer the case to the Christian court, which is his right under the state laws, the beth-din fills the blank at its pleasure, and directs the nominal holder to present this perfectly legal document for payment through the local authorities. "This," says Brafmann, "accounts for the great number of litigations always on hand in Christian courts. They are generally nothing more than legal fictions used by the beth-din or kahal to compel the obedience of refractory members of their communities." If offenders return to the path of duty within a certain time, the claim is withdrawn. Sometimes the Russian courts receive genuine complaints, but they are usually powerless for redress, and bitterly are the plaintiffs made to rue their audacity. In 1866, a Hebrew widow complained to the mayor and town-council of Vilna that she had been charged fifteen hundred rubles for the burial of her husband, and compelled not only to pay this sum but to sign a declaration that she had done so voluntarily for charitable purposes, the corporation of undertakers having been directed to refuse burial to the body until she had submitted, which she had done at the expiration of five days. It is further seen, from the progress of the case, that the kahal fined her five hundred rubles more, and compelled the police to recover this sum from her by representing it as an arrear on her share of the contribution for ransoming poor and insolvent Jews from military service. The impudence of the pretense was patent, yet the local authorities could do nothing, for the kahal, in all that regards the collection and payment of taxes for the Jewish population, is a state institution.

The meaning of the little phrase, so frequently repeated, that it is lawful to the kahal to compel obedience "by any means whatsoever, even through the power of the goim," will now be sufficiently clear not to need further illustration, though such might be produced to any extent from Brafmann's book, to which indeed full justice could be done by translating it.

Brafmann is, we repeat, a Jewish patriot in the fullest and widest sense. He admires his race, he takes pride in belonging to it, and loves his people with a passionate pity and tenderness which makes his voice break and his eyes fill when he speaks of their sufferings and moral degradation under the oppressive system which holds them in iron bands. His dreams are of their regeneration, of their future power and greatness—not as a political nation, but as a highly gifted race, living on equal terms among other races, all artifical barriers being removed, and the field opened without let or hindrance of any kind to the free development of the many noble faculties of mind and soul so characteristic of what Renan calls "the admirable minority of Israel." If, therefore, he incurred by his revelations the utmost wrath of the rulers whom he exposed, and of the ignorantly fanatical mass, to such a degree that his life at one time was not considered safe even in St. Petersburg, where he dwelt after his book appeared; on the other hand, he is comforted and secretly supported by the sympathy of many of the more enlightened Jews who, like him, sigh for release from a bondage worse than foreign captivity. But for such support he could not have obtained possession of the precious pile of papers which were abstracted for him, not without danger, by a friend from the Jewish archive of Minsk.

The above exposition of a state of things which might be pronounced wildly unreal but for the irrefragable documentary evidence adduced, though far from exhausting the material collected by Brafmann,* will, it is to be hoped, have clearly established one fact; that, whatever historical causes may underlie the oft-recurring popular outbreaks against the Jews, race animosity, and religious intolerance have never been alone at work, and, in our days, are no longer so at all. The only case of systematic persecution of them from fanatical motives is that of the Spanish Inquisition, though the motives were far from unmixed, even there. At all events, if the fathers of St. Dominic and their secular supporters did not object to enriching themselves with the spoils of the wealthy Jews they burned, we must do them justice to acknowledge that they burned the poor ones quite as piously and scrupulously. In all other instances "Jewish riots" begin spontaneously; something—sometimes a mere trifle—happens to infuriate the mob, and they begin to kill and plunder. The massacres spread, rage for a few days, then stop, and everything goes the old round again—for a while. Ignorant fanaticism is only an accessory—true, a terrible one—which comes into play with the greater violence the further the occurrence is removed from us, in the "dark ages." But a significant feature is that the notorious usurers are always the first to suffer, and the bills and securities which hold whole provinces in bondage are the first property sought after and destroyed. This was the case even in the more than usually severe outbreak at the beginning of Richard I.'s reign, which ended in the horrible catastrophe of York, and the monkish chronicler who records it in terms of unseemly exultation amid much revolting fanatical twaddle drops a word which strangely reminds us of the burden of popular complaint which recurred all through the riots of last spring. He calls the Jews "blood-suckers."* Another curious coincidence is that then, in England, as nine hundred years later in Russia, "the rumor was spread that the King had issued orders to massacre the Jews."† The facility with which the ignorant mases lend their ears to such absurdities betrays, at all events, a latent though monstrously distorted consciousness of having received at the hands of the race such wrongs and injuries as claim redress from their natural protector, the governing power. The difference between then and now, apart from the comparatively mild form of the recent paroxysms consequent on the general softening of men's natures, is chiefly this: then, religious feeling was actively mixed up with economical grievances and hideous reprisals, while now it is totally absent. And never could this mediaeval specter be dragged forth in the light of our sober, unfanatical age, to account for phenomena of which the real causes must be obvious to every unbiased observer, were it not that by far the greater part of the so-called "liberal press" in Europe is in the hands of the Hebrew editors and Hebrew writers—many of them men of great culture and talent, of great and well-merited authority in the world of letters and science, but whom it suits, from mistaken national zeal, to shed a false light on certain events and sides of modern life, to blind the eyes of superficial and docile readers with the dust of those cheap and plausible phrases of which the shallow orators of 1789-93 have left us so ample a store, and which can be as easily shuffled to prove anything or nothing as the cards whose combinations furnished forth the effective and patriotic speeches of Pieborgne, the lawyer-minister in Laboulaye's Prince Caniche. It is time to drop the sentimental liberal slang, through whose loose, wide meshes the biggest humbug can slip unchallenged. When a question of vital import is presented to us, the thing to do is to drive it into a corner and grapple with it, not muffle it up in commonplaces long ago worn threadbare. The Jewish question, in Eastern Europe and Western Russia, is such a question: let us then, for once, look it square in the face. The Jews are disliked, nay, hated in those parts, not because they believe and pray differently, but because they are a parasitical race who, producing nothing, fasten on the produce of land and labor, and live on it, choking the breath of life out of commerce and industry as sure as the creeper throttles the tree that upholds it. They are despised, not because they are of different blood, because they dress differently, eat peculiar food; not even because herding together in unutterable filth and squalor, they are a loathsome and really dangerous element—a standing institution for the propagation of all kinds of horrible diseases and contagions; but because their ways are crooked, their manner abject,—because they will not stand up for themselves and manfully resent an insult or oppose vexation, but will take any amount of it if they can thereby turn a penny, will smirk and cringe, and go off with a deadly grudge at heart, which they will vent cruelly, ruthlessly, but in an underhanded manner, and not always on the offender, but on any or all belonging to the offender's race. It is an essentially oriental feature, this making light of servile forms, so the feeling of pride be secretly treasured and revenge taken at some time and in some way—a feature which our Jews could not have retained so unimpaired had they not always been forcibly kept aloof, by their own rulers, from the ennobling influence of that compound of Grecian refinement and Teutonic manliness which we call modern culture, and which instills more than it teaches that the forms of servitude are as degrading as the fact. The readiness with which they appeal to foreign sympathy and interference, and which in any set of people holding the position of citizens would be looked upon and punished as state treason of the worst kind, is but another phase of their oriental nature—the inability to grasp the first principles of state-life, or perhaps rather their determination not to acknowledge themselves as belonging to any Gentile state. They are not "persecuted." Only, from time to time, the popular patience—that dike built up of ignorance, apathy, and habitual endurance—breaks; then there is an outpouring of angry waters. True, some things have become impossible. No invading conqueror, for instance, would dream nowadays of farming to the Jews the churches of a conquered people, as did the Poles when they held Galicia in the sixteenth century and later, thus authorizing them to tax the people arbitrarily for having divine service performed in their own temples. No govenment would now lend itself to such iniquity. Still we have just seen that, even without such open support, enough can be achieved to exasperate the most long-suffering people and goad them into momentary frenzy.

* Thus, no mention has been made of the so-called "candle-money," nor of the extraordinary contributions, mostly in the shape of a percentage on capital, personal property and wares, levied by the kahal arbitrarily on special occasions, to avert some danger threatening the entire community. Such an occasion occurred in 1802, when the poet Derjavin, a staunch Russian patriot, was in the ministry, and strove to carry through a law forbidding the Jews to keep taverns and public-houses in the villages. There was a great panic among them; the kahals raised one million rubles for bribes and presents at headquarters, ordered public prayers and days of fasting. Derjavin was offered one, even two hundred thousand rubles, to withdraw the project. He told the Emperor (Alexander I.), and did not take the money; but others did, and the Jews won the day. Russian writers have celebrated the event as a triumph of humane and liberal policy, and it has been rather the fashion to abuse Derjavin as a narrow-minded retrograde.

The question naturally arises, What is to be done? It is a momentous one, and might partly be answered by showing what ought not to be done—i.e., by a review of the legislative measures, hostile or propitiating, which have been tried in different countries and at various times, and have utterly failed, as well as of the causes why they failed. Brafmann's Kahal and his other book, Hebrew Corporations, Local and Universal, contain valuable material toward working out the problem; but is it not at the end of an already long paper that his feature of the subject can be considered—a paper, too, of which the special object is only to vindicate the age in which we live from the odious imputation of "intolerance and religious persecution," unthinkingly and indiscriminately brought against it. Yet the impression conveyed would be incomplete, nay, the entire tenor and drift of the paper might be misconstrued, without at least a hint at the solution which is desired and openly advocated by all enlightened Russians as represented by our liberal press. Briefly stated, it reads as follows: The legal emancipation of the Jews, begun years ago by granting them the right of buying and holding land, of entering the universities, and various smaller concessions, must be completed. They must share both the rights and the duties of their Christian and Mohammedan fellow-subjects, without restraints or privileges. As the first step toward such a consummation, the kahal must necessarily be abolished, or at all events shorn of its power—a thing very easily achieved by simply depriving it of the right of levying box-duty on the slaughtering and sale of kosher meat, and forbidding the sale of tref to Christians. This would at once release the Jewish population from an intolerable pressure by delivering them from an irksome duty, and by depriving the town-councils of the means of enforcing their arbitrary separatistical ordinances by recourse to "the power of the goim." The taxes would then be collected from the Jews directly by Government officials, in the same manner as they are from all other subjects; they would be brought under the census, which they have always been able to elude until now,—and all this would place them in direct and normal relation to the rulers of the land, without in the least interfering with the full exercise of their religious worship and national customs. Left to themselves and freed from all restraint with regard to their place of residence, the process of assimilation would soon begin, and the number of Jews who discard the Talmud and keep to simple Mosaic law in its wider and more liberal application would annually increase. But if the Government, at this critical moment, recoils from this radical change, and contents itself with half-measures, denying its Hebrew subjects their full share of civil rights and at the same time upholding the artificial separatism so baleful in its effects, the same state of things will be still further perpetuated,—consequently, the causes being unchanged, the effects will be identical, and the same deplorable scenes will be enacted from time to time,—scenes which every other European country has witnessed, and would see now, had not a wiser legislation made their recurrence impossible.

The work by Jacob Brafmann, from which Mme. Ragosin quotes in her article, has never to our knowledge been translated into English. It was published in Russian in 1870, but the only complete translation of which we know is the work of Dr. Siegfried Passarge, Das Buch vom Kahal, Leipzig, Hammer-Verlag, 2 vols., 1928. Since copies of this highly important work are extremely rare (guess why!), we reproduce the title page below.

Brafmann's work is little known, even to diligent students of the Jewish problem. His original appears to have had a modest circulation in Russia until the Jews subverted and captured that nation in 1917-1918 and could smash the skulls of wicked persons who had read it. A small excerpt was paraphrased in German in 1881, but was promptly howled down by the Yids and Germans in the press and universities who could be hired as shabbat goyim. As is well known, the Jews exerted a great and often preponderant power over the German government after the accession of Wilhelm II in 1888, and greatly augmented it after they procured the dismissal of Bismarck in 1890, a necessary preliminary for the First World War. It is significant that the alien invaders were able to thwart publication of a German translation until 1928. (See Passarge's Vorwort, Vol. I, pp. V-VII, and on the Jews' twists and lies in an effort to discredit the revelations of the courageous Jewish author, see Passarge's introductory study, pp. XI-LV.)

what was inherent in Christianity in its origins as they are described in the tales of the "New Testament," in which a Jesus exalts bird-brains that "take no thought for the morrow," boasts that he will "make folly of the wisdom of this world," and declares that rich men have no more chance of escaping eternal torment than a camel has of walking through the eye of a needle. The Jewish agitator, who recruited his apostles from the dregs of the populace, promised his followers post-mortem bliss in a Heaven that would be filled with swarms of squalid proletarians, who could exult forever over the sufferings of their betters and thus salve with triumphant malice their consciousness of their own inferiority. And the prevalent Christianity of today, which espouses the "social gospel" of Marx, who merely dispensed with spooks in his version of the Jewish attack on civilization, is by its very nature hostile to a high culture, hostile to learning and science (although it may use technology for its own assault on the civilization that made technology possible), and hostile to the stability of a society that is necessarily based on private property, hating the wealth that gives leisure for culture, although it has no objection to rich gutter-snipes and even admires Teddy Kennedy for his cleverness in disposing of a redundant female by having her slowly suffocate in an immersed automobile. Or, if it does not really admire that boyish prank, disregards it in its enthusiasm for the "idealist" who wants to impose "social justice" on South Africa by turning the savages loose on the White population.

A materialist, observing the scientifically ascertained facts of biology, will tell you that it is suicidal for a nation to nurture offspring that are physically or mentally deformed, to coddle criminals, and to subsidize its domestic enemies. And it is a nice irony that the editor, who deplores "the supremacy of science," becomes himself a strict materialist when he justifies the execution of criminals by remarking that the South has a much lower rate of recidivism than the rest of the country: "We have found that 0% of our executed murderers kill again."

A THEORY ABOUT RUDOLF HESS

A well-known writer who wishes to be anonymous has suggested a possible explanation of the mystery surrounding the victim of Anglo-American cruelty now imprisoned, at enormous expense and with preposterous precautions to prevent escape, in Spandau. Having read my article in the April issue of Liberty Bell and accepted the findings of Dr. Thomas that the prisoner is not Rudolf Hess, the writer has sketched the following hypothesis.

The British Secret Service, which is known to have been in contact with the infamous Admiral Canaris in Germany, elaborated with him in an ingenious plot to make the Jews victorious in 1941, when a year and a half of warfare had proved that the united power of Britain and France could not save them from defeat in the war they had forced on Germany. The plot called for two principal operations. In the first, Hess was to be assassinated while on one of the solo flights he made from time to time for recreation, and replaced by a 'double,' the prisoner now in Spandau, precisely as happened according to Dr. Thomas. At the same time, Hitler was to be murdered, perhaps by the method used by German traitors when they, in collaboration with Canaris, almost succeeded in killing him in July 1944 and failed by the merest chance. At the death of Hitler, Hess would have automatically become the Führer of the German Reich, and the pseudo-Hess in Scotland would promptly have negotiated a peace that would have saved the Jews' stooges from catastrophic defeat. The British might even have been able to salvage the Empire they were destroying to please their alien masters.

It was the second and crucial part of this plot that failed. The attempted assassination in 1944 failed because Hitler just happened to have moved far enough from the planted bomb to escape death when it exploded. An earlier plot in 1941 may have failed just because the bomb failed to explode and Hitler was saved, just as the British Parliament was saved in 1948 when the bomb planted by the Jews failed to explode. After that failure, caused by some chance malfunctioning of the apparatus that was to detonate the bomb at the right moment, the Jews decided not to make a second attempt, and their plot would have remained unknown, had it not been described by the Jewish murderer, in his Memoirs of an Assassin (London, Blond, 1959; New York, Pyramid, 1960). The secret of the failure in Germany in 1941was better kept. We probably should never have known of the attempt on Hitler's life in 1944, if the bomb had failed to explode and Colonel von Stauffenberg had carried away his unopened briefcase at the end of the conference.

Since Hitler was not assassinated in 1941, the presence in Britain of the man who impersonated Hess was only an embarrassment to the British Secret Service and improvised efforts to cover-up the whole operation account for the unexplained fumbling and bumbling that followed.

All this, of course, is sheer hypothesis, speculation with not even a scintilla of circumstantial evidence to support it. A minute examination of the records of Hitler's movements on 10 May 1941 and two or three days thereafter, and particular scrutiny of the lists of persons who were admitted to his presence, might disclose circumstances in which such an aborted attempt to assassinate him could have been made, but, as the author of the hypothesis carefully points out, there could be no evidence that such an attempt was actually made. The only confirmation of his hypothesis now possible would be a confession by the prisoner in Spandau, who must have known that such a murder was planned, although it is unlikely that he was told how it would be carried out.

I repeat with emphasis—because the distinction is one that escapes many "right-wingers"—that the foregoing is merely an hypothesis that has not been, and cannot be, tested in any way. The man who suggested it, however, is right about one thing. The chances are that if our race escapes obliteration by the Jews, Prisoner No. 7 in Spandau will become, like the Man in the Iron Mask, the subject of innumerable efforts to solve an historical mystery of which the secret has been lost forever.*

* Most historians today favor the candidacy of either an obscure Italian, Count Mattioli, or an even more obscure servant, Eustache Dauger, for the dubious honor of having been the object of Louis XIV's implacable vengeance. What they cannot explain is why either of these individuals should have been thought worthy of the elaborate precautions taken to conceal the prisoner's identity and particularly the mask of black velvet that concealed his features, which must have been so well known that he would have been recognized by influential Frenchmen, had he been seen without it. As a point of methodological interest, it may be noted that Voltaire's sensational theory (the prisoner was an illegitimate son of Louis XIV) has never been disproven, because you cannot demonstrate the falsity of an hypothesis without either proving that it presupposes some event or condition that was physically impossible or providing an explanation that is indubitably correct. A hypothetical explanation of a mystery cannot be proved wrong by a lack of evidence to confirm it. That is sad, and makes many an historian gnash his teeth, but it is unfortunately true. For every mystery, there is a multiplicity of hypothetical solutions, and all we can do is weigh probabilities, but there are some historical mysteries, such as that of the "Iron" Mask, for which the circumstantial evidence is so exigous or confused that no hypothesis is sufficiently probable to be weighed. Historians of the future (if there are any) will at least have in Dr. Thomas's book evidence that will have a tantalizingly high degree of probability, whatever happens, and if the prisoner is not examined by disinterested physicians of indubitable probity, will accept it as virtual certainty. That, however, will not prevent ingenious individuals from formulating alternative hypotheses more congenial to their own predilections (e.g., Hess was a traitor who took refuge in Britain to escape exposure, or Hitler was assassinated and replaced by a 'double' who disavowed Hess's secret negotiations so that he could contrive the eventual defeat of Germany; et cetera ad infinitum.)

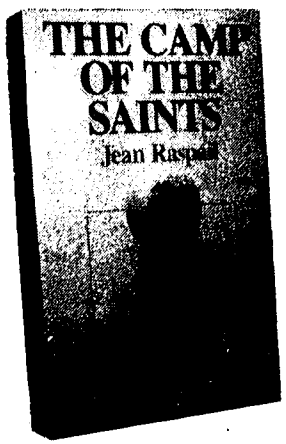
Does the West have the will to survive?



That is the obvious question posed by Jean Raspail's terrifying novel of the swamping of the White world by an unlimited flood of non-White "refugees." But there is also a less obvious and even more fundamental question: Must Whites find their way to a new morality and a new spirituality in order to face the moral challenges of the present and overcome them? THE CAMP OF THE SAINTS is the most frightening book you will ever read. It is frightening because it it is utterly believable. The armada of refugee ships in Raspail's story is exactly like the one that dumped 150,000 Cubans from Fidel Castro's prisons and insane asylums on our shores in 1980 — except this time the armada is from India, with more than 70 times as large a population. And it is only the first armada of many. If any book will awaken White Americans to the danger they face from uncontrolled immigration it is THE CAMP OF THE SAINTS. For your copy send $7.00 (which includes $1.00 for shipping) to: LIBERTY BELL PUBLICATIONS, Box 21, Reedy, WV 25270 USA Ord.# 3014

Dear Mr Dietz: 11 March 1985

I must say I was very impressed with your March issue of the "Liberty Bell." "The Case Against the Holocaust" and "Monetary Policy" by Dr. Weber contain some of the most useful, concise, common sense, general purpose, 'pass-it-around' type material I have seen in a single book form. I fully intend to see my March issue get some good mileage. In addition, and of a more immediate interest was your accompanying page on the Samisdat trial in Canada. I noticed both in the Liberty Bell on p. 17 and in the excerpt several instances where Mr. Zuendel considered his group as having outmaneuvered the Zionists. I could not help but remember, along similar lines, a few pages from Dr. Oliver's fine book, "Americ's Decline", where Dr. Oliver wrote about first joining the John Birch Society (pp. 153-163). In these pages Dr. Oliver directed his writing to a little book entitled "The Politician," among other things. "The Politician," it appears, was a book exposing "Ike" Eisenhower as something other than a national hero. rather as a genuine FDR stooge and other assorted repulsive characters, written by Robert Welch, founder of the John Birch Society. This book, it seems, never made it to press when it should have. According to "America's Decline," Dr. Oliver felt since the "enemy" had gotten a hold of "The Politician" anyway, and were causing a general stir about how in this terrible little book someone had called Ike a "commie" (providing tremendous, nation-wide interest), why not use an underground type press, mass produce the book, get it out quickly, let everyone read and see what happens, maybe people will wake up!!! To quote Dr. Oliver, "the Enemy had provided us with a strategic opportunity that we could never have obtained for ourselves. Great generals owe victory to the enemy's blunders more often than to their own most subtle manoeuvres." To sum it up, Dr.Oliver's idea was not used and the chance was lost.

Perhaps it goes without saying, however I feel most passionately that the parallel between "The Politician" that didn't and the "Samisdat" that did is this: the opposing side has strategically blundered. If perhaps you follow a similar line of thought, the opposing team has fumbled the ball. Now it's our turn for a chance to make up a lot of lost ground. We can roll over and die, or we can clutch our new found opportunity and run like hell. As I've noticed on the inside cover of your back page it reads, "Our fight is your fight," this, of course, also applies to the Samisdat trial. I certainly hope that all your readers feel similarly in regards to Mr. Zuendel's plight.

Respectfully yours,
V.G., Michigan

Dear George: 4 March 1985

I am writing to you on a matter I regard as being of the utmost importance in our presentations to the unenlightened and a problem which is continually cropping up which does us much harm.

I began to read the unsigned article "The Case Against the Holocaust" in the March issue of Liberty Bell and was filled with a growing delight, admiration and enthusiasm for its clear, calm, lucid persuasiveness. This, I thought, is something we have needed for a long time. It cannot be dismissed as a mere polemic or sophistry. And then, all of a sudden the author got carried away and made a statement that is simply not true and is known to be untrue except among the absolutely ignorant. Please understand, I am wholly in sympathy with the motives which forced Germany to seek a military solution to the intransigence of the Poles over the matter of the Corridor and Danzig, and the justice of the German case for revision of the imposed Diktat of Versailles and subsequent Polish unilateral aggression. But the fact is that (unless we take seriously the obvious propaganda ploy of an initial Polish attack) Germany began the shooting. I think she was justified. But when the author says "the very war itself was started to prevent German Danzig from joining the Reich as its German majority desired to do," the truth of the last seven words is mixed with the untruth of the earlier ones. It was started by German action to recover her rightful territory when all offers of reasonable compromise had been rejected by a Poland wickedly encouraged by British and French backing and, at second hand, by Roosevelt's mischievous war-mongering lust. The author's momentary lapse from absolute correctness here opens the door to the devastating accusation that the article is thoroughly untrustworthy and just "neo-Nazi propaganda unworthy of serious consideration." And that is a terrible loss in view of the splendid and, I believe, absolutely true (with one trivial exception) rest of the article. The "trivial exception" is the author's claim that no revisionist historians are National Socialists or Fascists. Wrong. Some of us are. In at least one case the person graduated from Fascism to National Socialism as his philosophical growth developed.

One last, unrelated matter. Someone at Reedy has a distaste for the word "rhetorical." Even with St. Paddy's Day so close this is not really acceptable.

But before the whole value of that excellent article is nullified, do get the author to do a minor rewrite on the lines I have urged.

Best
Dr. Peter H. Peel

Dear Mr. Dietz: 5 March 1985

Just a note to say I am glad to know you are alive and well in West Virginia.

On the "Ray Briem" program on WABC (77) "Talk Radio," on Thursday, March 14, 5:20-5:30 AM, a male caller spent well over a minute supplying "information" on your Computer Bulletin Board System, including the fact that there is no charge of $5.00 anymore. If at all possible, get a hold of the tape and listen to it carefully. I'd love to know if others heard this caller.

Respectfully yours,

Dear George 7 March 1985

Thanks for the speedy delivery of my book order. I must say that Liberty Bell is one of the more quickly responding booksellers in the racialist movement.

I've enclosed a news clipping concerning one of our local liberal-lush churchmen, none other than the archbishop of the Minneapolis-St.Paul archdiocese! This particular individual supports the usual liberal-left "issues," and he cooperates closely with the local ADL. I've included the address and phone number of the archdiocese as a service to your readers: Archbishop John Roach, Archdiocese of St.Paul-Minneapolis, 226 Summit Av., St Paul MN 55102.

Best regards

Dear Liberty Bell: 19 March 1985

Thank you for the prompt delivery of my last order and the complimentary copy of "Liberty Bell." I was going to get "America's Decline" but decided to get a subscription instead. I truly love Professor Oliver's writing—what a keen and beautiful mind! I'll be ordering his other book soon.

I really enjoyed Ralph Perier's "Jews Love Christianity"—it was hilarious in parts.

Thanks again!
Mrs. C.E., Idaho

Hello, friends: 21 March 1985

Hope this finds you in good health. Congratulations on another excellent issue of "Liberty Bell;" the March issue was a total plus! I do appreciate your including my article "Awakening;" hope to contribute again soon. Dr. Weber's article in reply to "U.S. News" was good to see; I, too, wrote them a critical assessment, asking a couple of questions as to the validity of statements made in the article; the reply (from a bleeding Jew, no doubt) would have really touched your heart, Mr. Dietz!. . .

Thank you so much, and my best to you and the Mrs., from Texas!

Sincerely,
R.G., Texas

Dear Mr. Dietz: 24 March 1985

Enclosed you will find my check for my subscription renewal.

In the January 85 edition appeared a commentary about the book "The Anti-Humans" (which I know), and a footnote (page XIX) cites a book titled "Destroy the Accuser," by Frederick Seelig. According to the quotation, it must be extremely interesting. I guess it could be worthy to be translated into German. For that purpose I should get a copy of it, it might be a photostatic copy...

I actually planned to write some more about the Ben Klassen-Ronald Hand controversy, but lack of time does not permit me to. The outrageous letter of Ben Klassen displeased me. He shows that he knows quite little of this world. The answer by Hand had a much higher level.

Well, good luck; sincerely
E.S., Argentina

Dear Mr. Dietz 25 March 1985

I am just writing to you to let you know of our station and our efforts on behalf of our beleagured race. We are an independent volunteer organization dedicated to bringing the truth about race and about Jewish media control to as many Americans as possible. We maintain a studio in Providence, Rhode Island, and a transmitter in the Baltimore, Maryland area. We transmit on various shortwave frequencies and have received over 200 letters so far from all over North America from people who have received our signals. Altough we are not connected with any other group, we DO mention other worthwhile publications and efforts on the air. We have announced information about Liberty Bell, Instauration, and National Vanguard on several of our broadcasts.

Naturally, any station that would tell the truth on the subjects in minority-dominated America would never be licensed by the system, so our operation is of necessity a clandestine one. We transmit, as closely as is safely possible, according to the following schedule:

(ON THE FIRST OR THIRD WEEKENDS OF EACH MONTH)

Saturday: 2 to 3 PM on 7410 khz; 4 to 5 PM on 6240 khz; 80 to 9 PM on 6240 khz. Sunday: 12:30 to 1:30 AM on 7410 khz; 10 to 11 AM on 15040 khz.

Our transmitter is relatively low-powered (2000 watts) but the use of these carefully selected shortwave frequencies gives us good coverage of Eastern North America and often beyond.

We are currently in need of good-quality recorded speeches or other appropriate program material for use on our broadcasts. We can accept records, cassettes, or reel-to-reel tapes. If you know of any such items being available, please let us know or put us in touch with the right people.

If you would like to mention us in your magazine, please feel free to do so! I have enclosed one of our station QSL cards, as a souvernir.

P.C., Michigan

Dear George: 28 March 1985

In reference to "Get America up in Arms" in your March 85 issue: What downright stupid article. Precisely the type of thinking that makes the National Rifle Association so laughable.

Whatever qualities the U.S. population of 1775 had, it does no longer have. These qualities have gone, left, are no more.

America has become a 3½ million square mile pigsty. The reason we are not all mongrels yet is that most negroes do not have 40 dollars in cash, the sum for which most white fathers would sell their daughters for.

The Russian military budget should be the easiest thing to figure out: 60 dollars in cash for each man, woman, and child, and the whole caboodle is theirs. In 1985, an armed American population is a threat to nobody but themselves.

THE "HOLOCAUST" – FACT OR FICTION?

Were six million Jews really gassed–or has a colossal hoax been perpetrated on the world?

Professor Arthur Butz has carefully investigated the alleged extermination of 6,000,000 Jews during World War II and has written a book which thoroughly documents his startling findings. His book strips away the cover of fraud and deceit from this emotion-charged topic and lays bare the full and complete truth.

SOME QUOTABLE QUOTES FROM AMERICA'S DECLINE

On the 18th Amendment (Prohibition): "Very few Americans were sufficiently sane to perceive that they had repudiated the American conception of government and had replaced it with the legal principle of the 'dictatorship of the proletariat,' which was the theoretical justification of the Jews' revolution in Russia."

On Race: "We must further understand that all races naturally regard themselves as superior to all others. We think Congoids unintelligent, but they feel only contempt for a race so stupid or craven that it fawns on them, gives them votes, lavishly subsidizes them with its own earnings, and even oppresses its own people to curry their favor. We are a race as are the others. If we attribute to ourselves a superiority, intellectual, moral, or other, in terms of our own standards, we are simply indulging in a tautology. The only objective criterion of superiority, among human races as among all other species, is biological: the strong survive, the weak perish. The superior race of mankind today is the one that will emerge victorious—whether by its technology or its fecundity—from the proximate struggle for life on an overcrowded planet."

FREEDOM OF SPEECH—FREEDOM OF THOUGHT
FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION

The editor-publisher of Liberty Bell does not necessarily agree with each and every article in this magazine, nor does he subscribe to all conclusions arrived at by various writers; however, he does endeavor to permit the exposure of ideas suppressed by the controlled news media of this country.

It is, therefore, in the best tradition of America and of free men everywhere that Liberty Bell strives to give free reign to ideas, for ultimately it is ideas which rule the world and determine both the content and structure of culture.

We believe that we can and will change our society for the better. We declare our long-held view that no institution or government created by men, for men, is inviolable, incorruptible, and not subject to evolution, change or replacement by the will of the people.

To this we dedicate our lives and our work. No effort will be spared and no idea will be allowed to go unexpressed if we think it will benefit the Thinking People, not only of America, but the entire world.

REALPOLITIK 1985

— The lessons of Bitburg —

"Instead of reawakening the memories and the passions of the time . . . we should observe this day as the day when, 40 years ago, peace began. . ."

President Ronald Reagan

NEVER FORGIVE!

NEVER FORGET!

Jewish World Leaders

Dear Members and Supporters:

The two statements above, one made by President Ronald Reagan at a March 21st, 1985, news conference, the other one heard so frequently (in various forms) from the mouths and pens of Jewish leaders in conjunction with the President's visit and wreath-laying at the German soldiers' cemetery at Bitburg, present two totally different and opposing moral and ethical philosophies. Regrettably, in the current American political establishment, and among its academic intelligentsia, there is almost no man or woman who points at this unbridgable chasm, and explains its tremendous significance to the uninitiated masses of the American people.

Instead, we have Judaeo-Christian ministers, such as Jerry Falwell, Pat Robertson, Billy Graham, and thousands of others, who speak with forked tongues, and proclaim humanistic and materialistic values as our own, contrary to the real religious and ethical teachings of our heritage, our ancestry, and the Western European culture that was the basis for the foundations of these United States.

Until this battle of the ages is clearly recognized by everyone, and until the leadership of the West consists of people who are willing to fight for our ancient and sacred values, there will be no real peace and no salvation.

There is no need to delve very much into the background of the Bitburg story. It suffices to state that rarely has an event occupied the minds of both the American and German people as much as this originally simple laying of a wreath at an "Ehrenfriedhof" in the Eifel mountains.

Needless to say, the whole "hype" was artificially created by the masters of the American news media, and—thankfully—by now there is hardly an American or German who doesn't understand that. The underlying reason for the incredible media campaign was (is!) probably the steadily weakening position of the Jews in the Western world, and, possibly, their realization that the Holocaust myth is coming under ever-increasing scrutiny. In other words, it is possible that the Bitburg hullabaloo was a last desperate attempt to stem the tide.

I feel I must point out that last year's "40th anniversary" D-Day celebration in the Normandy, to which only former Allies but not the now allied West Germans had been invited, must have had much greater repercussions inside Germany than is generally acknowledged.

At any rate, the West German government felt sufficiently alarmed by the negative fall-out of the D-Day slight to take counteractions, and this led to the suggestion of the Reagan visit to the Bitburg soldiers' cemetery.

Few Americans realize that at this time in history there exists no German "Tomb of the Unknown Soldier." According to law, Berlin is still the capital of the Reich, and, hence, of all Germany. Small Bonn, that former residence of a minor princeling, is only the provisional capital of a temporary state. Certainly, the rulers in Bonn could build a Tomb of the Unknown Soldier at or near Bonn, but that would merely reinforce that far-too-prevalent feeling (especially among young Germans) that the division of Germany is permanent. And this again few German politicians can afford. THAT is the reason why a soldiers' cemetery had been chosen.

And then there is the matter of German honor. When WW 2 was over, the Allies tried their utmost to dishonor ALL German soldiers of that war, except the numerically few (albeit still important!) traitors. You, my perceptive friends, know how that was done, and you know also welch Geistes Kind was behind it. There is also no doubt that both the brainwashing (the "guilt feeling that has been imposed upon them," according to President Reagan), and the recent anti-German and anti-Waffen-SS propaganda campaign had something to do with it. But, unfortunately for some of the non-Germanics, they themselves have no concept of honor as the Germans know it, and they never realized that it is not something you can take away (or propagandize away) from an ex-soldier who has it.

Permit me to get personal: When the war was over, I knew we had been totally beaten. There were no illusions as to our future. Knowing the kind of enemies we had fought (and many Germans had seen in action after 1918!), we also had an inkling of what to expect, both in physical suffering as well as in the matter of "re-education." But, at no time did I ever feel that, due to the loss of the war, my former enemies could impugn my honor. And I still feel like that today. I was a German soldier. I did my duty for my country. I was wounded twice (three times, if one can count severe frostbite acquired in closest proximity to the enemy, that led to hospitalization). I did nothing that I ever had to be ashamed of, and I never saw anything that would make me feel ashamed for my, mostly dead, comrades. We fought, we lost. Our honor—and that of millions of other German soldiers—remained untarnished.

The German word for slanderer is "Ehrabschneider," i.e., someone who "cuts one's honor." I think it is very appropriate and precisely fits all those of the media and in politics who defame the fallen at Bitburg.

This is the first time since the end of the war that I even think of this subject matter. Hitherto, that was between myself and my dead comrades. But Bitburg has changed all that. What the anti-Germans really did with their attacks against President Reagan's visit at the Bitburg Ehrenfriedhof was attack the honor of dead German soldiers, and that few people in all of Germany could accept. You can insult a German (when he is helpless), you can take away his material possessions, you can tell tall tales (people like myself always consider the source!), but never attack the honor of Germany's fallen! THIS IS WHAT BITBURG WAS ALL ABOUT!

Many times before I have written that world politics has (recently) entered a new era. In this new epoch of confrontation and—possibly—conflagration, it is essential that the Western remainder of the former Reich does not fall into Communist/Soviet hands. If it does, the whole of Europe will be lost, and without Europe, these United States could not hold out for long!

We ought to be grateful that President Reagan seems to have recognized these facts so clearly. There is also no doubt that in his final decision to go to Bitburg the President was ably assisted by former President Nixon. I hope many of you saw the ABC 20/20 program in early May, when R. M. Nixon quite eloquently described the importance of West Germany to the U.S.

In the United States it is not generally understood that Germany and the Germans are not automatically a part of the West, as the term is understood here. Germany has always considered itself as Das Reich der Mitte and has had close relations with both Western and Eastern Europe. As a matter of fact, while Spain, Portugal, France, and England moved westward, across the oceans, Germany energetically opened up the East, founding cities such as Riga, Dorpat, and Hermannstadt, and settlements in the Balkans, on the Volga river, and near the Black Sea, to name but a few. Therefore, we must understand that there exists a not insignificant group of people in either part of the divided Reich who would much rather make a deal with the Russians (whom they understand better), than with the fickle North Americans. I myself have long held the opinion that the Soviet Union might well be able to swallow West Germany through military means, but that it could NEVER digest the whole of Germany, which it would then have within its sphere of influence. I am convinced that Der deutsche Geist is stronger, and this is not meant as a negative reflection on the Russian people, against whom I have no animosity.

At any rate, if President Reagan had not gone to Bitburg due to Jewish pressure once the visit had been announced, it would have had catastrophic consequences for German-American relations. The fact that both American and some (brainwashed) German media people belittled the significance of the matter merely proves how far removed from reality they really are. In this context it must be understood that most West Germans really take "democracy" seriously, as can be seen from their high participation in elections. Few Germans know that "democracy" is really a plutocratic (based on money) sham. Just think: Many Germans actually believed that the majority of the American Senators and Representatives who voted against Reagan's visit to Bitburg really expressed the will of the voters in their district! They didn't know that almost all these people have been bought and paid for by the Israeli Lobby and know where their loyalties lie. And, unfortunately, the controlled German press certainly made no attempt to enlighten their readers. (There was an exception: the popular German weekly magazine Quick used the Bitburg opportunity to publish a major article under the title Die Macht der Juden ("The Power of the Jews") and described rather accurately and fairly the inordinate power and influence of the Jews in the United States. Not surprisingly, Quick was immediately attacked by major Jewish leaders as being "anti-Semitic", but no specific denial of the stated facts was forthcoming. No doubt, the Quick article will make waves far into the future; the gullibility of the Germans will never be the same again.)

When the Bitburg Story broke, and before it became the tremendous media-hype of succeeding weeks, we at GANPAC immediately realized the importance of the matter and mobilized support for the President's trip to the war cemetery. We can point with pride to the fact that on this occasion, for the first time since WW I (!), numerous and diverse German-American organisations across the nation cooperated for the common good. The following pages will prove some of the efforts. GANPAC sent many more telegrams than are shown [but omitted here for space reasons —L.B. Editor] here, with the intent to supply influential people with essential information. We believe it helped. Out of all this will grow much closer cooperation in matters of mutual concern between many of the German-American and other European-American organizations that are not beholden to the privileged minority...

What are the lessons of Biturg? (The answers to this question are not necessarily in the order of importance!):

1. The American people still have a very healthy instinct for what is right and what is wrong. I am certain that our assumption that approximately 75% to 80% of Americans were FOR the President's visit is essentially correct. And this in spite of the tremendous influence of the anti-German media.

2. The Jewish leadership has lost all touch with reality. The outcome of Bitburg means a great defeat for them. In an earlier GANPAC BRIEF I expressed the opinion that the invasion of Lebanon in June 1982 could be compared to the German defeat before Moscow in the winter of 1941, i.e., it was THE turning point. Well, Bitburg was their Stalingrad, in other words, their point of no return. I doubt that they can ever recuperate from their serious losses. (They'll try, I am sure!)

3. President Reagan proved his tremendous perception of the innermost feelings of the American people. He also knows that he can bypass many of the self-appointed intermediaries. This doesn't look good for representative democracy, it is, however, the only way out of the present dilemma where special interest groups (not the German-Americans as yet) exert too much power.

4. The Communist (Soviet) ability to influence Western policies is not as strong as is generally believed. No doubt, their agents had their hand in the Bitburg fiasco, and a retreat by the President would have meant a major victory for them. Conversely, they, too, have lost. (It bears mention that in normal Christian Western societies "40th anniversaries" are generally not celebrated. It has definite biblical/talmudic connotations. "40 years," according to the Bible, means a time of probation, of cleansing and renewal. That's probably why the Jewish leadership got so nervous as 1985 approached; they believe in symbolism and they desperately want to keep the Germans in the role of the sinner in a sackcloth. Alas, it didn't work. Now the opposite result is here. But why would the Soviets celebrate the "40th" so much? Perhaps for the same reason or (also) because their whole card-house of lies (like "20 million Soviet war dead") is falling apart.

One of our GANPAC loyalists mailed me these short notes:

"If, regarding the Bitburg coverage, the media were honest, at a minimum...

...it would not refer to the concentration camps in Germany as "death camps"—thus slyly seeking to imply that which it knows it can no longer assert about them, "gas chambers," "exterminations".

...it would check out, then refute, false anti-German atrocity claims "Malmedy 'massacre," etc.

...it would provide viewers a balanced perspective of all WW 2 atrocities (where were reports from the "death cities" such as Hamburg, Dresden, Pforzheim, etc.?)

...it would not cover up the fact that Waffen-SS soldiers were from all over Europe, and it would not seek to blur the fact that they were SOLDIERS!

...it would demand that Reagan JUSTIFY mentioning "genocide" at Bergen-Belsen!"

AMEN!

Perhaps THE best analysis of the underlying psychological factors behind the Jewish attempts to forever burden the Germans with a guilt complex in regard to the "Holocaust" was written by law professor Butler D. Shaffer of Los Angeles, in an article entitled "To What Purpose Guilt?"' (The Register, 5/16/85). Unfortunately, we can only use excerpts due to limited space:

"A Jewish friend...incensed about Reagan's visit...told me: 'I don't hold Germans who were born after WW II responsible for the Holocaust, but I think they should...feel guilty about it!' My friend and many other people seem in agreement: the feeling of guilt should be encouraged if we are to have a decent society.

But why? To what end? What consequences will flow from this? Would a loving, intelligent parent ever think of raising a child under...assumptions (of guilt)?

Would a child continually bombarded with parental opinions about his or her unworthiness be more likely to grow into a psychologically healthy adult, or a neurotic or psychotic one? Isn't it enough if the child understands the consequences of behavior...?

What Jewish child has not had the epithet 'Christ-killer' hurled at him by some schoolmate who has just discovered religion? Doesn't my friend understand that he is playing the same game when he suggests that Germans ought to feel a burning sense of guilt, not for what they have done personally, but for the "sin" of having been born German? Is it an improvement in the moral nature of mankind to counter 'Christ-killer' with 'Jew-killer'?"

I do not agree with Professor Shaffer's statement that (seemingly) every Jewish child has been called "Christ-killer." I, for one, have never, ever heard it. However, Mr. Shaffer (always a perceptive writer!) deserves our gratitude for so clearly spelling out what so few people in our society have (so far) recognized. Denn darum geht es wirklich!

THE NEW YORK TIMES, TUESDAY, MAY 14, 1985

'New' SS Wreaths, Old Anti-Semitism

By Marvin Kalb

WASHINGTON — The controversy over the Reagan visit to Bitburg is receding, no longer a front-page embarrassment. But do you hear an echo from the past?

I visited the cemetery the morning after President Reagan and Chancellor Helmut Kohl placed wreaths of reconciliation in front of its chapel. For years, the cemetery had been largely ignored; now, it was an instant shrine, a focus of political debate. Small flower pots marked many flat graves, 49 of them honoring Waffen SS troops. By the end of my visit, many hundreds of Germans and occasional Americans from the nearby Air Force base paused before the wreaths. Some took pictures. Mothers hushed children. A religious air seemed to saturate the scene.

But look and listen: all around there were the sights and sounds of the new Germany — and old. Six feet to the left of the President's wreath stood an equally impressive one. Across its banner: "To the Waffen SS who fell at Leningrad." No more than a foot to the right of the Chancellor's was another wreath: "For the fallen comrades of the Waffen SS."

These two wreaths had been placed in the chapel, out of sight, hours before the President arrived. They were restored to their original places of honor only hours after he left. In the ensuing tranquillity, the Waffen SS could again be honored in the springtime sun.

A middle-aged visitor from Nuremberg said the Waffen SS were simply soldiers — young conscripts doing their duty. "Let them rest in peace. For us, a dead soldier is a dead soldier, not a hero."

A native of Bitburg, who looked to be in his 20's, expressed a view I was to hear with disturbing regularity. "We Germans and Americans had been cooperating very well" — he lowered his voice — "until the Jews began to make trouble."

Another Bitburger zeroed in on Elie Wiesel. "Imagine the nerve of a Jew lecturing President Reagan. I saw him on television, making trouble the way they all do."

An old woman complained that Mr. Reagan had spent only eight minutes at the cemetery. "You know why the visit had to be cut back? Because of the Jews." She stalked away to join a group of friends nodding in agreement.

A man with a cane stopped and said: "If they don't like it here, the Jews, let them go away. We were better off without them in Germany." There are only 28,000 left, he was reminded. "Too many," he replied.

The people of Bitburg are pleased that Mr. Reagan came to visit, that he didn't yield to pressure. But it's clear they resent their new notoriety — and equally clear whom they consider responsible for the unwelcome change: the Jews and the media. The Jews are seen as a group separate from Germans and Americans — an indigestible lump, a foreign body. The media are seen as intrusive and irresponsible and, somehow, controlled by the Jews.

So it went. A few days later, a Munich newspaper editor explained that anti-Semitism is an "anthropological phenomenon" in Germany. The controversy seems only to have uncorked the venom once again. There is a sad irony. Bitburgers consider themselves remarkably enlightened. In 1933, when Hitler won a critical election, this conservative Catholic town voted overwhelmingly against him.

Is Bitburg an aberration? It is impossible to judge and dangerous to generalize. But a number of leading West German politicians and professors — several close to Mr. Kohl — think anti-Semitism was on the rise even before Bitburg. "The Jews were getting too impertinent," one politician said, citing, among other things, their opposition to West German tank sales to Saudi Arabia. "We've listened to them much too long. It's enough."

The pursuit of reconciliation by way of Bitburg has been a failure. What should have been obvious from the beginning is that reconciliation is a long process — not a single photo opportunity, an event, a moment frozen in time. Bitburg, exposing clumsiness and poor political judgment in Bonn and Washington, in the process lifted the scab on dark corners of recent German history. There is a time to know when to leave well enough alone.

As I entered the cemetery, I noticed a sign: "Please do not disturb the peace and rest of the dead." Too late. □

Marvin Kalb is an NBC News correspondent.

The above article by Marvin Kalb is probably the most significant post-Bitburg writing I have come across. It wholly confirms my pre-Bitburg expectations, and points to serious ramifications for "the others." That the writer views any criticism of the Jews as anti-Semitism is to be expected.

Kalb seems surprised that Germans now blame the Jews, and the American news media that is largely controlled by them, for the Bitburg hullabaloo. I, personally, trace his attitude to almost typically Jewish arrogance: Kalb certainly knows the score—the man is not dumb!—but for decades he has been so imbued with the fallacy of the stupid Goyim that he seems shocked when German housewives, or twenty-year olds, see through the sham of postwar propaganda and 'name names.' The Jewish-instigated Bitburg affair has had such positive results that ten million GANPAC BRIEFS, translated and sent across the ocean, couldn't have done better. Danke schön, Herr Wiesel!

Lest someone takes issue with my blaming the Jewish leadership for the Bitburg fiasco (fiasco for them, not for us!), allow me to quote the London Economist of 5/4/1985:

"The Bitburg stupidities have deeply offended liberals and American Jews (who are sometimes the same people) but most of them did not support Mr. Reagan anyhow. ...there is no conclusive evidence that their views are shared by the public."

In our advertisement [omitted from this reprint for space reasons —L.B. Editor] that was supposed to have been published in Bitburg (actually, by a newspaper in Trier/Mosel), we alluded to two Allied war crimes that are totally unknown to the American people. One was the murder of hundreds, perhaps thousands, of young Waffen-SS soldiers at the American POW camp at Marseille, France, (a Colonel Paul Doyle was commanding officer), the other one was the kidnapping in Central and South America of German ethnics and nationals and their families, and their illegal incarceration in U.S. prisons and concentration camps.

(The latter were forcibly removed from their homes after their material possessions had been confiscated. Then they were shipped to Texas against their will and—upon stepping on American soil—arrested for "illegal entry." Please note how the "laws" are always respected by the trespassers; then as now!)

(The Waffen-SS soldiers at Marseille were mostly from the 12th SS Panzerdivision "Hitlerjugend." The average age of the whole division, including general officers, was 19! The matter described occurred AFTER 5/8/1945.

One of the most fiendish methods of torture devised by Doyle was to have the emaciated, starving, thirsty POW columns march along the inner perimeter of the camp, singing "their" songs, carrying make-shift flags and—in the brutal Mediterranean sun—being bare-breasted. These marches were held EVERY DAY for at least 5½ months, 10 hours a day. One of the survivors figured that they marched over 4,000 miles during that time. Do you believe we could interest the OSI (Justice Department) in the matter? Or, if Doyle is dead by now, is he perhaps buried at Arlington, where the German presidents lay their wreaths when they visit Washington?

In honor of the dead soldiers at Bitburg, and of those many unknown Waffen-SS soldiers that were executed at or after capture by the WESTERN ALLIES (it is estimated that approximately 50,000 died thusly in the last year of the war!), we reprint below an article from the Chicago Tribune, giving us 40 available names of the fallen at the Bitburg cemetery.

What you read next is not told to create hate or to make American ex-GI's feel bad. I know there are bad apples in every army (just like every nation has its own share of criminals). But I do feel that a certain "balancing of the scales" is necessary, especially in the light of the incredible anti-German media campaign as a result of the Bitburg visit:

"At war's end, there were 56,000 members of the Wehrmacht, and 11,000 women, among them Red Cross nurses, WAC's, leaders of the NS welfare organisation, leaders of the girls' youth organisation, and the female members of the Leipzig Opera House, incarcerated near Bad Kreuznach.

They were all lying out in the open fields, in make-shift tents, with insufficient food and insufficient (non-existing) sanitary facilities. Every morning the dead were collected and thrown into "ready" mass graves. It is estimated that over 10,000 died there during the summer and fall of 1945." (Wormser Zeitung, April 13 and 14, 1985.)

"On April 21, 1945, a small company of young, mostly untrained recruits of the Waffen-SS was ordered to take defensive positions at the village of Lippach in Swabia. The following day, a large column of American troops attacked the town with approximately 80 "Shermans." The defenders were not even able to inflict serious losses on the Americans.

After the battle, GI's made a house-to-house search for remaining German soldiers: 25 drunken Americans discovered six Germans, and then drove them, half-clothed, 'singing,' toward the cemetery. There, one by one, they were murdered at the stations of the cross by bashing in their skulls. Altogether, 36 young Waffen-SS soldiers were murdered at Lippach.

On the same day, this marauding U.S. unit raped about 20 women, ages 17 to 40 (among them several pregnant ones), at the same village." (Aalener Volkszeitung, April 13, 1985)

(Similar incidents occurred at that time all over Germany, not only in the Russian war area but also at the hands of U.S., British, and French troops.)

Continuing, I must state that I will not write anything that-unlike many of the "Holocaust" stories—cannot be inde that—unlike many of the "Holocaust" stories—cannot be independently substantiated!

In its May11th, 1985, issue, the German-language weekly Amerika Woche (4740 N. Western, Chicago IL 60625), published an article concerning the infamous Buchenwald and Sachsenhausen concentration camps.

Who, today, knows that immediately after the German capitulation these camps were filled with people not to the liking of the Communists/Soviets? It is estimated that in the succeeding years 13,000 of these prisoners died at Buchenwald and at least 20,000 at Sachsenhausen.

For five years after the war, the inmates in these camps of silence had had no mailing privileges! (Compare this with the fact that Auschwitz "death camp" had a huge postoffice for incoming and outgoing mail! I once knew an ex-Auschwitz inmate who smuggled "underground" notes out by hiding them in his soiled underwear that he regularly mailed to his mother.)

I have little doubt that the Western Allies knew of the conditions in these and other—and the GULAG—camps. Yet, nothing was done about it. Could we discover some "war crimes guilt" in these facts?

Lastly, permit me to comment on what in the German language is called "aufrechnen," i.e., "to settle accounts," in this case, in regard to war crimes committed during and after WW II. Many German leaders don't like "aufrechnen," especially "due to the heinous German crimes against the Jews." That is nonsense. We can only clear the air (between us) when everything can be openly discussed, disputed, spoken about.

For us at GANPAC it is extremely important that our descendants, both here and in Europe, regain their pride in their heritage. This can only be accomplished when the truth about WW II is told, and when everyone knows that the German transgressions pale when compared to those of the combined Allies. Therefore, WE ABSOLUTELY MUST "AUFRECHNEN," and mainly with the truth against their lies!

In this regard I must mention that we also are NOT anxious "to forget the 'Holocaust'." At least not until the truth, and nothing but the whole truth, is firmly established. Do you think we could recruit the Jewish leadership to assist in this endeavor?

Finally, our thanks to all of you for everything. Without your help we couldn't do what we do. And forgive us for often not answering your missives. The more volatile the political situation gets, the less time we have.

Sincerely,
Hans Schmidt, National Chairman

This booklet, which was published in connection with an exhibit, provides an excellent pictorial representation of the problems which Americans perceived as being associated with or engendered by Jews. The freedom to criticize Jews and even express this criticism in the form of derisive cartoons and other satirical materials will come as a surprise to many a younger Aryan reader of this significant booklet. This freedom, which was enjoyed by our parents and grandparents, now seems to

THEY CALL IT 'DEMOCRACY'; WE CALL IT A RACKET

JOHN TYNDALL analyses the holiest word in the political dictionary

I have been accused by anti-Nationalists and fellow Nationalists alike of being a non-democrat. It is a label that causes me no loss of sleep; I have always regarded 'democracy' as one of the most over-used and unscrupulously exploited words in politics. If Dr. Johnson once said that 'patriotism' is the last refuge of a scoundrel, meaning not that every imaginable rascally act has been sanctified by the claim of patriotic motives, the very same can certainly be said for the term 'democracy;' it is the stock-in-trade and halo of every shyster in public life, and my experience is that those who shout the loudest in its praise and lay the highest claims to be its champions are the ones who, when convenient to themselves, would most readily violate its most hallowed principles.

Because my contempt for those who cloak themselves with this word has at times been very thinly veiled, it has given rise to the question that has very often been leveled at me: do I approve of 'democracy' or not? Running parallel with this question is another: do I favour 'dictatorship'?

Let me straightaway reply that in dealing with such questions it is best, I think, to throw those two words right out of the window and onto a garbage heap of emotive catch-phrases where they belong, and to talk about this subject in terms that have some true meaning.

MEANING OF 'DICTATE'

What, to begin with, is supposed to be the meaning of the word 'dictate'? I always thought it meant compelling people to do something against their will. By that definition, it is inevitable that in every society, under whatever name, there are going to be people who will have to be 'dictated' to—criminals, for a start, for their will is to break the law, whereas it is the will of the state to defend and uphold the law. No, when we are talking of 'dictatorship' in these terms we are talking about government that operates against the will of the majority, and conversely, 'democracy' is generally understood to mean government which operates according to the will of the majority.

But what is the answer of those who condemn 'dictators' on these principles when evidence is produced of men who have been thus described but whose actions can be proven to have had overwhelming popular consent? This was exactly the case with Hitler and Mussolini until, possibly, the very last stages of their careers, when military defeat soured the memory of their earlier achievements, and it was the case with Franco right until his death.

I can anticipate the 'democrat's' answer already. These rulers, he will claim, were able to obtain popular consent because they took over and controlled for their own purposes all the mass media of the time and used those media to indoctrinate the populace into supporting their policies. To this I would reply: perhaps indeed they did, but was their practice in this respect really any different to that of our true rulers today who exercise a similar total media control and who, with the aid of that control, lay down the perimeters within which we are allowed to argue, criticise, and debate? True, under 'democracy' a man may take a wooden box to a street corner, stand on it and condemn the government of the day to whatever passers-by take the time to stop and listen, whereas in the Fascist and National Socialist states he most probably would be arrested by a policeman for performing the same act, but what does this prove in terms of people's right to free expression? Only that the rulers of 'democracy' are a little more subtle in their methods of popular control. They know very well that the 'free expression' allowed to the man on the wooden box is utterly meaningless as long as his audience is restricted to a few pedestrians in the vicinity and he lacks the facilities to communicate his views to millions at a national level.

This reality is not contradicted by pointing to politicians who are allowed time on TV to condemn the existing government, and those who imagine that such a facility is indicative of a state of 'freedom' simply reveal how little they know of the true facts of political life. That facility is in fact given to a very few and they are in all cases 'selected' on the basis of the knowledge that they are reliable servants, if not of the government of the moment, at least of the broader 'liberal' establishment of which it is a part, and that their criticisms of those currently in office will be strictly circumscribed and limited to issues which have been defined by the media controllers as being 'safe' for public discussion.

No, certainly the media can be used for the purposes of indoctrination and generally are, whether those in control are professed 'democrats' or otherwise. There is, however, a limit to how far such propaganda can convince the people of the benevolence of their rulers. No amount of telling the people that they are well off will work so long as it is manifestly clear to them that they are badly off. In the three so-called 'dictatorships' of which I have spoken, the people were able to see, year to year, a steady improvement in their living standards, so that the state propaganda to which they were subjected on that score only confirmed what they already knew by their own experience. And it was that experience that provided the basis for the overwhelming popular consent which they gave to their rulers.

THE ELECTORAL FRAUD

This, of course, will not satisfy the partisan of 'democracy,' whose mind is so constituted that he will insist that popular consent be registered in some institutionalised form through such a procedure as regular elections and will deny the legitimacy of a ruler who does not submit himself to this process. But just how valid is the process in ascertaining the nature of the popular will?

The people are presented with the choice of two or more contending parties. Theoretically, any group of politically concerned citizens may combine together to form a party and present themselves, under the banner of their party, as candidates for parliament. In practice, however, only those parties that are considered 'within the pale' of establishmentarian thinking and policy are given a reasonable hearing by the mass media on which, in all except the very tiniest of societies, the populace relies for its knowledge of what the parties are saying and standing for. Elections therefore become, in effect, a choice between political factions that have all first been approved by those who wield the real power in the state. Additionally vital for obtaining a hearing is that the candidate or party have the backing of big money whereby they may purchase the means of self-advertisement. In practice, such big money only comes from powerful moneyed institutions, whether they be those of trade unions or big business. There are no moneyed institutions that represent the ordinary man in the street or give a fig about what he feels; moneyed institutions represent organised vested interests, i.e., élites.

The result of this system in Britain is that elections, as a means of registering what is the popular will and putting into power a government that will carry out that will, are nothing more than a fraud and a racket. And it is not basically different in the United States or any other of the larger societies of the West that we are accustomed to designating as 'democracies.' If proof is needed of the inefficacy of 'democracy' in Britain as an instrument of the popular will, we only have to ask: where are the political leaders in parliament who have obeyed majority wishes on such wishes as Immigration, Capital Punishment, Abortion, Homosexuality, VAT [Value Added Tax], and much more? Legislation has been passed on these questions which in no way reflects the mandate of popular consent, which is supposed to be the bedrock on which 'democracy' rests. It has been passed by self-appointed élites, who believe they know better than the people what is good for the people—supposedly a hallmark of 'dictators'!

Is the practice of such élites in putting themselves above the public opinion then wrong? Not necessarily so, though I believe they happen to have been wrong in Britain in the fields I have mentioned. The proposition that the majority always knows best in the complex matters of state, which call for experts trained and knowledgable in affairs, is a ridiculous proposition that will not stand up to two minutes of serious examination. It is as ridiculous as if I, when my motor car is failing to function in some way, called together a group of laymen on the subject of motor engineering and took a vote on what should be done to get the vehicle back on the road. As one almost wholly ignorant of the workings of the internal combustion engine, I would not wish to be consulted on such a matter, let alone allowed to vote; at all such times I seek an expert who knows about such things and who knows what to do. So it is with doctors in matters of sickness, lawyers in matters of law, generals in matters of warfare, plumbers in matters of plumbing, and so on. In every facet of our daily lives we put ourselves under the direction of specialists, who are supposed to know their trade. This is not to say that the specialists are always right; they can sometimes be disastrously wrong. It is only to say that modern civilisation has not devised, and cannot devise, any better procedure for dealing with our problems.

OPEN DOOR TO THE IGNORAMUS

Yet it is in the most important sphere of all, that of politics, that we adopt, under 'democracy,' a wholly different procedure and a wholly different system: we do not require that people are specialists in the art of government, that they have first acquired extensive education and training in that art, in order that they may govern us. Any ignoramus can get elected onto town councils and to parliament, provided that he belongs to one of the 'approved' parties and pays lip service to their beliefs, and from those positions can play havoc with our lives and misgovern our affairs with resulting chaos in the manner of the sorcerer's apprentice, who runs riot by the application of an untrained mind to matters that need men of sound training.

And yet we accord the non-specialists who run our political affairs the authority and the power that in other fields we only grant to specialists: their authority and power is derived, not from their proven competence in their field, but from the fact that, under a system wholly fraudulent and wholly dependent on the art of the confidence-trickster, they have obtained the majority of our votes!

Some men in the 20th Century, recognising these manifest contradictions, weaknesses, and absurditites in the 'democratic' system, have opted for an alternative system for the governing of states to which we have assigned the term 'dictatorship,' a word equally devoid of serious meaning, as I have pointed out before. The essence of their idea is that it is necessary, to deal with the complex affairs of developed modern societies, to have specialists at the helm—a necessity so obvious that it scarcely needs the emphasis I have given to it. Their theory is that there are better ways to bring such specialists to the fore and grant them the power to get done the jobs that have to be done than the charade of 'elections' as carried out by 'democratic' rules. Normally the method chosen is one of appointment from above rather than election from below, and the specialist is sought, not from the comparatively narrow field of politics, but from the wider field of the whole nation's life: from the careers and professions and businesses, where the men of the greatest competence can be found and chosen entirely on the basis of merit and achievement. They may include men who have been active politically but this is not a necessary criterion.

THE LEGITIMACY ARGUMENT

In what then lies the legitimacy of the power of such men? They have not been elected, so how do we know that they carry the people's mandate? The simple answer is, of course, that we do not know—by any process acceptable within the 'democratic' rulebook. The argument that will be advanced in favour of such an alternative system is not that it wears the mantle of 'legitimacy' by reference to that rulebook but that no such criterion of 'legitimacy' is ever really possible. The whole concept of legitimacy by such a process is called into question, and on the grounds that it can never be established by methods which, when examined honestly, can be seen as false and fraudulent.

The nearest that man may ever get to truly democratic government in the real world is in the limited sphere of societies and clubs, where those called together are of broadly homogeneous disposition in respect of the objects for which they have joined such bodies and where they have the facility, every individual amongst them, to have their say on matters of which we may reasonably expect them to have some interest and comprehension. The same might be true in very small societies at a primitive level of existence, where matters to be debated and voted upon are so basic that every man and woman of adult age can understand them and where the number involved is sufficiently minute to enable every member to communicate with every other member. Again, a measure of 'democracy' might be achieved in the conduct of the affairs of a country village, where it is possible to assemble everyone in the local village hall and allow them to discuss and vote on such questions as the cutting down of an old historic tree, the building of a new road through the neighbourhood, or the erection of a prominent statue overlooking the village green. Here once more there is reason to expect that everyone, the village idiot excepted, will have an opinion worth hearing and that every opinion gets a hearing. At these levels of human existence there is some possibility that the principles of 'democracy', whatever their merits or demerits, have reasonable chance of being put into practice.

At the level of the national affairs of a state of population of 50 million or upwards, there is no such possibility of any true, fair, and democratic consensus, for even if every major question is put to people's referendum—as happens to some extent in Switzerland (a country whose people are less in number than those of Greater London)—the fact still remains that such a referendum will rely for its outcome largely on the power of propaganda over which certain influentially placed people will have a disproportionate, if not total, control. This was seen in the referendum in Britain on the Common Market [European Eonomic Community] in 1975, in which the pro-Market lobby was able to spend literally hundreds of times more money on promoting its side of the question than the anti-Market lobby, which was doomed to campaign on the proverbial shoestring.

When all these facts are considered in the sober light of day, we may appreciate that true democracy, except in the small societies that have been mentioned, is a total mirage, and that it provides no basis whatever for determining the legitimacy of government; there has to be some alternative criterion of that legitimacy, and, ultimately, the only such criterion is the admittedly very unsatisfactory one of the law of possession; in other words, he who has the power has the right!

BASIS OF 'RIGHT'

It is vitally important at this juncture to clarify what is meant by 'right' in this context: it does not mean moral right; it does not mean superiority of principle; it does not mean justification of every act, good or evil, carried out by those who have power in their hands; it merely means the right established by nature in accordance with the reality that no other right, however noble in conception, can be effectively asserted and that no other method of determining right has ever been devised.

This is the principle understood by those who have led the modern revolutions during our century against the old institutions of parliamentary democracy. Their legitimacy, from the moral point of view, is derived not from the process by which they have won and retained power, but from the benefits or otherwise that their leadership has brought to their people when in power. These, of course, are a matter for considerable debate, but it is a debate that lies outside the scope of this article.

Again, sweeping away the familiar verbiage about 'democracy' and 'dictatorships,' we may confidently state the fact that it is a commonsense interest and wish of all rulers of nations to be popular, and that their use of power is tempered by such a wish at all stages of the process. Of course, that wish is tempered in turn by a realisation of the need to make prudent provision for the requirements of the future by far-sighted works, the dividends of which may not be realised immediately—investment in long-term development projects, acts of foreign policy essential to national security but costly in their execution at the time, large defence budgets conceived in the same purpose. This balance between the promptings of popularity and prudence has to be struck by all rulers and all leaders in human affairs, regardless of the nature of the institutions in which they work—'democratic' or non-'democratic.' Such leaders, therefore, may be seen to be working under basically the same conditions: they are unwise to go too far in one direction or in the other.

'INSTANT POPULARITY'

Party democracy, however, has one important weakness in these regards: it breeds, inevitably, a preoccupation on the part of rulers with what we might term 'instant popularity.' The people have to be pleased all of the time—or, if not that, at least at such times as some vital test of popular consent is marked down in the calendar. General elections, by-elections, local government elections: the frequency with which these events are taking place requires that government policy is constantly tailored to allow for them. If nasty measures are required which the people may not like, the best time to carry them out is just when a general election has been won and another is not in prospect for several years, then, as the latter draws near, the time for all the sweeteners and 'goodies' comes around. It is really a cheap game of bribery and extortion, depending not on sober considerations of national need but on the scheduling of the next mass popularity contest. It is not a way to get good government.

There is another consideration. Assuming for a moment that we accept the 'democratic' principle that government is there to serve the people, what is vital is that government be equipped with the necessary powers of action to perform that service effectively. This it will not have if it is submitted to the stifling procedure of parliamentary life in Britain as we know it. The whole process is one which atophries all virile impulses to action to get done the things we have to get done if the people's will, let alone the people's interest, is to be pursued. The modern revolution against the 'democratic' process has aimed very largely at streamlining the process of government whereby decisions can be made quickly and in time to make action effective. As just one example of the 'democratic' farce, we have the seemingly endless debates in parliament accompanying the introduction of a new bill, and all in the service of the sacred principle that all legislation must have the consent of the people by reason of having been voted upon by the people's representatives. Yet this procedure has not prevented a mass of legislation getting through parliament which by no stretch of imagination could be claimed as having popular support—legislation of which I have named a few examples earlier in this article. Did 'the people' will the abolition of the Death Penalty or the legalisation of Abortion?

Is it an unreasonable proposition that a vastly simplified and accelerated process of legislation which dispensed with some of the formalities of parliamentary consent might result in legislation not only much wiser but much more in conformity with popular wishes? As an example, would a small group of chosen men and women, each with a wealth of experience in the field to be legislated upon and with their ears to the ground of popular feeling, do any worse than hundreds of elected representatives, mostly professionally ignorant, and living in philosophical ivory towers?

THE 'FREEDOM' FALLACY

'Freedom,' like 'democracy' and 'dictatorship,' is another of those words dangerous to use without exact application and highly popular with political scoundrels and racketeers. At the most preposterous level, we are asked to envisage millions of men marching to war with the thought that they are fighting for this meaningless abstraction, instead of tangible things such as their country, their race, their homes, their wives, or their children. At all other levels, the word is nothing more than a slogan until we get down to defining what we are advocating people should be free to do.

In the debate in which 'democrats' see themselves outscoring those whom they have designated as enemies of 'democracy' the freedom of the individual is one of the constantly recurring themes—though what individual they have in mind they prefer not to be tied down to defining.

The more adult among 'democrats' will be mature enough to recognise that the defence of one man's freedom necessitates the restriction of the freedom of another. What we are really then talking about is the freedom of the great majority of ordinary citizens—for that is the only definition of 'the people' that makes sense within the terms of democracy.

So what 'freedom' does this great mass of people want?

I think I know something about that mass, because I have spent many years discussing with its members their innermost personal aspirations. One of the first freedoms they want is the freedom to walk the streets and parks of their neighbourhood at any hour of the day or night without fear of attack. Another is the freedom to work at a trade or profession of their choice with the prospect of steady increase in pay and living standards and with some reasonable security of employment. They want to be free to spend their leisure time in pastimes of their own preference and desirably with the availability of cheaply bought facilities in their own locality whereby they may do so.

They want the freedom that comes of owning the house they live in within reasonable time of their first setting out to obtain it. They want the freedom to send their children to schools of their own choice at which those children may achieve a good education. They want the freedom that comes of enjoying good health.

They want the freedom to choose with whom they will mix socially and, if they own their own business, the freedom to decide with whom they will trade and whom they will hire or fire.

They want the freedom to look forward during most years to a pleasant holiday somewhere in this country or abroad without worrying and fretting about every penny they spend.

They want the freedom to be able to keep in their own pockets every penny they have worked to earn, excepting that portion which is absolutely necessary to pay for essential public services.

In both the public and the private context, they want freedom from financial debt.

It will be noticed that in listing these freedoms I have excluded any mention of political freedom —and very deliberately so because I am speaking, as indicated earlier, of the majority of honest-working, law-abiding, decent citizens, and my experience of knowing them is that political freedom is something to which hardly one in a hundred gives two seconds' thought.

This does not mean that political freedom, i.e., the freedom to engage in political activity on behalf of the cause of one's choice is, necessarily, a thing to be dismissed as having no value; it is only to say that it is a freedom to be evaluated, as with all others, in order of priorities in which people see them, and it is my observation that the freedoms that I have just mentioned occupy a higher priority with most than the freedom to take part in politics.

And on the principle, repeated in slightly different form, that one freedom sometimes involves the curtailment of others, we have to consider to what extent these freedoms desired by the vast majority may be advanced or retarded by the extension of political freedoms desired, at the very most, by a small minority.

It needs little insight to realise that the personal freedoms desired by this majority stand the best chance of being achieved and safeguarded in a society where there is prosperity, cohesion, peace, and order, where there is stable government and where national affairs have a firm direction—a direction not changed every five minutes by changes of political leadership, where national leaders collaborate together to a common purpose instead of constantly warring against each other in the process of jockeying for power and position.

From this we may see that there are many areas of potential conflict between the aim of freedom for the ordinary individual who just wants to go about his daily life in peace (the majority) and freedom for the political activist, the protester, the dissenter, the rebel (always the minority). A political system that goes all out to promote the one will find that the inevitable consequence is that there are some restrictions on the other.

But when you probe the 'liberal' and 'democratic' mind you will find always that the preoccupation is with the freedom of the minority, with that comparatively small section of the population who want to be involved in political affairs, and much less with the freedom of the majority who just want to be left alone.

STATE AND INDIVIDUAL

Considered from this point of view, it is a dishonest distortion of the facts when the 'democrat' prattles endlessly on, as he does, about the need to protect the individual against the impositions of the state. A strong state and a free individual are constantly presented as if they were two conflicting aims. But in fact it is possible to conceive of circumstances in which a strong state is necessary, not to encroach upon the freedom and rights of the individual, but to defend those very things against the power of other institutions which intervene between individual and state and can much more dangerously threaten the individual than does the state itself. As one example, there is the trade union mafia which bullies and intimidates the worker who does not want to join a strike. At the other end of the spectrum there is the power of big banksterdom which holds the individual in thrall through usury and debt. There are the anarchic mobs with their minority axes to grind which interfere with ordinary people's rights to enjoy cricket matches or athletic contests. There are local government institutions, such as certain London borough councils, which will grossly abuse their powers by, for instance, throwing council tenants out of their homes for the 'crime' of objecting to coloured neighbours being foisted upon them—petty tyrannies run by miniature tyrants who can make the individual's life hell if that individual is not protected by a higher power that will keep the tyrants in check. In a score of ways a weak state, which does not have the will to keep these interest groups and pressure groups in order, exposes the ordinary individual to far more loss of freedom than a strong state which is resolved to rule and govern.

So we may see that there is not the simple conflict which the 'democrat' would have us believe there is between the needs of freedom and authority. These two needs can be made to harmonise in a higher synthesis in which freedom is lifted from the sphere of empty verbalising beloved of 'liberals' and defined in terms of its many meanings and applications. We recognise that not all freedoms can be given full flow and we decide which are the most important. It is a strange paradox that those who are most often designated the enemies of freedom may sometimes be the ones who bestow the greatest gifts of freedom on the greatest portion of the people, while those who shout 'freedom' the loudest in their political rhetoric are so often the ones who would subject the people to the lowest form of tyranny.

FREEDOM FOR THE MAJORITY

So to turn to the question which was raised early in this article: do I favour 'democracy' or not? My answer is that I favour those freedoms which I have defined as being precious to the greatest number of people, while I recognise that for such freedoms to flourish some curbs on certain other freedoms are necessary. My dispute with self-styled 'democrats' is not over the desirability of freedom itself but over whose freedoms should take priority.

Those who wish to bestow on this view the title 'democratic' are welcome to do so if it fits their conception of the meaning of that word. For myself, I prefer not to use the word because it is one that, in my opinion, has become debased to the level of mere jargon, of meaningless verbiage. Instead I say to people: if you ask me am I for this or that, let me answer, not in mere words, but in concrete ideas—ideas which mean what they are said to mean.

I would apply the same rule to the question: do I favour 'dictatorship'? My answer is that there are hundreds of areas of affairs where ordinary people are today being dictated to by petty tyrants and where I oppose that dictating. I have named a few of these. Generally, it follows from what I have said about the freedoms that the ordinary man values that I would oppose violations of freedoms, and so that largely answers the question.

At the same time I am not going to admit the word 'dictatorship' itself to my political vocabulary any more than I would admit the word 'democracy,' and for the same reason. What is 'dictatorship' to one man may be nothing more than leadership to another. I am certainly not against a strong national leader who by his works bestows greater benefits on the majority of his people and in the making of his major decisions acts in accordance with his feeling of the pulse of his people, even if in the first he is not chosen through the corrupt charade of an electoral system and if subsequently he does not call a halt to the ship of state every little while in order for that charade to be re-enacted. If 'dictating' means acting against the people's wishes and imposing upon them the policies which they have not approved, who is the greater dictator: Adolf Hitler or Ken Livingstone? Francisco Franco or Arthur Scargill?

In the immediate aftermath of World War II the 'victorious' powers resolved that one of the vital conditions of the making of the post-war world would be that 'Nazism,' 'Fascism,' or any other movement of authoritarian Nationalism would be prevented by all means possible from ever rising again, not only in Germany and Italy, but anywhere else. By this they meant that the 'democratic' rights and freedoms normally extended to political parties right across the spectrum would be suspended in the case of movements of those kinds, whether they proclaimed themselves to be 'Nazi' or 'Fascist' openly or were merely designated as such by those who set themselves up as the thought controllers of the new world.

For the Soviet part of the post-war community of nations this policy did not pose any special problem. 'Nazism,' 'Fascism' and all other forms of Nationalism were simply banned alongside every other creed or movement opposed to the Communist way of thinking. No pretense ever existed in the Soviet Communist scheme of things that there should be any toleration of dissenting points of view.

But for the Western nations claiming for themselves the mantle of 'democracy' things were not nearly so simple. To admit openly that any kind of political creed or movement disapproved of by the ruling powers should be banned under the laws of the state would be to tear away from under their feet the very principles and precepts upon which their various 'democratic' systems were supposed to be based. Having told everyone that they had been fighting the war "to make the world safe for democracy," how could they cast out of the window their very justification for six years of struggle?

REPRESSION IN WEST GERMANY

The various 'democracies' resolved this dilemma in various ways. In the Federal Republic of Germany the most blatant, harsh, and unashamed oppression was practised against all those organisations and individuals that might be suspected as intent on reviving National Socialism. Such bodies and people were openly banned under the new laws of the Republic, instituted under pressure from the Allied occupational authorities. In view of the fact that National Socialism was popularly (albeit quite wrongly) regarded as an essentially German phenomenon, and therefore more likely to re-emerge in Germany itself than anywhere else, it was possible to gain acceptance of the idea that 'safeguards' against it needed to be more stringent in that country than in others. Elsewhere, including in our own country, the ruling powers were more subtle in their approach; no official prohibition of 'Fascist' movements was introduced, but in a hundred different ways practical obstacles were placed in the path of organisations thus designated, which meant that, in effect, they enjoyed none of the normal rights granted to other types of political party. Prominent among these obstacles were:

(1) The introduction of laws against 'racism' which were designed to eliminate free public discussion of the issue of racial differences or of the power of organised Jewry.

(2) Effective suppression of the Nationalist Press by means of advertising boycotts; both against Nationalist newspapers and magazines and against wholesalers and retailers who might handle them—these boycotts being organised principally by Jewish Business interests.

(3) Constant police harrassment of Nationalists by means of telephone tapping, visits to homes on the flimsiest of pretexts, arrest and interrogation without any basis for charges, sabotage of activities and infiltration of Nationalist organisations by police agents for the purpose of internal disruption.

(4) The effective elimination of freedom of assembly by means of the withdrawal of hiring facilities for meeting halls from Nationalist groups—this policy sometimes being 'justified' as being in the interest of 'community relations' (i.e., 'anti-racism') and sometimes in protection of property against the threat of disorder (always, of course, the disorder of the opponents of Nationalism and not of Nationalists for what their adversaries might do).

(5) In harness with the above policy, the insidious encouragement of left-wing mobs to attack and disrupt Nationalist meetings, so as to provide the pretext for the denial of meeting facilities on grounds of the threat of damage to property and also to discourage private owners of meeting halls from hiring their premises to Nationalists.

(6) The almost total exclusion of Nationalists from the new medium of the post-war era, television. This exclusion has been 'justified' by broadcasting authorities on the grounds that TV time is granted to the spokesmen of political parties in accordance with those parties' degree of representation in parliament, but of course the truth is that access to TV is in the first place essential for a party even to have a chance of representation in parliament. At the same time quite generous TV time has regularly been granted to spokesmen for the most miniscule and obscure organisations providing that their views are not considered 'dangerous,' as are those of Nationalists.

These conditions have operated to various degrees in various countries and in Britain they have done so to a degree acutely disadvantageous to the Nationalist cause (we are of course speaking here of British Nationalism and not of regional separatist movements in Scotland and Wales, nor of Irish Republicanims, which are regarded as in an entirely different category). The way in which the establishment in Britain has reacted to the challenge of Nationalism has been similar to someone telling a motorist: "You are completely free to drive around our neighbourhood and go anywhere you like," and then when the motorist sets out to do just that he finds himself thus prevented by a serious of no-entry signs, road repairs, traffic jams, and diversions every time that he wants to travel down a street of his choice. The whole set-up is of course one colossal piece of humbug. The 'democracy' that exists on paper in no way exists in real practice, except in the case of those whose viewpoint has been vetted and approved by the establishment as being "not dangerous".

THE LIVERPOOL EXPERIENCE

This system of concealed suppression exists, broadly speaking, throughout most of the present Western World. Our own party experienced it in Liverpool only recently in events that were described in our columns last month. We elected to hold a public rally in the city in accordance with our 'democratic' rights; in the event we were stopped from doing so by a combination of city council, police, hotel management, and left-wing political opposition, which all acted in tandem on the occasion to prevent our rights being exercised. There occurred the threat of a riot and the 'democratic' process was immediately suspended in the interests of preventing that riot. It needs little imagination to realise that such a threat of riot can easily be 'arranged' just about anywhere and at any time for the same procedure to be adopted—to the point at which, eventually even where no real threat of riot is present, the mere supposition of it is enough to have the same result.

To state all of this is not to deny that the violation by 'democratic' powers of their own supposed principles in these cases has a certain rationale—if looked at from their own point of view. To the claim which I have made, that the whole process reeks of humbug, the answer might be given that humbug is an inevitable weapon in the real world of politics, and entirely necessary and justified when some greater good has to be served or some greater evil opposed. Every possible immoral and despicable device was employed by the Allied powers in World War II on the grounds that the 'enemy,' i.e., 'Nazism,' was so manifestly and enormously evil that any kind of minor evil was permissible in the cause of its destruction. You have to fight dirty in order to win a dirty game, etc., etc. That is the argument.

With this argument no doubt in the back of his mind, today's 'liberal-democrat' will sanctify the methods used to suppress those whom he regards as dangerous to his system. "Of course I believe in the maintenance of free speech," he will say, "but I do not agree with extending it to those who will abuse it" (i.e., such people as 'fascists'). In other words, 'freedom,' in his conception of the term, has its limits. Extended beyond a certain point, it becomes self-destructive to the very order of things that he holds most dear, which he considers essential to the stability of society as he understands it.

To which I would say: fair enough—given his particular values, one can see his point. Have I not acknowledged in the first section of this article that freedom cannot be total and absolute but must be restricted in certain sectors if it is to be preserved in others?

INCONSISTENCY

But where the 'liberal-democrat' trips himself up is in failing to make this same rule for those political systems he opposes as he does for the system he supports. In his own scheme of what is the right society he defends the withdrawal of freedom from those who might endanger that society; at the same time he is the very first to squeal in protest when just such a principle is applied by those who are acting in defence of a different society. Then such an act is derided as 'oppression,' 'dictatorship,' the denial of 'human rights,' etc., etc., etc., ad nauseam.

It is at this point that we should perhaps take a closer look at those societies regarded by the 'liberal-democrat' as the absolute antithesis of his own, and in order to see how there operates in reverse the principle of imposing limitations on freedom which he justifies in the defence of his own society. By this is meant those societies which the 'liberal' will designate as 'fascist'—using that term in the very broad, loose way in which he is accustomed to using it rather than in the exact and precise way in which it should properly be used, i.e., virtually any society in which Nationalist and patriotic ideals are combined with strong and firm government, rather than a society constructed according to the specific programme carried out in Italy under Mussolini.

Straightaway let us dispense with the idea that in such societies there is any such thing as the suppression of every kind of dissenting opinion and thought; such a thing would be quite impossible to enforce in practice even in the doubtful event of its being desirable in principle. No such suppression existed in reality under Fascism in Italy or National Socialism in Germany, let alone in any other type of society or system broadly similar to those mentioned. No 'dictator' other than a comic-opera fool (which Mussolini and Hitler certainly were not) would wish to be surrounded by people who never dared to tell him when they thought he was wrong. All sound and effective leadership, however strong and self-willed, needs sources of frank and independent advice, and all vital decisions of state need to be carefully discussed and analysed from every angle before the committment is made to put them into effect. Does anyone seriously think that the massive social and economic achievements of the so-called 'dictatorships'—undeniable, whatever one may think of the other features of those regimes—or the tremendous wartime achievements of Germany, effected after Summer 1941 against immense odds, could have been possible just through the preremptory orders of one man and without prior discussions involving a pooling of brains and expertise?

THE 'DICTATORS'

Those who care to read David Irving's Hitler's War, one of the less bigoted accounts of the 1939-45 conflict though by no means one completely uncritical of the German leader, will realise that its central figure far preferred generals who would speak frankly to him and argue with him when they thought it necessary than time-serving sycophants and yes-men. Meanwhile, those who actually visited Germany in the 1930s (as opposed to those who merely read about that country in their Jewish-censored press) will be able to testify that foreign newspapers, most of which were highly critical of the National Socialist regime, were available in the main shops and on the main newsstands of all the major towns and cities, including American as well as British and French papers. Bearing in mind that a high proportion of educated Germans were able to read in English or French or both languages, there might be every reason to suppose that such papers would be denied to them, but this was not the case.

Then there was Juan Peron, the so-called 'dictator' of Argentina. Organised under his government and run by his wife Evita was a special bureau in Buenos Aires at which any citizen, however poor or lowly, could call at any time of the day and express any complaint that he saw fit. Each and every complaint was carefully investigated and, where found just, was acted upon so far as this was possible. Such a procedure hardly accords with the image of 'dictatorships' that the 'liberal' would prefer that we have in our minds, which is one reason why not many people have ever heard about it.

When, in the 1960s, a group of army officers seized power and set up their own government in Greece under Colonel Papadopoulos, 'liberals' the world over squawked about all freedom of dissent in that country being brutally suppressed. Yet I well remember watching a TV documentary in which a woman well-known to be opposed to the government was featured openly attacking it in an interview filmed right in the middle of Athens, where she lived. Granted, the interview was probably not shown on Greek TV, but it must have been seen by a great many Greeks in Britain which were likely to return later to their homeland. Papadopoulos was, needless to say, execrated by his opponents for jailing some of their number; but this did not prevent them jailing him in return when his government was overthrown.

It has never been seriously contested, certainly not among people of my acquaintance whose thinking would in the 'liberal' vocabulary be termed 'Fascist,' that there should exist in every mechanism of state the facility for frank and sometimes critical discussion of government policy. Where the great disagreement exists is in the matter of the form in which this facility should be provided. There will be people who do not necessarily support the contention of 'liberals' that the parliamentary form prevailing at present has to be the best one, or that that squalid commercial racket masquerading under the guise of a 'free press' is indeed the best means whereby there can be a frank public discussion of national affairs whereby public evils may be eliminated and the public good served. One might indeed ask what is the value of a 'free press' in which the front page is plastered with 'exposure' of some minor sex scandal, written obviously for the titillation of readers, while much more important and damaging scandals concerning irregularities in the affairs of state are conveniently hushed up because of the fear that certain powerful interest groups might otherwise be offended and certain valuable advertising contracts thereby lost? Of course, the idea of a 'free press,' like all other 'liberal' articles of faith, is a total sham, as anyone with real experience in the world of journalism will be able to testify. Yet should anyone suggest that the press be removed from the regulation of commercial racketeers operating from the shadows and subjected to some more open regulation, however limited, by government he is immediately branded by the 'liberal' as the enemy of 'freedom'! Of course, freedom of the press, as the 'liberal' would have us believe in it, has always been a total fantasy, just as the idea of freedom of braodcasting. Such vast and powerful institutions as the press and broadcasting can never be other than controlled by élites and oligarchies; the only question to be decided is: which élite? which oligarchy? And, most important of all, in the interests of WHAT and WHOM?

In what then lies the essential difference in attitudes to free debate between the 'liberal' and those who favour an alternative system? Perhaps I may be permitted to describe it in this way: while the former sees it as a means of disrupting the process of government, the latter envisages it as a means of helping the process of government. To the 'liberal,' human freedom and civilised political life are inconceivable except in terms under which half the body politic is occupied with the effort to govern while the other half is occupied with the effort to prevent it governing. No decent procedure of politics is possible, in other words, without the ever present existence of party warfare. There has to be a constant fight for power between rival political factions—otherwise no society can be 'free.' The 'liberal' fails to see that in such an environment the whole political process becomes nothing better than a mutual slanging match in which truth and objectivity, to say nothing of a sober judgement of what is in the best national interest, become the first and chief casualties. Parliament, instead of being a forum for intelligent analysis of state policy, is a battleground of ideologies behind which stand vested interests. As for 'the people,' in whose name the whole institution is supposedly conceived, their views are generally treated, as I have indicated earlier, with wholehearted contempt, while the real freedoms that are valuable to them—such as freedom to work and to walk about the streets in safety—are regarded as of little account compared with the freedom of the Opposition caucus in the House of Commons to howl down every Government speaker in a frenzy of zoological noise bereft of one iota of constructive thought.

LIMITATION OF FREEDOM

Then there is the issue of the limitation of freedom to which I have referred earlier. As indicated, the 'liberal,' in contradiction to all his professed principles, upholds in practice that such limitation is necessary in certain circumstances. The non-liberal, though with much less hypocrisy, simply holds to the same view.

What then are the limitations on freedom considered necessary in those societies offensive to 'liberals' and therefore usually designated by the latter as 'fascist'?

They are those limitations that are called into play at the point at which the exercise of freedom seriously endangers the workings of stable government, undermines national unity or substantially threatens national security or the national interest. Considering things soberly, I do not see such limitations as being unreasonable, particularly when it is borne in mind that they are limitations which, at worst, only affect a very small few and in no way infringe upon the liberties of the ordinary average citizen.

And given that the spirit and intent of a government are fundamentally patriotic—which is certainly what they should be—is it unreasonable to deduce that any political party, personality, or activity which repudiates the very principles of national self-preservation, national independence, and national defence against the country's enemies, internal as well as external (which principles are the cornerstone of patriotism) are deserving of the status of illegal? After all, every state, 'democratic' or otherwise, legislates against those practices that are considered to be morally wrong or socially disruptive, and these include murder, rape, robbery, fraud, and many others. What, then, is wrong in designating in the same category acts which clearly are harmful to the national good and, likewise, placing such acts outside the pale of the law?

It has been in this spirit that the constitutions of the authoritarian states have been constructed. Clearly, there could be no room within such states for political parties or any other kinds of organisation not owing first and exclusive loyalty to the nation in question. Going one step further, neither could there be room for those whose political activities were conceived with the object, not of assisting the process of government, but of disrupting and sabotaging that process, since, whether by intent or not, activity of that kind would inevitably harm the nation and aid its enemies. The same could be said of activity which caused disruption in the nation's economic life, and it has been for that reason that trade unions as we know them in this country have been disbanded in such states and their functions taken over by state-controlled bodies set up with a view to co-ordinating the different sections of industry rather than bringing them into conflict. Such procedures have, of course, been hysterically condemned by leftists and 'liberals' as an infringement of 'workers' rights,' but those same people were not able to do much about protecting the 'rights' of those British miners who wanted to carry on working during the recent coal strike, nor, indeed, did many of them even wish to do so. To risk repetition, the 'rights' with which the 'liberal' and leftist are continually obsessed are always the rights of the politically active minority and seldom the rights of the peaceful and conscientiously working majority.

If we are to accept the premises of the 'liberal,' we must accept his view that political decisions have to be based on consensus and compromise, on mutual tolerance of diverse opinions, and on the attempt to synthesise those opinions into an acceptable policy. That at least is how the 'democratic' process would be described by most of those who support it.

Such a proposition sounds perfectly reasonable—just as long as at the end of the road there is the basis of a commonly shared loyalty and objective. When two or more groups of men are arguing about different means to achieve the same end, it is possible to envisage some acceptable compromise that puts a limit on the argument and gets them all working to that common objective.

But when the argument is between two or more groups of men of totally different and conflicting loyalties and therefore in all probability working in pursuit of wholly incompatible objectives, no such mutual tolerance or compromise can ever be possible, and it is in the matter of believing that it can that the 'liberal' reveals his naivity.

IRRECONCILABLES

Men of good 'liberal' disposition have spent the last few years trying to find a mutually acceptable formula for achieving an end to the conflict in Northern Ireland, hardly ever stopping to think that such a formula is out of the question as it involves bringing together in common cause two groups of people dedicated to different and utterly irreconcilable causes, i.e., the cause of union with Britain and the cause of integration into the Irish Republic. In such a conflict one side can only be satisfied by the complete and permanent defeat and annihilation of the other.

Likewise, there cannot possibly be any basis for mutual tolerance or compromise in any state between two political factions, one of which is dedicated to the principles of national self-preservation (involving as that must do racial self-preservation), national independence, and national defence, in a word—Nationalism, and the other of which is dedicated to the removal of national and racial boundaries, to racial integration, to supra-national authority, and to the pooling of national defences in an international system, in a word—internationalism. The two concepts are wholly incompatible and one can only be realised at the expense of the other; one can only be ensured by the elimination of the other.

What 'liberals' have condemned in authoritarian states as 'suppression' of dissenting opinions has in fact merely been the recognition that in societies dedicated to Nationalist ideals and objectives there can be no room for those dedicated to entirely opposite objectives. One faction must obliterate the other or be obliterated by the other.

There is ample room for argument, debate, discussion, and criticism within the framework of dedication to the nation and between those dedicated to the nation; there is no room for argument with those who work against the nation.

These, then, are the limits to freedom that the 'liberal' fails to comprehend and therefore opposes as wrong, while at the same time he imposes his own limits to freedom in protection of his own basic beliefs and values. He is a hypocrite and a humbug, but he is more than just that.

He knocks the bottom out of his own case by repudiating the very principles that form the sole support for that case. In being prepared to violate 'democracy' in defence of 'democracy,' he admits that there is no substance in 'democracy,' only pretence, lies, camouflage, and deceit.

In answering a question which I raised in a previous part of this article: do I believe in democracy? I might say that I cannot possibly believe in something that does not exist. □

Official Definition of DEMOCRACY

Here are four (4) fac simile section reproductions taken from a 156 page book officially compiled and issued by the U. S. War Department, November 30, 1928, setting forth exact and truthful definitions of a Democracy and of a Republic, explaining the difference between both. These definitions were published by the authority of the United States Government and must be accepted as authentic in any court of proper jurisdiction.

These precise and scholarly definitions of a Democracy and a Republic were carefully considered as a proper guide for U. S. soldiers and U. S. citizens by the Chief of Staff of the United States Army. Such definitions take precedence over any "definition" that may be found in the present commercial dictionaries which have suffered periodical "modification" to please "the powers in office."

Shortly after the "bank holiday" in the thirties, hush-hush orders from the White House suddenly demanded that all copies of this book be withdrawn from the Government Printing Office and the Army posts, to be suppressed and destroyed without explanation.

This was the beginning of the complete red control of the Government from within, not from without.

Democracy:

A government of the masses.

Authority derived through mass meeting or any other form of "direct" expression.

Results in mobocracy.

Attitude toward property is communistic—negating property rights.

Attitude toward law is that the will of the majority shall regulate, whether it be based upon deliberation or governed by passion, prejudice, and impulse, without restraint or regard to consequences.

Results in demagogism, license, agitation, discontent, anarchy.

120–121 CITIZENSHIP

Republic:

Authority is derived through the election by the people of public officials best fitted to represent them.

Attitude toward property is respect for laws and individual rights, and a sensible economic procedure.

Attitude toward law is the administration of justice in accord with fixed principles and established evidence, with a strict regard to consequences.

A greater number of citizens and extent of territory may be brought within its compass.

Avoids the dangerous extreme of either tyranny or mobocracy.

Results in statesmanship, liberty, reason, justice, contentment, and progress.

Is the "standard form" of government throughout the world.

A republic is a form of government under a constitution which provides for the election of (1) an executive and (2) a legislative body, who working together in a representative capacity, have all the power of appointment, all power of legislation, all power to raise revenue and appropriate expenditures, and are required to create (3) a judiciary to pass upon the justice and legality of their governmental acts and to recognize (4) certain inherent individual rights.

Take away any one or more of those four elements and you are drifting into autocracy. Add one or more to those four elements and you are drifting into democracy.—Atwood.

121. Superior to all others.—Autocracy declares the divine right of kings; its authority can not be questioned; its powers are arbitrarily or unjustly administered.

Democracy is the "direct" rule of the people and has been repeatedly tried without success.

Our Constitutional fathers, familiar with the strength and weakness of both autocracy and democracy, with fixed principles definitely in mind, defined a representative republican form of government. They "made a very marked distinction between a republic and a democracy * * * and said repeatedly and emphatically that they had founded a republic."

Why Democracies Fail

A Democracy cannot exist as a permanent form of Government. It can only exist until the voters discover they can vote themselves largess out of the public treasury. From that moment on the majority always votes for the candidate promising the most benefits from the public treasury with the result that Democracy always collapses over a loose fiscal policy, always to be followed by a Dictatorship.

(Written by Professor Alexander Fraser Tytler, nearly two centuries ago while our thirteen original states were still colonies of Great Britain. At the time he was writing of the decline and fall of the Athenian Republic ouer two thousand years before.)

Did I say "republic?" By God, yes, I said "republic!" Long live the glorious republic of the United States of America. Damn democracy.

It is a fraudulent term used, often by ignorant persons but no less often by intellectual fakers, to describe an infamous mixture of socialism, miscegenation, graft, confiscation of property and denial of personal rights to individuals whose virtuous principles make them offensive.

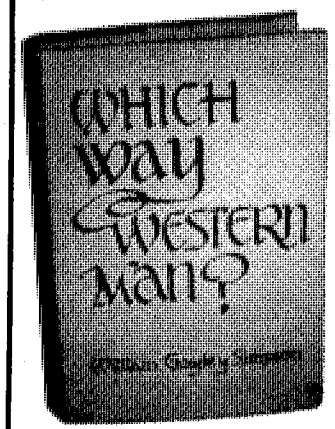
SURVIVAL MANUAL FOR THE WHITE RACE



William Gayley Simpson has spent a lifetime of keen observation, careful analysis, and deep reflection developing the principal thesis of his book: that the single, undying purpose of all human activity should be the ennobling of man. In support of this thesis he looks at the foundations of Western Society, at the structure of our government, at the effects of technology and industrialization on man, at the roles of the sexes, at economics, and at race. The book goes to the roots of the problems facing the White race today, and it shows the ways in which White society must be changed if the race is to survive. WHICH WAY WESTERN MAN? is an encyclopedic work whose conclusions can be ignored by no one with a sense of responsibility to the future. ABOUT THE AUTHOR: Dr. Revilo Pendleton Oliver, Professor of the Classics at the University of Illinois for 32 years, is a scholar of international distinction who has written articles in four languages for the most prestigious academic publications in the United States and Europe.

During World War II, Dr. Oliver was Director of Research in a highly secret agency of the War Department, and was cited for outstanding service to his country.

One of the very few academicians who has been outspoken in his opposition to the progressive defacement of our civilization, Dr. Oliver has long insisted that the fate of his countrymen hangs on their willingness to subordinate their doctrinal differences to the tough but idealistic solidarity which is the prerequisite of a Majority resurgence.

SOME QUOTABLE QUOTES FROM AMERICA'S DECLINE

On the 18th Amendment (Prohibition): "Very few Americans were sufficiently sane to perceive that they had repudiated the American conception of government and had replaced it with the legal principle of the 'dictatorship of the proletariat,' which was the theoretical justification of the Jews' revolution in Russia."

On Race: "We must further understand that all races naturally regard themselves as superior to all others. have disappeared completely. It is tempting to speculate on the reasons for its disappearance. Perhaps a growing Jewish power to intimidate potential Aryan critics in one way or another has played a rôle. An even stronger influence would seem to be the played a rôle. An even stronger influence would seem to be the guilt feelings which have been inculcated in American Aryans, especially since 1945, by means of the "Holocaust" material and other shrewd propaganda schemes. The tremendous power of the television networks to distort history and cause guilt feelings in Aryans can hardly be overestimated.

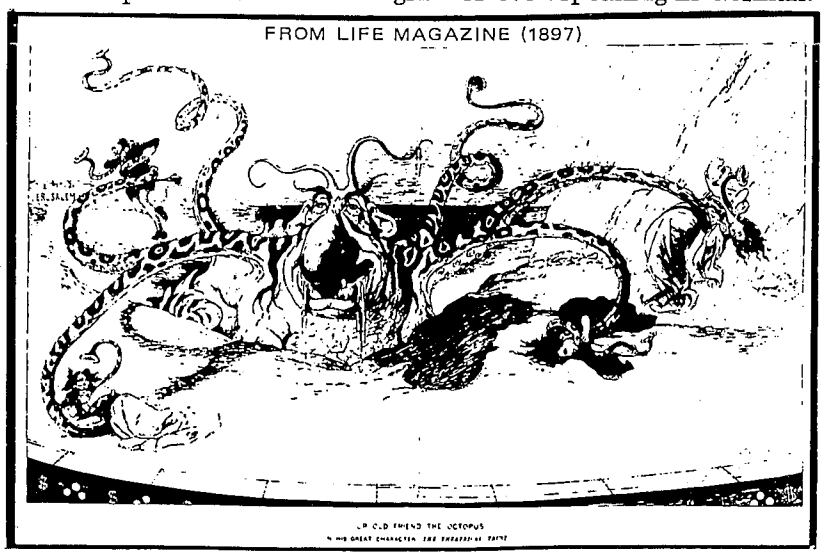
As the authors point out, caricatures of Jews existed even in ancient times. (See Gerhard Kittel's article, "Die ältesten Judenkarikaturen. 'Die Trierer Terrakotten'," in Volume IV of the Forschungen zur Judenfrage, 1939.) Although American cartoons dated as early as 1834 and 1838 are reproduced which show Jews in a somewhat derogatory manner, nearly all of the other American materials reproduced in this booklet to which definite dates are assigned range from 1879 to 1907. This is probably no coincidence. Prior to the 1880's, the Jewish portion of the United States population was quite small, hardly exceeding ½ of 1%. This very modest fraction of the total United States population seems to have originated largely from Germany, an impression confirmed by cartoons reproduced on pages 2, 14 and 19, where Jews are represented as speaking with German pronunciations of English or even speaking in German.



However, a tremendous influx of Jews from the Russian Empire (including Poland, Lithuania, and Latvia at that time) commenced after the Russian May Law was promulgated in 1882. Two cartoons (pp. 12-13 and 17) refer to the pressures on Jews to emigrate from Russia.

There is a wide range of topics represented in the reproduced materials. Examples are Jewish control of the theaters, the prohibition against Jews' using certain bathing beaches, arson committed by Jews against their own property as insurance fraud, American resistance to the massive Jewish immigration of the late 19th and early 20th centuries, not allowing Christian children to sing Christian songs in NewYork public schools, the Jewish domination of the cotton market, and even genetically determined characteristics of children from mixed marriages. Most of the materials are fairly benign and humorous, but there are some notable exceptions. Two sham valentines from the early years of the 20th century reproduced on pages 14 and 15 are especially acerbic. One of them portrays a Jewess holding banknotes and dressed in money bags. Under the multicolored picture are the following lines:

ILL-GOTTEN RICHES.
Though you try to put on a "Four Hundred" air,
And dress in such style that we all have to stare;
Your last bottom dollar you safely may bet,
That you'll ne'er into decent society get;
For there's none that don't know that your Daddy's big pile
Was gathered by methods despicably vile.

That you'll ne'er into decent society get;

The other sham valentine shows an ostentatiously dressed Jew with a cigar pressed between his thick, protrusive lips. The lines under this pictures are:

WE OUGHT TO GET RID OF YOU.
You're a dirty, sheeny loafer,
Disgusting to the sight,
And to the country you inhabit
You are nothing but a plight.
You and your kind should loaded be
On scows, you pack of knaves,
And taken out to sea and dumped
Like garbage in the waves.

One humorous postcard reproduced on page 19 shows a Jewsh girl attempting to use a telephone, but encountering difficulties described in the lines below the picture:

Tried to use the telephone.
Central said, "Can you stand closer?"
Irma shyly answered, "Nose'r."

The last line alludes to the length of her nose, which forces her mouth to be distant from the mouthpiece of the telephone.

One cartoon from Puck dated 1891 with an interesting, serious historical content shows a boastful, stout, ostentatiously dressed, bejeweled Jew standing on Broadway in New York. On either side of him are depicted the various rulers under whom laws have been decreed against Jews. The lands involved are Egypt, Italy Spain, France, Russia, Germany, and England. Czar Alexander III (reigned 1881-1894) is especially prominently displayed with a whip in his hands, while holding a tablet or sheet of paper inscribed, "ANTI-SEMITIC LAWS by order of the CZAR of Russia." Under the large cartoon is the caption, "THEY ARE THE PEOPLE/The downtrodden one.—They have always persecuted us: but we get there all the same!" Hardly any depiction of the hostility which Jews have nearly always engendered in their host populations could be more vivid. This one cartoon would seem to be an effective summation of much history of the Jews in the Diaspora.

The cartoons reproduced in the booklet are by no means from obscure periodicals. Puck is represented by 7 cartoons, Life by 4, and The Judge by 3. These magazines circulated widely and went into middle-class homes. The Aryan reader of today must groan at the change in the spirit of our times and mutter Cicero's famous exclamation, "O tempora! O mores!" In the first decade of our century Americans could still publish derisive materials on Jews and go unpunished. On the other hand, a German publisher of materials deriding Jews, Julius Streicher, was tried in Nuremberg as a war criminal and hanged by his Allied captors on the day of Purim, 1946.

In previous centuries, derisive pictorial representations of Jews and their rôle in society were often to be found on medals.

HEREDITARY TYPES.

Mister Cohn. Mrs. Cohn, née O'Rourke. Master Cohn.

A brief history of these is given in Bruno Kirschner, Deutsche Spottmedaillen auf Juden, Munich, 1968. (See my review of this book in The Numismatist of May, 1970.) A number of medals of the 17th and 18th cnturies referred to the rôle of Jews in the grain market, just as the cartoon reproduced on page 11 of the Appel booklet refers to the Jewish rôle in the American cotton market.

Today, a century or so after the original publication of the materials reproduced in the Appel booklet, Aryans of the United States are confronted with an accretion of Jewish power which overshadows their daily lives and poses a grave threat to their continued cultural and even biological identity. Aryans will remain basically defenseless against this array of power unless they arm themselves with a knowledge of how the Jewish presence has been dealt with in other times and by other nations. Access to one of the best sources of this knowledge can be obtained by a critical reading of materials published by Jews themselves. The Appel booklet is to be recommended for Aryans who are sincerely concerned about the Jewish presence and its effects in the United States. □

SEVEN FREETHINKING U.S. PRESIDENTS

by Allan Callahan

Since American Presidents now more and more seem to be admirers of Yahweh, it is refreshing to learn that most of our earliest Chief Executives had little use for the Jewish tribal god, or his "inspired word." We tend to think that Rationalist works were as scarce as hens' teeth in Colonial America, but apparently this is not so. Adams told Jefferson that he began to read them before he was twelve years old, which means that they were available in provincial Massachussetts as early as 1747 and that youthful boys could get access to them.

At a still earlier time, Benjamin Franklin tells us that he read the works of Shaftesbury and Collins when he was about fifteen, which means that the works of the English Deists were available at least by 1720. And while they may not have had much circulation among backwoodsmen, they were common enough among the intelligentsia, so that, by the time the Constitution was drafted, old Yahweh was not a particularly popular figure. In fact, a preacher of that era, a Reverend Dr. Wilson, said that "the proceedings, as published by Thompson, the secretary, show that the question was gravely debated in Congress whether God should be in the Constitution or not, and after solemn debate he was deliberately voted out of it."

Wilson further stated that:

"The men whose arguments swayed to vote God out of the Constitution, to declare that there should be no religious test, and that Congress should make no law to establish religion, were atheists in principle; that among all our Presidents from Washington downward (to 1831) not one was a professor of religion, at least not of more than Unitarianism; that among all the Governors of Pennsylvania and New York only two of the former and one of the latter were professors of religion."

The seven freethinking Presidents I shall discuss were not necessarily heretics in an overall sense, but were so in orthodoxy. The deity they believed in resembled a giant watchmaker who created the world and "wound it up," so that it has been running on by itself ever since. And most of them were circumspect about expressing themselves publicly on religious matters while in office with millions of orthodox eyes upon them. They could be more frank in private, and in their periods of retirement. Nevertheless, some of them were surprisingly bold, even while in office.

GEORGE WASHINGTON

It is common for highly placed freethinking public figures to put up a kind of front to appease the Faithful. Washington was understood to be a churchmember and attended services weekly. But he did not kneel in prayer and always left before the communion, even though his wife stayed. And many people have attended church without believing in the divinity of Jesus. As a military commander, Washington held religious services in camp, but this does not prove that he held orthodox views. It is not uncommon for some skeptics to feel that the best agency for keeping ordinary soldiers under control during wartime is the usual religious service.

The Writings of George Washington, in twelve volumes, are sprinkled with references to God, but are usually couched in Deistic, rather than Church, language.

Stories have grown up that, in private, Washington knelt morning and night for prayers. These had two sources. One was a pious nephew who claimed that he once saw his uncle kneeling in prayer, as a rather young man, and believed that he did it twice a day. Forty or fifty years later, an old gentleman believed that he once surprised Washington kneeling, and the whole legend of Washington's daily prayers came about.

At one time the clergy attempted to pin Washington down as to whether or not he was a Christian. In commenting on this incident, Jefferson wrote in his Diary on February 1st, 1799, that:

".....when the clergy addressed General Washington on his departure from the government, it was observed in their consultation that he never, on any occasion, said a word to the public which showed a belief in the Christian religion, and they thought they should so pen their address as to force him at length to declare publicly whether he was a Christian or not. They did so. However.....the old fox was too cunning for them. He answered every article of their address particularly except that, which he passed over without notice."

According to the religionists, when Washington was dying, he asked everyone to leave the room, so that he could spend his last hour alone with his maker. Then they give us the exact words of his prayers. But how could they do this, after every witness had left the room?

We can assume that, if Washington reverted to orthodox religious views on his deathbed, he would at least have sent for a clergyman, but this he did not do. We can also assume that, as is usual in such cases, his wife and any other religious relatives present would have asked his permission to send for one. If they did so, Washington forbade them.

JOHN ADAMS

Our second President had less theistic belief than even Voltaire or Thomas Paine. He retained some of the ethic of Christianity, but rejected its doctrines. His grandson and biographer was a devout Unitarian, and he believed that his grandfather's theological opinions were "very much in the mould adopted by the Unitarians of New England." On the other hand he admitted that Adams rejected the Trinity, the Atonement, and the divinity of Christ, so there was really precious little Christianity left in him. In Appleton's Cyclopaedia, Professor Fiske said that "Later in life he was sometimes called a Unitarian, but of dogmatic Christianity he seems to have had as little as Franklin or Jefferson."

As a young man Adams at first even studied for the ministry, but, said Fiske, "soon found himself too much of a freethinker to feel at home in the pulpit of that day." By his 21st year he was decidedly anti-clerical, and steadily developed what seems to have been almost the Agnosticism of Herbert Spencer.

After taking up the study of law he started to keep a diary, and here he freely expressed himself. On the second page he speaks of religion and says: "Thus mystery is made a convenient cover for absurdity." If he went to church and heard some particularly disturbing nonsense, he would come home and pen an attack upon it. Two days after writing the above, Adams was highly critical of bishops, and the day after that he jibed at "the influence of ignorant or wicked priests."

When writing for public consumption, Adams might speak of God, in Deistic terms, but when writing to a man like Jefferson, who was on his own level, the statements were somewhat different. For example, in a letter of January 22, 1825, he scoffed at the notion that the "Great Principle" which produced the universe could come "down to this little ball to be spit upon by Jews." (Works of John Adams, X, 414-15).

In the same letter he pretty well summed up his religious feelings when he said: "Incision-knives will never discover the distinction between matter and spirit or whether there is any or not. That there is an active principle of power in the universe is apparent, but in what substance this active principle resides is past our investigation."

THOMAS JEFFERSON

Our third President was not merely an Infidel Father, but the most scholarly of all our nation's leaders. He was even such a Materialist that he held to the notion that spirit is an impossibility and matter the only reality. He believed in a Creator, but, like the Stoics, felt that even God himself is material, in an ethereal form.

Jefferson denied the divinity of Jesus as flatly as Adams did, believing that his teachings were not only full of absurdities but probably spurious as well. He thought him a blameless enthusiast with delusions, believed Paul was an impostor, and felt that Athanasius and Calvin were enemies of the human race.

Jefferson once called the Book of Revelation "the ravings of a madman." About half of the distinguished Americans who corresponded with him seem to have been skeptics like himself, and when writing to them he could really "let down his hair," if he chose. But, like the two predecessors before him, whenever his words were meant for the public he was very careful; so much so that Christian scholars today can glean through his statements and make a case, of sorts, that Jefferson was a pious man.

Oscar Wilde said: "Man is least himself when he talks in his own person. Give him a mask and he will tell you the truth." Jefferson's private statements and letters to his trusted friends were, I think, his mask, reflecting his true feelings; while in his public words he was least himself.

JAMES MADISON

Madison grew up in a strict religious family, but not much of it seemed to have rubbed off on him. A pious tutor prepared him for Princeton, and he stayed an extra year, after graduation, to learn Hebrew and theology. He had a first class knowledge of religions and his family wanted him to enter the ministry, but he refused.

A chronicler of that era, R. D. Owen, talked with an Albany preacher named Wilson who had tried to draw Madison out on his religious beliefs. "He inquired himself," said Owen, "of Madison what were his opinions on religion, and Madison evaded any expression whatever of his religious faith." Wilson said from his pulpit that all the Presidents up to Jackson were Deists.

Like the three who preceded him, Madison could have sprinkled his addresses and letters with a few "God Almightys" to keep up appearances, but he disdained to do so. He was a little more anti-clerical than the others, while still cautious enough to avoid any open discussion of underlying religious precepts.

His private correspondence seldom mentioned religion. However, in a letter to Edward Everett on March 19, 1823, Madison urged him to oppose all theological encroachments in education, so that their university would not become "an Arena of Theological Gladiators."

In the History of the Life and Times of James Madison, (2 vols., 1859), biographer W. C. Rives relates how Madison was able to keep down the influence of the clergy in the Virginia Declaration of Rights. And there was one instance where a clause referring to "God and Nature" was struck out, which appears to have been Madison's work.

JAMES MONROE

There is little concrete evidence of Monroe's religious opinions, but not much room for reasonable doubt. Like his four predecessors, he died without prayer or religious ministrations. John Quincy Adams gave the obituary oration, and in it refrained from using any of the religious expletives with which he was otherwise quite liberal.

Monroe was extremely friendly with that outcast of the Church, Thomas Paine, and it was while living in Monroe's house that Paine wrote the second part of his Age of Reason. He lived there for a year and a half. As the new minister at Paris, Monroe had rescued Paine from prison in France during the French Revolution. Here the latter had had a near brush with death; only by a fluke was he not guillotined. Not only did Monroe step in to save the best known American heretic of that era (no doubt many Christians wished Paine dead and in hell), but he was also very cordial with the Deistic and Atheistic leaders of the Revolution; so much so that his government felt he was compromising America and recalled him.

A biography (Life of James Monroe, 1921) by George Morgan is significantly silent about Monroe's religion, but it is probably pretty well summed up by a New York clerical informant of that period, who said that he "had always thought Monroe an easy sort of infidel."

ABRAHAM LINCOLN

Although John Quincy Adams was a freethinker also, denying the divinity of Christ, I will pass over him to a President who is of much more interest.

There is probably more dispute about Lincoln's religion than there is about the religion of any other President. In W. M. Stephenson's biography, Lincoln (1924), the author makes a very careful study of it and could come up with nothing that could really lay the matter to rest. Probably his most significant finding was that Lincoln's close friend and law partner, W. H. Herndon, was himself an Agnostic and said that Lincoln belonged to the same "noble army of doubters."

The most substantial work on the orthodox side is H. B. Rankin's Personal Recollections of Abraham Lincoln (1916). As for Lincoln's religious beliefs (Ch. XIV), it seems that Rankin had very little in the way of personal recollections at all, and what little he did have was flatly contradicted by others. He was a naive man, apparently considering it proof enough that Lincoln was a Christian because he went to church!

Rankin brought forth a few witnesses, but their testimony is not very convincing. For instance, a man named Irwin said that Lincoln was certainly a Christian, but "although I was personally acquainted with him for twenty-five years, and often in his office, I never heard him say a word on Christianity and religious belief."

Another witness, Menter Graham, said that Lincoln let him read a pro-Christian essay he had written in 1833, and to show how Christian it was, Graham stated that it rejected the doctrine of hell!

The other witnesses are no more impressive.

Lincoln was very cautious in his public statements on religion—as befitted a politician needing Christian votes—and very polite, but how much faith, if any, did he really have? His own wife said herself in 1866 that, although she felt he was a religious man by nature, he "had no faith" and "was never a technical Christian."

In 1846, while running for office against a preacher named Cartwright, the cry of "infidelity" was raised against Lincoln. He was asked to say whether or not he was a Christian, but refused.

In the course of a debate, as a young man, Lincoln said that, if we take the gospels literally, Jesus was "a bastard." The "Great Emancipator" attended church, but never joined one, saying he could subscribe to no creeds. Also, in his younger years, three or four men (quoted by Herndon) who knew him well specifically testified that he denied the divinity of Christ.

Lincoln seems to have been a little more of a heretic in his earlier years than he was later in life, but he never basicly altered his views. Colonel W. H. Lamon, who knew him intimately, stated that "He was not a Christian." (Recollections of Abraham Lincoln, 1911 ed., p. 335). Lincoln emphatically denied the Atonement. It might be said that he believed in the ethic of Christianity but not its dogmas.

ULYSSES S. GRANT

Our eighteenth President did not try very hard to cover up his skepticism, so there is less controversy about his religious position. Hamlin Garland, his principal biographer, says flatly that Grant "subscribed to no creed." (U.S. Grant: His Life and Character, 1898, p. 522). The Reverend M. J. Cramer tried vainly to get from him some explicit avowal of faith, and was reduced to weakly concluding that Grant "believed the fundamental doctrines of the Christian religion." Another Christian spokesman, however, biographer E. D. Mansfield, made no attempt to refute the charge of skepticism.

Quite a bit has been made of Grant's drinking as a military man, but General Halleck said that he was remarkably sober for "a man who is not a religious man." About the most the orthodox can claim is that Grant was baptized on his deathbed; but even this is meaningless in his case, because it was done while he was unconscious! When he later rallied for a time and learned of the deed, he declared his surprise that such a thing was done. □

ABOUT THE AUTHOR: Dr. Revilo Pendleton Oliver, Professor of the Classics at the University of Illinois for 32 years, is a scholar of international distinction who has written articles in four languages for the most prestigious academic publications in the United States and Europe.

During World War II, Dr. Oliver was Director of Research in a highly secret agency of the War Department, and was cited for outstanding service to his country.

One of the very few academicians who has been outspoken in his opposition to the progressive defacement of our civilization, Dr. Oliver has long insisted that the fate of his countrymen hangs on their willingness to subordinate their doctrinal differences to the tough but idealistic solidarity which is the prerequisite of a Majority resurgence.

SOME QUOTABLE QUOTES FROM AMERICA'S DECLINE

On the 18th Amendment (Prohibition): "Very few Americans were sufficiently sane to perceive that they had repudiated the American conception of government and had replaced it with the legal principle of the 'dictatorship of the proletariat,' which was the theoretical justification of the Jews' revolution in Russia."

The editor-publisher of Liberty Bell does not necessarily agree with each and every article in this magazine, nor does he subscribe to all conclusions arrived at by various writers; however, he does endeavor to permit the exposure of ideas suppressed by the controlled news media of this country.

It is, therefore, in the best tradition of America and of free men everywhere that Liberty Bell strives to give free reign to ideas, for ultimately it is ideas which rule the world and determine both the content and structure of culture.

We believe that we can and will change our society for the better. We declare our long-held view that no institution or government created by men, for men, is inviolable, incorruptible, and not subject to evolution, change or replacement by the will of the people.

To this we dedicate our lives and our work. No effort will be spared and no idea will be allowed to go unexpressed if we think it will benefit the Thinking People, not only of America, but the entire world.

ACADEMIC PROSTITUTION

Many readers of Professor Arthur Butz's incisive demolition of the Jews' filthy Holohoax have asked the question that the author himself asked: "Why was it necessary for a Professor of Electrical Engineering to do the work that should have been done by professional historians?" In a country which has, in almost every town and in many villages, one or more colleges or universities, each of which is adorned with a crew of Professors of History, did no one of these thousands of learned professionals have a sufficient respect for historical truth to investigate and expose the arrant hoax, called the "Holocaust," that Jews use to extort billions of dollars from Germany, the United States, Britain, and almost every nation of the White world? Why did all of the thousands of Professors of History, many of whom professionally concern themselves with modern history, disgrace themselves by countenancing, and many make themselves infamous by endorsing, a Big Lie that was in itself patently preposterous by all the laws of historical criticism?

The question is not one that it is easy to answer and explain to persons who have no intimate experience of the academic world. (Persons who have such experience need no explanation.) The answer would require a long and detailed discussion, and it would require, first of all, a refutation of the prevalent notion that the prostitution of Clio, the Muse of History, is something the Jews inaugurated in 1945.

The essentials of an answer can now be found in a small book by the late Joseph McCabe, which has been reprinted by the Atheist Press in Austin, Texas, unfortunately with many typographical errors, most of which appear to have been systematized by a computer.

This book's title, History's Greatest Liars, suggests that it is an essay on the Fathers of the Church, whose assiduity in the pious work of Lying for the Lord certainly entitles them to a championship. Those sleazy shysters are mentioned, of course, but the author's principal subject is what he calls the "new history," which became endemic in the academic world after 1914 and the great deluge of official lies that were manufactured by experts to help the corrupt governments of Britain and the United States herd their subjects into the suicidal war of 1914-1918. It is, I think, only reasonable to assume that such things as the work of Woodrow Wilson's disgusting Creel Committee, which found it easy to hire American professors to lie about Germany for a few dollars, was demoralizing to a whole generation of young historians who had no fixed ethical principles.

Joseph McCabe examines critically books, many of them textbooks, that were generally accepted as "authoritative" and lavishly praised by other academic historians in the 1930s and 1940s. They are the work of about a dozen professional historians (including Franklin Roosevelt's lackey, Professor Langer of Harvard, on whom see Liberty Bell, September 1981, pp. 3 ff.). All of them are shown to be brazen liars in their "scholarly" studies of the Dark Ages, the Middle Ages, the Renaissance, and early Baroque, i.e., the history of Western civilization from the Fall of the Roman Empire to about the end of the Sixteenth Century, where McCabe ended his analysis, although we may be sure that the professional liars did not suddenly come to esteem truth when they dealt with the Seventeenth and later Centuries.

This systematic lying was, of course, a swindle, first, because the authors accepted salaries and subventions given them on the supposition they were engaged in establishing historical truth, and, second, because the purchasers of their books were led to believe they were buying volumes that were trustworthy history. The authors not infrequently simply wrote falsehoods to deny facts that had been long established by honest historical research, but their most common technique was that of making sweeping generalizations that denied the facts by implication, rather than specifically.

The swindles were carried out under the guise of "social history," i.e., consideration of the cultural, economic, and ethnic factors that were the underlying cause of many of the events of history and at least a background to most of them. This is a legitimate branch of history, but, I need not say, one readily and, in our time, usually contaminated by the Marxian superstition, one of the Jews' principal weapons in their offensive against our civilization and race. This taint, more or less artfully dissimulated, appears in the works that McCabe criticizes, but he limits himself to the scholarly prostitutes' lies on behalf of the religion that the Jews exported to the goyim, Christianity.

Although the facts are available in published sources, and many of them were stated in histories written by great and honest historians from Gibbon through the Nineteenth Century, the professorial practitioners of deceit exert themselves to muddy the water, obfuscate the record, and cover up, by sophistries and denials, the corruption and disasters by which the Christian superstition afflicted the whole of our civilization ever since it became epidemic. It is no apology for that mind-befuddling bane of our race that other prevalent superstitions, chiefly among other races, have been deleterious to their victims. It is an incontrovertible fact that Christianity, not in its verbiage, much of which its votaries simply ignore, but in its practice by the dervishes and witch-doctors who carried on the deceptions of the Fathers of the Church, was, in its effects, a moral decline from what those Fathers, by a typical verbal imposture, called "paganism," including both the established religions of the Graeco-Roman world and the cults of the Norse gods that prevailed among our own ancestors before they invaded the Roman Empire and were overawed by the very ruins that had survived the Christians.

Given the period that McCabe covers in his critique, most of the falsification with which the pseudo-historians try to whitewash Christianity deals with the Roman Catholic Church, which tried to maintain a monopoly of the lucrative racket. The falsifiers suppress the shocking record of virtually all of the popes and the clergy, many of whom were really thugs, and of the monastic orders, which were generally dens of male sexual perversion and female perversion and prostitution, all sicklied o'er with nauseating hypocrisy. Some of the reputed (not reputable) historians actually repeat such notorious fabrications as the lie about the humiliation of the Emperor Henry IV at Canossa, told in a priestly forgery, which serves Wilhelm Kammeier as a point of departure in Die Fälschung der deutschen Geschichte (Leipzig, 1935; reprinted, Husum, 1979; an English translation has been made and awaits a publisher). Since the writers of these historical falsifications appear to be authorities because they are not denounced by their influential colleagues in the universities, that foolish tale is reported as fact in, e.g., the very useful Columbia Encyclopedia, whence it has doubtless passed into innumerable references by honest writers who mention the supposed event at Canossa in passing and who have innocently relied on what is generally an accurate work of reference.

For cardinal points in the falsification of the history of the Catholic Church, see McCabe's book. He barely touches on another grandiose imposture by pseudo-historians fashionable today, their flagrant misrepresentation of the facts of the Renaissance and Humanism, about which one could write at great length. The purpose of that falsification was well stated by H. W. Eppelsheimer in his essay, *Das Renaissance-Problem. He describes the work of Thode, Neumann, Burdach, and other supposed "authorities" as a Neoromantic reaction against a rationalistic historiography, a sophistical attempt to Christianize and irrationalize the facts, and thus exalt religion and mysticism above common sense and reason itself.

The pseudo-historians whom McCabe mentions, and their many successors active today, cannot be acquitted on the ground of ignorance; they obviously esteem intellectual integrity less than the favor of the professional salvation-mongers and the profit to be made from writing that conforms to the intensive effort now being made in all domains of science and scholarship to destroy reliance on reason and objective facts and to enslave the human mind to debasing superstitions. A very few of those "scholars" may, perhaps, have been influenced by the now disproven and obsolete notion that Christianity could be used to promote the stability of a civilized society after scientific research and historical scholarship have proved, beyond peradventure of doubt, that the creed is, at every point, a denial of ascertained facts.

My point here is only that the disgraceful conduct of our academic historians long antedates the Jews' Holohoax, which imposed no strain on the morality of "scholars" long accustomed to use as their criterion of historical truth the inquiry, "Is there a buck in it for us, Charlie?"

I must note, however, a nice irony which proves how much

* Deutsche Vierteljahresschrift fuer Literaturwissenschaft und Geistesgeschichte, XI (1933), pp. 477 ff. If Eppelsheimer was a Jew, as his name suggests, he was certainly right on this point. Not all German names that now sound Jewish were taken by Jews. I once knew a man who complained, "I cannot go around saying, Yes, my name is Bernstein, but I hate the God-damned Kikes." He was obviously an Aryan, and did not know how his ancestors came to be associated with amber.

we all are at the mercy of organized lying. Mr. McCabe, who died in 1955, seems to have finished the present work around 1945. (It was first published in England, but I have not been able to ascertain the date; internal evidence shows only that it was after 1944). And so, despite his own critical faculties, he was taken in by the unanimity of the Jews' hired liars and referred, in passing, to Adolf Hitler as a "homicidal maniac and sadist," although even then he was fair enough to add that the supposed conduct occurred during a prolonged and bitter war. McCabe was commenting on an intellectual whore's attempt to palliate the massacre on St. Bartholomew's day, 1572, which, of course, was carried out by the foulest treachery in a time of peace, and was, to be sure, only a normal exercise of the normal Christian urge to enforce righteousness.

DOUBLE-THINK

I do not know how many millions of pious Christians make pilgrimage to the Vatican, where God's Vicar presides over the world's largest chain of salvation-shops. When I was there some years ago, I was told that when one deducted from the total number of annual visitors tourists, who come to look, scholars, who are intent on research, artists, who admire masterpieces, and clergy, who have business with their home office, the remainder of about ten million must represent the number of Faithful who come to refresh their souls in the holiness of the site.

If that estimate was correct, the Vatican is rivaled in popularity by the shrine of The Most Holy Virgin Mary, Our Lady of Guadalupe, Queen of Mexico and Empress of the Americas, which is located in Guadalupe Hidalgo, just north of Mexico City in the Federal District. To that shrine an estimated ten million make pilgrimage every year, so that, if one measures by numbers rather than quality, Guadalupe equals the Vatican in its magnetic attraction for pious souls. And Guadalupe is highly charged with a numinous energy that the Vatican does not have. The Pope does not perform miracles, and, so far as I have heard, no one has been cured of even a toothache by kissing his toe, whereas at Guadalupe the Virgin is busy healing the afflicted (if they are pious enough) of all the ills flesh is heir to. The walls of part of the basilica are covered with ex-votos which, like the numerous figurines and sculptured reliefs, attest the gratitude of pilgrims who have been healed of every malady known to medical science or preserved from perils at sea. I suspect that Mary works as hard at Guadalupe as she does at Lourdes.

The basilica of Empress Mary is a large and impressive structure, built on the summit of a hill at a place that was named Guadalupe after Guadalupe in the Spanish Estremadura, where Mary has a similar shrine, although it does little business these days. It may be that when Mary made her miraculous appearance at the Spanish Guadalupe she was only rehearsing for her performance in Mexico.

In Mexico, Mary showed a great deal of energy in 1810, when she inspired a hot-headed priest, Miguel Hidalgo y Costilla, to utter his famous Grito de dolores and start a revolution against Spain in the interests of the Indians, using the picture of Mary as his revolutionary banner, doubtless with her permission, since he was a pious man, although his brain had been overheated by reading the vapid rhetoric of the scoundrels who carried out the French Revolution. Mary, for some reason (who can tell what women will do?), didn't save her champion from being defeated in battle and shot, but the revolution her votary started was a fire that could not be extinguished by the Spanish government of Mexico, which had been cut off from the mother country by Napoleon's invasion of Spain. The revolution, started by Hidalgo on behalf of the aborigines, was joined by creoles who didn't know what was good for them, and after a jolly free-for-all in which revolutionists revolted against victorious revolutionists, the bully boy who came out on top for a while was a man named Miguel Fernández, who became the first President of Mexico and changed his name to Guadalupe Victoria, which he intended to mean "Triumph of the Virgin of Guadalupe." And the name of the site of Mary's shrine was augmented by addition of the revolutionary priest's name, so the place is now called Guadalupe Hidalgo.

Mary, who so miraculously retained her virginity after giving birth to a series of sons, including a detached part of old Yahweh himself, is virtually a goddess, but she evidently retains, together with her hymenal membrane, her maidenly shyness, for she appears on earth only to solitary peasants, male or female, when she comes upon them in lonely places and can be sure no educated person is watching. That, at least, is what the stories say, and the tale told at her shrine in Mexico is that she appeared to a poor Indian, trudging homeward, and charged him with a message for the Bishop of Mexico, whom she was evidently too modest to meet in person.

All this is guaranteed by a portrait of herself which she miraculously, and even without using her divine hands, imprinted with celestial pigments on a white cloth in which the Indian was carrying flowers. This miraculous product of Mary's quite mediocre artistic talent is preserved under glass in a conspicuous place in her basilica, and at any hour of the day you may see women by the dozen, most of them mestizas, with a few Indians and occasionally a White woman, flopping on their knees in adoration of an icon so sacred they scarcely dare look at it for more than an instant.

In her self-portrait, as in most of the Madonnas painted by European artists, Mary has distinctly European features, which certainly are not Semitic, so that raises some very interesting racial questions that I shall not try to explore. She may be a pretty Italian woman, although I must add that when I saw her self-portrait, it seemed that her hood had not protected her from sunburn in Mexico, for I am sure that heavenly pigments do not change color with age, as do some prepared on earth.

I mention all this because some men who have received training as technicians and call themselves "scientists," having made asses of themselves while proving "scientifically" the "authenticity" of the famous Shroud of Turin, lusted for further exercise of their pseudo-scientific imaginations, and undertook to prove that the painting at Guadalupe could not have been made by human hands and must therefore represent the Virgin's venture into the mimetic arts.

It is an ominous and dismaying sign of our times that their shenanigans did not merely evoke laughter or contemptuous shrugs. The editors of the Skeptical Inquirer thought it necessary to send Joe Nickell and John F. Fischer to investigate the preposterous claim. Their report occupies pp. 243-255 in the issue for Spring 1985.

The two gentlemen begin with a brief summary of the facts concerning the foundation of the shrine at Guadalupe. That should have been sufficient in itself and made the rest of their work as frivolous as bringing in a five-ton derrick to pick up a pencil.

The shrine of the Virgin Mary replaced a temple of the Virgin Tonantzin, an Aztec godess,[1] on the same site. That fact alone

1. I cannot state offhand the precise position of Tonantzin in the Aztec gives away the whole fraud.

In the ancient world, when the Roman Empire became so decadent that mobs of Christians could come out of the slums, incited by their howling dervishes, and begin looting and pillaging to appease their righteous lust for destruction, they invariably attacked and destroyed the temples of the "pagan" gods, most of which were architectural masterpieces and housed the finest sculpture in the world. The Christians had, of course, assimilated much of the Jews' innate hatred of visual beauty and their lust to defile and abolish it, but the sleazy Fathers of the Church, who directed the rioters, were carrying out a clever plan. By violating the temple, they impaired the prestige of the deity to whom it was sacred, but they also expropriated the magic sanctity of the site for their own cult, and so, as soon as the temple had been leveled to the ground, they installed over its ruins a church dedicated to their god or his mamma or one of the commonly mythical spirits they called saints and equipped with legends, often making the new numen as similar to the old one as they plausibly could.

Aztec "art" is grotesque and barbarous, so hatred of beauty was not a factor in Mexico, but the Christian conquerors destroyed all the teocalli to prove that their god packed a stronger punch, and, in keeping with Christian methods, put up pantheon, except that obviously she was one of the Centeotl, the group of gods who presided over maize, the only corn that was cultivated by the Indians of Mexico. The Aztec religion was as confused as the Christian, and while the Indians never imagined anything as absurd as the Christians' three-in-one god, their gods, like Hindu deities, had 'aspects,' many of which were probably the result of theocrasy as one tribe fused with or subjugated another. For example, the best-known Aztec deity (with the possible exception of Quetzalcoatl, who was an alien god and never really naturalized among the Aztecs) was Tezcatlipoca, who was also worshipped as Nezahualpilli, Yaotzin, Telpochtli, Yoalli Ehecatl, Moneneque, et al., and it is difficult to determine whether the worshippers thought they were paying tribute to an 'aspect' of Tezcatlipoca under another name or thought of the 'aspect' as a separate supernatural personality. The corn-gods are a particularly confusing part of the pantheon, for Centeotl is simultaneously (a) a goddess, identified with Teteoinnan, the "Mother of the Gods," (b) her son, the male maize-spirit, and (c) the whole group of gods concerned with agriculture, of whom the chief was said to be Chicomeconhuatl, the serpent goddess who fertilizes cultivated plants. The Virgin, Tonantzin, was probably identified with Xilonen, the goddess who produces the xilote of growing maize, but I did not think it necessary to investigate her cult for the purpose of this note. She may have shared with Mary more attributes than virginity.

churches in their place and, where possible, tried to assimilate their deity to the one he or she replaced and thus appropriate the sanctity of the place. Poor Tonantzin was an easy victim of this Christian trick, and, as a matter of fact, when Mary had been installed at Guadalupe, many of the Indians continued to call her Tonantzin, the Virgin of Guadalupe.

This standard Christian diddle is in itself sufficient to show that the whole myth about the apparition of Mary on the hill was a consciously contrived fraud, but the circumstantial evidence cited in the article makes it certain that, in all probability, the contriver of the hoax was the Bishop of Mexico, Juan de Zumárraga, who, in the tale he used to "authenticate" the miracle, cleverly described himself as having been sceptical of the fictitious Indian's story until Mary surreptitiously put her portrait on cloth in which the Indian had wrapped some flowers.

Zumárraga's hoax, although perpetrated by a standard Christian technique, was a brilliant success, for it is reported that in the seven years after he manufactured the miracle, eight million ignorant Indians were sprinkled with holy water and enrolled as permanent customers for such magic as christenings, weddings, funerals, periodic cancellations of their sins, and the other impalpable and invisible wares of his salvation-shops. And, no doubt, Mary Tonantzin soon began to grind out miraculous cures to increase the emoluments of her new establishment in Mexico, where she helped Zumárraga "champion" the natives to gain influence over them and extort concessions from the Spanish government of the province.

As for the painting, which, if Mary's work, would prove that she has no artistic talent, the authors of the article found two contemporary sources, both of them Franciscan holy men, who, testifying in 1556, identified the painter whom Zumárraga persuaded or hired to make the crude painting, probably by copying as best he could a copy of a painting of Mary by Bonanat Zaortiza, a mediocre Spanish painter, who died some thirty years before the Spanish reached Mexico.[2] As for the man who produced Zumárraga's icon, he was Marcos Cipac, an Aztec who had been taught to paint in the European manner.

2. The authors report (p. 248) that one of the savants who argue that painting at Guadalupe is 'acheiropoietos,' i.e., could not have been made by human hands, actually implies that Zaortiza, whose painting is now in an art gallery in Barcelona, imitated the picture that the Virgin was going to imprint miraculously on the Indian's cloth in Mexico about eighty or eighty-five years later! That's what piety does to the brain.

(Incidentally, natives who were trained to supply the local market for religious "art" were trained by being taught to copy pious pictures by Spanish painters.)

The authors proceed to a detailed study of the painting at Guadalupe, just as though there could be the slightest doubt that it is a typical Christian hoax and not worth another five minutes of their time.

I am certain that our botanists have thus far failed to embark on a systematic study of cowslips (Primula veris) with infra-red cameras to see whether they can obtain a photograph of Ariel, who is on record as having declared, "Where the bee sucks, there suck I, / In a cowslip's bell I lie," e.q.s. That is because the Christian hokum-peddlers do not read Shakespeare, preferring more vulgar fictions.

The article on Guadalupe caught my attention because it reminded me of an incident that I have always remembered as a perfect illustration of Christian thinking.

When I was in Mexico about thirty years ago, I took a friend to see the basilica of Empress Mary at Guadalupe. At the foot of the hill there is an area in which one parks his automobile and hires a Mexican youth to protect it from sabotage by his fellows. A minor incident made us acquainted with a well-bred and elegantly dressed Hispanic lady (i.e., one of pure Spanish descent, not to be confused with the mongrels now pouring in from Mexico, who are called 'Hispanic' by the professional liars of the Jewspapers). She had come from Guadalajara, the most civilized city in Mexico, to solicit a favor from the Virgin Mary on behalf of a near relation, her brother-in-law, as I recall, who was ill.

The lady was well-educated, intelligent, and gracious to Spanish-speaking foreigners who had rendered her a very slight service. She told us that the Virgin Mary, whose basilica was on the hilltop, was indeed the very same Virgin Mary who was worshipped in Guadalajara and to whom there were dedicated chapels in several churches of that city as well as in the cathedral, in which there is a well-known painting of Mary by the famous Spanish artist, Murillo, to which many votaries pay a special devotion. Why, then, we asked, had she come almost four hundred miles to ask of Mary at Guadalupe a favor she could more conveniently have asked of the Virgin back home?

No, said the lady in all sincerity, she had to come, because the Virgin of Guadalupe could do things that the Virgin in Guadalajara couldn't or wouldn't do. It was the same Mary, she admitted again, but in Guadalupe she miraculously differed from what she was elsewhere, and that was why one had to come to Guadalupe Hidalgo to persuade her to fix up an ailing brother-in-law.

Now the lady was, as I have said, intelligent and well-educated. She had read widely in Spanish literature and had read some French writers, and she had a general acquaintance with Western culture. Obviously, however, she had to believe there was only one Mary, Mother of God, because that was what the priest told her, but in her heart she retained, perhaps without quite knowing she did, the more ancient and, in some ways, more reasonable belief that a god resided in a specific place.

In Gaul, in pre-Roman times and Roman times, there was a goddess, Sequana, who was, as the great number of ex-votos found in the excavation of her shrine proved, every bit as efficient in producing miraculous cures as Mary has been either at Lourdes or Guadalupe. Now that great goddess obviously resided in her shrine on the banks of the river over which she presided and to which she gave her name (the modern Seine), and if one wanted to consult her, it was obviously necessary to call on her in her home. You couldn't expect her to come to see you. The principle is recognized in Christian belief. If, for example, you want the sainted Thomas à Becket to do something for you, you've got to go to Canterbury, where his ghost hovers over his bones. That's what Chaucer's pilgrims did, and that is only reasonable. We have to localize phenomena to understand them. As a sensible child was heard to tell her parent, "But, Mother, God can't be everywhere: he's got to be somewhere."

The lady obviously believed, at one and the same time, that there was only one Virgin and also that there were at least two. That is characteristic of Christian thinking.

I am sure that some Christians must read their Bible—I mean the whole thing, not just snippets recommended as particularly good pap. There is an anonymous compilation of 133 points on which what is said in one or several parts of the story book is flatly contradicted by what is said in other passages.[3] It is

3. The compilation deals with statements of fact in the holy book and is probably incomplete. It does not even mention such silliness as the habit of Christians to become maudlin about a "Prince of Peace," who is the simply impossible for both statements on a given point to be true. A given number is either more than zero or less than zero: it can't be both. And no amount of gabble by theologians can make antithetical statements agree. Since we must assume that some Christians read their corpus of tales while awake, and are able to remember what they have read, we must conclude that the Christians are able to believe both of two contradictory statements. When minds become addled with superstitious awe, they can do strange things.

Orwell described 'double-think' as one of the devices that will be used in the society that the "Liberals" and Jews are determined to impose on us in the near future, even though they didn't quite get it in operation by 1984. But he was mistaken in thinking that there would be something novel about 'double-think': it's simply an old and inveterate Christian habit.

GOD'S DARLINGS AT WORK

A despatch from the United Press, published in many newspapers (e.g., the Chicago Sun-Times) on 19 March 1985, reported an article by Professor B. J. Bernstein in Technology Review, according to which two Jews, whom the unspeakable Roosevelt had put in charge of the development of the atomic bomb, planned in 1943 to murder the population of Germany by poisoning German food with strontium. The godly project, which was delayed by the technical difficulty of making sure that millions of Aryans died simultaneously at the first poisoning, seems to have been abandoned for that reason. It was, of course, in keeping with the Yiddish idealism of Theodore Kaufman's famous plan to exterminate the German people. (See his Germany Must Perish! of which a reprint is available from Liberty Bell, $3.00 plus postage.)

The Jews have boasted (see the Toronto Daily Star, 9 March 1968) that Jews working in the bakeshops in Germany killed more than a thousand officers of the SS by surreptitiously poisoning their bread with arsenic.

In the Middle Ages, Jews were often accused of poisoning the wells, especially in Germany, but everyone knows that God's innocent darlings would never do anything wrong, so the reports must be false and just another proof of the wickedness that makes the inhabitants of every country infested by Jews hate those righteous beings. Or does the wickedness lie in thinking that it is wrong to poison goyim?

Farmers in South Africa try to poison the baboons. So why should not the Master Race, to whom old Yahweh by the famous b'rith deeded the whole universe, poison Aryans? The cattle, though stupid, are an unsatisfactory species and, as happened in Germany and could happen wherever there are herds of them, sometimes become so bigoted as to imagine that they do not belong to the herdsmen to whom Yahweh gave them. It's time to replace them with a more reliably docile breed, and why should it matter how they are eliminated?

Vous l'avez voulu, George Dandin

The protagonist of Molière's comedy never blames others for the misery of his life since he married the girl whom he courted. He constantly reminds himself, "this is what you wanted, George; you have only yourself to blame." He was an Aryan, though perhaps more intellectually honest than most, and Americans today can reread Molière with profit.

Readers of Liberty Bell have often been reminded of the ever-growing industrial and technological superiority of Japan and the Asiatic nations under her influence. There was the London Correspondent's "Fimbulvetr" in January 1983, my own article in June, now available as a booklet, "The Yellow Peril," and in April of the following year a "Postscript" in which I reported an American businessman's succinct opinion

Jesus who demanded that persons who did not obey him be slain before his eyes so that he could enjoy watching them suffer. And they gabble about that Jesus's "love of all mankind," although he specifically equated them and all members of other races to dogs, whose greatest privilege is to eat the table scraps thrown them by members of the Master Race. And there are wealthy men, such as the late H. L. Hunt, who subsidize dervishes and their churches, although they have been explicitly and authoritatively assured that all rich men will be fried forever and forever after they die. Dr. Hugh J. Schonfield limited his book, Those Incredible Christians, to the early agitators, but he could have applied the adjective to the entire history of the Jewish cult for goyim. Edgar Rice Burroughs peoples Mars with all sorts of bizarre variations of humanity, but had he described beings with the Christians' capacity for 'double-think,' his readers would have thought he had let his imagination carry him to absurdity.

of the Japanese: "Damn it all! They are a superior people."

On 10 May of this year the Wall Street Journal reported that four Japanese corporations have built factories in Battle Creek, Michigan, and that the American peasants are delighted. "If they are willing to invest and give American people jobs," one of the natives said, "I'm all for it." And the hopeful fellahin of Battle Creek are trying to induce other corporations of the great industrial nation to relieve American poverty in that town rather than another.

The item in the Journal was quite optimistic. The Japanese already have the majority interest in, and hence control of, 522 factories in the United States, and are certain to extend their beneficence rapidly. This does not take into account their ever increasing ownership of prime farm land and of the corporations that purchase and market the grain and other products of our remaining farms. This ownership will, no doubt, increase greatly as American farmers have their usurious mortgages foreclosed and sheriffs throw them off the property they once thought they owned.[1] This will be a great advantage, since it will create jobs for the displaced persons as workers in the fields and tenders of the cattle.

One of the leading Jews' papers for goyim, the Washington Post, published on May Day an article by Nicholas Lemann to explain why American villeins cannot hope to emulate the Japanese. It's all because the Japanese are a race and know it, and that makes them nationalistic. That's horrible, of course,

1. Historians who may record the decline and fall of the American Republic should note that until 1971 the State of Illinois had a Constitution which forbade continued ownership of property within the state by persons who were not citizens of the United States. A legal friend of mine tried to persuade a number of state's attorneys to enforce the law, but they were all palsied by the impious suggestion. The same Constitution also forbade the levying of an income tax by the state, so the boobs were herded to the polls, ostensibly to enact a useless amendment that forbade an income tax, and the dumb brutes never noticed that that amendment also contained a provision that would make it simple to mobilize parasites to enact a new Constitution. The new one was approved by a plebiscite at the end of 1970, and now the people of Illinois enjoy the righteousness of an income tax that is used primarily to accelerate the breeding of niggers and crime in Chicago and in the smaller cities, as they become more progressive. It is slightly amusing that the Governor of Illinois recently spent more than a million dollars on a pilgrimage to Communist China to beg the lords of that great industrial nation to make investments in Illinois to relieve the poverty of his moujiks.

but we must remember that there is a well established scale of values that no one should be so impudent as to question. The solidarity of the Jewish race is, as everyone knows, proof that they are God's Own People and really entitled to own the whole globe. The niggers' race entitles them not only to have the White taxpayers work for them, but to mug and rape the peasants when they feel so inclined, while the daily liepapers run interference for them by never mentioning the marauders' privileged race. The mongrels who are pouring in from Mexico, the aboriginal Indians, the "refugees" we have imported from Vietnam,[2] and all the other ethnic groups that are taking our country from us have their indisputable racial rights. "Racism" is really vile and abominable only when it appears among the lowly Aryans, a species of feeble-minded and cringing mammals who, for the most part, humbly recognize their duty to serve their betters, the only justification for their existence on this overcrowded planet.

And that is precisely the explanation that is given by Lemann. It would not only be iniquitous and abominable for the Americans to try to emulate the Japanese and compete with them, but

2. It is officially admitted that we now have about three-quarters of a million dear "refugees," many of them veterans of the Viet-Cong, in the United States, and that we are importing reënforcements for them at the rate of 50,000 a year. They are now forming their own organizations to demand more of their "rights" over us. Some Americans are so bigoted that they complain about the abduction of their pet dogs and cats to make dainty dishes for our honored guests. The Scientific American for July 1985 lists some of the diseases our guests bring with them: 61% have intestinal parasites that can be communicated to the host population, and 14% have hepatitis in a severe form, and are therefore ideally suited for employment in American restaurants. (All Americans are not yet imbecile: in a small and essentially rural town in the Middle West, an enterprising woman opened a well-furnished new restaurant and, being a big-hearted do-gooder, staffed it with "refugees," and I hear that she went bankrupt without ever understanding why so very few persons were willing to eat her delicious meals.) The article in the Scientific American does not mention leprosy, which, I am told, is among the delights of internationalism we have imported from Vietnam, but it does mention that between 20% and 40% of the Vietnamese carry by heredity eventually fatal disorders of the blood, such as thalassemia and "haemoglobin E." There is also a high incidence of "psychiatric disorders," although this finding is subject to the reservation that most psychiatrists are too pudibund to perceive innate racial instincts and try to fit all anthropoids into their Procrustean beds. At all events, Americans who marry Vietnamese, as many have already done, are likely to have offspring that should please their Christian hearts.

they simply can't do it. Not any more. What Lemann, whose name sounds very much like Lehmann, tells us is what Professor Hacker told us years ago in a book I have so often cited, The End of the American Era: the United States is no longer a nation; it is just a geographical area inhabited by incompatible races and held together by the economic tie of their efforts to exploit one another.

There can, of course, be no sense of unity or common purpose in the various peoples thrown together in that area. Race cannot be here, as it is in Japan, a bond that unites. As Lemann tells us, "We [note the pronoun!] are too diverse racially and culturally to be able to make use of the easy route to a true feeling of community." But, he adds, stating the obvious, "We [i.e., this multi-racial mass] can't live without the feeling of community entirely .... So we need to find another route."

Well, one thing that united the geographical area was "the strong political consensus" that was shown in "the fight against Hitler," when the hordes of crazed cattle rushed to Europe to punish the Germans for disobedience to their God-given masters. But Lemann regretfully sees no chance for a similar blessing now.

So Lemann, perhaps with God-given wisdom, proposes a solution: "Horatio Alger-ism, the notion that one's station in life is determined solely by hard work, talent and luck, and not at all by the circumstances of birth. This, rather than nationalism, would be what binds us together. Its fairness would provoke a fierce allegiance to the whole country."

In the envisaged Utopia of unlimited competition, "Businesses would rise and fall. The successful would be a motley crew." But Lemann does not go on to explain the real beauty of his Utopia. Jews and Orientals—let's face it!—are willing to work much harder than Aryans. What is more, Aryans have that fatal weakness of inherited scruples, a tendency to fairness and kindness, from which it is unlikely they can recover, whereas all other races have a sense of ethics, such as it may be, limited to their own people. And you may be certain that the members of each superior race would cohere in their exploitation of the Aryan nitwits.

Now this does not mean that there would be no place for your children and grandchildren in a United States revitalized by Lemann's prescription. There will always be a need for males and females to black boots, sweep floors, and swab out the bowls of water-closets. Moreover, Aryan females will always be wanted in the brothels, especially the specialized ones in which females are readied for copulation by being preliminarily bloodied with riding whips to satisfy a common Oriental taste.[3] So there will always be a use for some Aryans in the United States of the future.

Americans have no right to complain. They had a country of their own once, but they wanted to throw it away. And they have done so. The real turning point came with the jihad against the South in 1861. As Douglas Reed observed in his Far and Wide (London, Jonathan Cape, 1951), "When that war [against the Confederacy] began, America was a country of homogeneous people, predominantly English, Scottish, Ulster-Irish, German, and Scandinavian in origins and recognizably 'American.'[4] In its aftermath, which opened the floodgates of immigration from Eastern Europe, this composition of the population was radically changed. Power passed, not to the Northern Americans of the old stock, but more and more into the hands of newcomers."

Well, Americans took pride in advertising, even in verses by an enemy alien inscribed on their Statue of Liberty, that they wanted their country to be a garbage-dump for all of the world's anthropoid refuse. They enjoyed wallowing in the garbage. Their nostrils relished the stench of their "melting pot." And now they have what they presumably wanted, the status of taxpaying beasts of burden in the territory that once was theirs. And if, perchance, they feel some compassion for the progeny they have doomed to be the fellahin of the North American continent, they have a remedy: to stop having children—although that would probably bring down punitive legislation from Washington. And anyway, they will have the reward they presumably sought: their little souls are so inflated by luff for everybody that they will float right up to Jesus, who will give them a pat on the head and an ice-cream cone. What could be nicer?

3. The reader may remember an incident that attracted a little attention in Washington some years ago. As you know, our State Department maintains a Whore Corps to entertain niggers from Africa, mud people from the compost-heaps of Asia, and other diplomatic envoys while they wait for the Treasury to bail up the loads of American currency they will take home. One girl from the Corps, perhaps a neophyte, panicked when a high dignitary from the Middle East got out his whips to make her more attractive, and she ran, nude, through the halls of Washington's most fashionable and expensive hotel. This occasioned a ripple of scandal, because conservative Americans thought that it was improper for girls to be nude in public. It is true that quite a few wealthy Americans, such, it is said, as the late President Kennedy, have become broad-minded and have acquired cosmopolitan tastes. In at least one of the exclusive establishments in Florida such broad-minded patrons are offered a great variety of whips and the like, some with jeweled handles, from which they make a selection before they go in to have fun with their well-paid nymph.

4. True, but Douglas Reed could have added that from colonial times onward there were Jewish colonies in the region that became the United States, and that although numerically small, these enclaves of the international race had great influence, commercially and financially. Beginning in the 1830s, they began to subsidize agitation to promote righteousness and a Holy War against the South. See Liberty Bell, November 1984, pp. 1 ff.

DOPPELGLAUBE

As everyone knows, a small band of dedicated members of the Shiah hijacked in Athens a large passenger plane and, as I write, are holding as hostages some forty citizens of the Jews' great colonial possession in North America. Our boob-tubes exhibited the chief pilot of the plane, John Testrake, as he sat under the guns of his captors. He, spontaneously or at the suggestion of the television crew, said, "The Lord has taken very good care of us. . . . He will see us through to the end."

Now, so far as one could tell from what was shown on the boob tubes, Mr. Testrake did not begin by saying, "The Lord has put us in a Hell of a fix by handing us over to all these armed fanatics, whom He put aboard our plane in Athens. There's just no telling what He will have these Shi'ites do with us good Christians now. And it was cute, the way He had them beat up that Navy man before they killed him and threw his corpse out of the plane. Good God! Doesn't He have funny ideas at times?

If Testrake meant what he was shown as saying, he gave us a neat example of the Christian talent for double-think. If he was just giving a half-minute plug for the spook-business, he must have counted on finding most of the viewers in a stupor when they heard his spiel. And so, it seems, he did. □

by
Friedrich Stieve

Germany's enemies maintain today that Adolf Hitler is the greatest disturber of peace known to history, that he threatens every nation with sudden attack and oppression, that he has created a terrible war machine in order to cause trouble and devastation all around him. At the same time they intentionally conceal an all-important fact: they themselves drove the Leader of the German people finally to draw the sword. They themselves compelled him to seek to obtain at last by the use of force that which he had been striving to gain by persuasion from the beginning: the security of his country. They did this not only by declaring war on him on 3 September 1939, but also by blocking step for step seven years the path to any peaceful discussion.

The attempts repeatedly made by Adolf Hitler to induce the governments of other states to collaborate with him in a reconstruction of Europe resemble an ever-recurring pattern in his conduct since the commencement of his labors for the German Reich. But these attempts were wrecked every time by reason of the fact that nowhere was there any willingness to give them due consideration, because the evil spirit of the Great War still prevailed everywhere, because in London and Paris and in the capitals of the Western Powers' vassal states there was only one fixed intention: to perpetuate the power of Versailles.

A rapid glance at the most important events will furnish incontrovertible proof of this statement.

When Adolf Hitler came to power, Germany was as gagged and as helpless as the victors of 1918 wanted her to be. Completely disarmed, with an army of only 100,000 men intended solely for police duties within the country, she found herself within a tightly closed ring of neighbors all armed to the teeth and leagued together. To the old enemies in the West, Britain, Belgium, and France, new ones were artificially created and added in the East and the South: above all Poland and Czechoslovakia. A quarter of the population of Germany were forcibly torn away from their mother country and handed over to foreign powers. The Reich, mutilated on all sides and robbed of every means of defense, at any moment could become the helpless victim of some rapacious neighbor.

Then it was that Adolf Hitler for the first time made his appeal to the common sense of the other powers. On 17 May 1933, a few months after his appointment to the office of Reichskanzler, he delivered a speech in the German Reichstag, from which we extract the following passages:

". . . Germany will be perfectly ready to disband her entire military establishment and destroy the small amount of arms remaining to her, if the neighboring countries will do the same thing with equal thoroughness.

". . . Germany is entirely ready to renounce aggressive weapons of every sort if the armed nations, on their part, will destroy their aggressive weapons within a specified period, and if their use is forbidden by an international convention.

". . .Germany is at all times prepared to renounce offensive weapons if the rest of the world does the same. Germany is prepared to agree to any solemn pact of non-aggression because she does not think of attacking anybody but only of acquiring security."

No answer was received. Without paying any heed, the others continued to fill their arsenals with weapons, to pile up their stores of explosives, to increase the numbers of their troops. At the same time, the League of Nations, the instrument of the victorious powers, declared that Germany must first pass through a period of "probation" before it would be possible to discuss with her the question of the disarmament of the other countries. On 14 October 1933, Hitler broke away from this League of Nations with which it was impossible to come to any agreement. Shortly afterwards, however, he came forward with a new proposal for the improvement of international relations. This proposal included the following six points:

1. Germany receives full equality of rights.
2. The fully armed States undertake amongst themselves not to increase their armaments beyond their present level.
3. Germany adheres to this agreement, freely undertaking to make only so much actual moderate use of the equality of rights granted to her as will not represent a threat to the security of any other European power.

4. All States recognize certain obligations in regard to conducting war on humane principles, or to the elimination of certain weapons for use against the civilian population.
5. All States accept a uniform general control which will watch over and ensure the observance of these obligations.
6. The European nations guarantee one another the unconditional maintenance of peace by the conclusion of non-aggression pacts, to be renewed after ten years.

Following upon this, a proposal was made to increase the strength of the German army to 300,000 men, corresponding to the strength required by Germany "having regard to the length of her frontiers and the size of the armies of her neighbors," in order to protect her threatened territory against attacks. The defender of the principle of peaceable agreement was thus trying to accommodate himself to the unwillingness of the others to disarm by expressing a desire for a limited increase of armaments for his own country. Any exchange of notes, starting from this and continuing for years, finally came to a sudden end with an unequivocal "no" from France. This "no," moreover, was accompanied by tremendous increases in the armed forces of France, Britain, and Russia.

In this way, Germany's position became still worse than before. The danger to the Reich was so great that Adolf Hitler felt himself compelled to act. On 16 March 1935 he reintroduced conscription. But in direct connection with this measure he once more announced an offer to agreements of an extensive nature, the purpose of which was to ensure that any future war would be conducted on humane principles, in fact, to make such a war practically impossible by eliminating destructive armaments. In his speech of 21 May 1935 he declared:

"The German Government is ready to take an active part in all efforts which may lead to a practical limitation of armaments. It regards a return to the former idea of the Geneva Red Cross Convention as the only possible way to achieve this. It believes that at first there will be only the possibility of a gradual abolition and outlawing of weapons and methods of warfare which are essentially contrary to the Geneva Red Cross Convention, which is still valid.

"Just as the use of dumdum bullets was once forbidden and, on the whole, thereby eliminated in practice, so the use of other certain arms should be forbidden and eliminated. Here the German Government has in mind all those arms which bring death and destruction not so much to the fighting soldiers as to non-combatant women and children.

"The German Government considers as erroneous and ineffective the idea to do away with aeroplanes while leaving the question of bombing open. But it believes it possible to proscribe the use of certain arms as contrary to international law and to excommunicate those nations which still use them from the community of mankind—its rights and its laws.

"It also believes that gradual progress is the best way to success. For example, there might be prohibition of the dropping of gas, incendiary, and explosive bombs outside the real battle zone. This limitation could then be extended to complete international outlawing of all bombing. But as long as bombing as such is permitted, any limitation of the number of bombing planes is questionable in view of the possibility of rapid substitution.

"Should bombing as such be branded as a barbarity contrary to international law, the construction of bomber aircraft will soon be abandoned as superfluous and of no purpose. If, through the Geneva Red Cross Convention, it turned out possible as a matter of fact to prevent the killing of a defenseless wounded man or prisoner, it ought to be equally possible to forbid, by an analogous convention, and finally to stop, the bombing of equally defenseless civilian populations.

"In such a fundamental way of dealing with the problem, Germany sees a greater reassurance and security for the nations than in all pacts of assistance and military conventions.

"The German Government is ready to agree to any limitation which leads to abolition of the heaviest arms, especially suited for aggression. Such are, first, the heaviest artillery, and, second, the heaviest tanks. In view of the enormous fortifications on the French frontier, such international abolition of the heaviest weapons of attack would ipso facto give France 100 per cent security.

"Germany declares herself ready to agree to any limitation whatsoever of the calibre-strength of artillery, battleships, cruisers, and torpedo boats. In like manner, the German Government is ready to accept any international limitation of the size of warships. And, finally, it is ready to agree to limitation of tonnage for submarines, or to their complete abolition in case of international agreememt.

"And it gives the further assurance that it will agree to any international limitation or abolition of arms whatsoever for a uniform period of time."

This time again, Hitler's declarations did not find the slightest response. On the contrary, France made an alliance with Russia in order to increase her prepondering influence on the Continent still further, and to augment to a gigantic degree the pressure on Germany from the East. In view of the evidently destructive intentions of his opponents, Adolf Hitler was therefore obliged to take new measures to ensure the safety of the German Reich. On 3 March 1936 he occupied the Rhineland, which had been without military protection since Versailles, and thus closed the wide gate through which the Western neighbor could carry out an invasion. Once again he followed the defensive step which he had been obliged to take with a liberal appeal for general reconciliation and for the settlement of all differences. On 31 March 1936 he formulated the following peace plan:

"1. In order to give to future agreements securing the peace of Europe the character of inviolable treaties, those nations participating in the negotiations do so only on an entirely equal footing and as equally esteemed members. The sole compelling reason for signing these treaties can only lie in the generally recognized and obvious practicability of these agreements for the peace of Europe, and thus for the social happiness and economic prosperity of the nations.

"2. In order to shorten, in the economic interest of the European nations, the period of uncertainty, the German Government proposes a limit of four months for the first period up to the signing of the pacts of non-agression guaranteeing the peace of Europe.

"3. The German Government gives the assurance not to add any reenforcements whatsoever to the troops in the Rhineland during this period, always provided that the Belgian and French Governments act in the same way.

"4. The German Government gives the assurance not to move the troops presently stationed in the Rhineland closer to the Belgian and French borders during this period.

"5. The German Government proposes the creation of a commission composed of the two guarantor powers, Britain and Italy, and a disinterested third neutral power, to guarantee this assurance to be given by both parties.

"6. Germany, Belgium, and Frace are each entitled to send a representative to this commission. If Germany, France, or Belgium think that for any particular reason they can point to a change in the military situation having taken place within this period of four months, they have the right to inform the Guarantee Commission of their observations.

"7. Germany, Belgium, and France declare their willingness in such an event to permit this Commission to make the necessary investigations through the British and Italian military attaches, and to report thereon to the participating Powers.

"8. Germany, Belgium, and France give the assurance that they will bestow the fullest consideration to the objections arising therefrom.

"9. Morover, the German Government is willing, on a basis of complete reciprocity with Germany's two western neighbors, to agree to any military limitations on the German western border.

"10. Germany, Belgium, France, and the two Guarantor Powers agree to enter into negotiations under the leadership of the British Government at once or, at the latest, after the French elections, for the conclusion of a 25-year non-aggression or security pact between France and Belgium on the one hand, and Germany on the other.

"11. Germany agrees that Britain and Italy shall sign this security pact as Guarantor Powers once more.

"12. Should special engagements to render military assistance arise as a result of these security agreements, Germany on her part declares her willingness to enter into such engagements.

"13. The German Government hereby repeats its proposal for the conclusion of an air-pact to supplement and consolidate these security agreements.

"14. The German Government repeats that, should the

THE GREAT HOLOCAUST TRIAL

THE TRIAL OF ERNST ZÜNDEL
SOME PERSONAL RECOLLECTIONS AND REFLECTIONS

by
Charles E. Weber, Ph.D.

On 7 January 1985 I received a letter with a Canadian postmark containing a document which read, in part, as follows:

"CRIMINAL SUBPOENA
In the Supreme Court of Ontario

"Elizabeth the Second, by the Grace of God of the United Kingdom, Canada and Her other Realms and Territories QUEEN, Head of the Commonwealth, Defender of the Faith.
"To Dr. Charles E. Weber of Tulsa, Oklahoma, U.S.A., Prof. of History, (Occupation)
"Whereas Ernst Zündel has been charged that He did commit an offence under Section 177 of the Criminal Code of Canada and it has been made to appear that you are likely to give material evidence for The Defence.....
"This is therefore to Command You to attend before the Supreme Court of Ontario..... to give evidence concerning the said charge* and to bring with you any writings, books, photographs, documents, artifacts, etc. in your possession or under your control that relate to the said charge."

As the son of a republic, I was not used to following the commands of a queen, no matter how powerful, but I decided forthwith to obey the Queen's command in this matter, even though the prospect of traveling to Canada in the dead of winter was somewhat intimidating. This intimidation later proved to be justified.

I arrived early on the morning of 12 February at the Tulsa International Airport, only to learn that my flight had been canceled because a crew was not available. It was not until around noon that I was finally on an airplane headed for Chicago, from which I was then to fly to Toronto. Having lost one connection, I also learned in Chicago that conditions on the Toronto runways were so dismal that flights to Toronto were not taking place. After waiting some 12 hours at Chicago, I finally begged my way onto a flight to Toronto leaving around midnight. By 2 o'clock the following morning I finally cleared Canadian customs. During the following hours I telephoned time after time to the Zündel residence, but I always received a busy signal. It occurred to me that the telephone receiver had been left off the hook as a security measure.

Finally my call got through about 6 o'clock in the morning, after 24 very long and nearly sleepless hours. Soon I was being driven to the Zündel abode—I am tempted to write "fortress"—and after a couple of hours of sorely needed sleep I was introduced to Zündel's defender, Douglas Christie, a relatively young man with an appearance of serious purpose and dignity in spite of a youthful handsomeness that would qualify him as a model for photographs advertising expensive men's clothing. There then followed a hasty conference with this energetic attorney from western Canada. He explained some of the aspects of the trial to me and what my rôle in it might be.

In the early afternoon I was driven to the court and soon after a physical examination for security purposes I found myself on the witness stand facing some of the best legal talent in Canada. Questions were posed to me concerning my experience in American army intelligence during World War II, the termination of my academic career and the like. My testimony lasted some 40 minutes and a bit later Judge Hugh Locke read an opinion for about five minutes before the court in which he attempted to justify his decision not to accept me as an expert witness, a status which would have given me the possibility of expressing wide-ranging opinions concerning the issues of the trial. I found out later that it had been Mr. Christie's intention to pose many of the questions to me which I had posed in my propaedeutic booklet, The 'Holocaust'/120 Questions and Answers, which had been published one-and-a-half years previously. The disappointing ruling by Judge Locke seemed typical of his hostility toward the defence, a hostility which he openly expressed toward Mr. Christie before the court on a number of occasions.

Judge Locke, who seemed to me more like a prosecuting attorney than an impartial judge, was hesitant to listen to a good deal of well-prepared testimony for the defence which would have thrown much more light on the question that was really the basic question in the trial: Was there such strong evidence against the "Holocaust" material (Extermination Thesis) that an honest, reasonable, objective person could express doubts about it?

Section 177 of the Criminal Code of Canada provides that "every one who willfully publishes a statement, tale or news that he knows is false and that causes or is likely to cause injury or mischief to a public interest is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for two years."

Section 177 was enacted more than a century ago. I understand that its original intention was to prevent defamation of members of the nobility and that during its long existence only one conviction was obtained on the basis of it. In view of its formulation, especially the vague "injury or mischief to a public interest," it is rather astonishing that any fair court could convict anyone on the basis of it. To obtain a conviction, the Crown would also have to prove that a defendant knows what he has published is false.

Ernst Zündel, a German citizen living in Canada and an active publisher of materials which question various aspects of widely accepted versions of the history of World War II, has now been sentenced to 15 months in prison. As a result of this sentence, moreover, he faces the possibility of deportation from Canada. An appeal is being made on the basis of many questionable aspects of the trial.

During the course of the trial it became obvious that there was so much evidence against the "Holocaust" material (Extermination Thesis) that it was quite reasonable to question it. (Even Jewish historians have expressed regrets that so much nonsense has been written about the status of European Jews during World War II that the Extermination Thesis is being made to look ridiculous.) Mr. Christie's well-prepared, devastating questioning of one Crown witness after the other could leave no doubt that it was reasonable to question the Extermination Thesis.

Long before the end of the trial, Jewish leadership began to be very nervous about the situation which was developing and about the probable outcome of the trial. On 15 February the New York Times published a rather long article by Douglas Martin entitled, "Anti-Semite Is on Trial, but Did Ontario Blunder?" The article delighted Zündel's friends and supporters, of course. In this highly significant article Martin pointed out the great publicity which Zündel was obtaining for his views and the legal problems in using a law like Section 177 of the Canadian Criminal Code to silence an opponent of Zionist propagandists. Martin quoted those who pointed out that the use of courts to suppress freedom of enquiry could have far-reaching effects that were not desired by the initiators of the trials.*

* The Zündel trial has also received other attention in the American press, even though the arguments of the defence, no matter how valid, have been blacked out in the daily press. In addition to the significant New York Times article, there have been other articles about the trial in the American press, some sympathetic to Zündel. The following is a partial, sample listing:

Washington Post
1 March: "Holocaust Scoffer Convicted." (A short notice of the judgement against Zündel.)

Washington Times
26 April 1985. "Putting the Holocaust on Trial/Canada's legal Nightmare." (A rather long editorial which argues that putting Zündel on trial was a bad mistake and that the American approach to free speech as embodied in the First Amendment is the better way. The author, Alan Derschowitz, writes from a strictly Zionist point of view, however, and distorts what little evidence against the Extermination Thesis he dares to mention. Includes the usual name-calling.)

Columbia Journalism Review:
"Covering Canada's Holocaust Trial."

National Vanguard
No. 103, p. 15 (received 2 April): "Names in the News."

The Spotlight
11 March, p. 18: " 'Holocaust' Trial Shocks Canadians," by Michael A. Hoffman II.

Liberty Bell
May 1985, pp. 17-20, 41-42: "Samisdat Holocaust Trial." – "Samisdat Holocaust Trial News." (Published as a supplement to the Liberty Bell of May 1985. Contains material reprinted from The Canadian Intelligence Service and a reprint of an article from the Toronto Sun of 1 April on the demand by a prominent Jewish lawyer that "hate-propaganda and false-news laws be repealed.")

Throughout Canada itself the trial received a great deal of publicity, even in the daily press, which gave many details of the defence arguments. This was pleasantly astonishing. When revisionistic historians have challenged the "Holocaust"-centered propaganda lies about the countries which fought against Communism during World War II, the reaction has usually been a well-orchestrated silence, in addition to criminal attempts at intimidation, arson and the like. The attempts at physical harm to revisionists and their property are a vivid demonstration of the lack of convincing answers to what the revisionists have had to say. It is also proof of the importance of the propaganda to its creators.

After my testimony my sojourn in Toronto continued for another week, during which I was able to attend further sessions of the court. I often looked up over the judge, who was seated in an elevated position, to gaze on an object which was situated even higher, the colorful arms of Great Britain in relief, supported by a lion and a unicorn. This was a constant reminder that laws differing from those in the United States were in force here.

During most of the week I was quite ill with a severe respiratory infection and a fairly high, debilitating fever. Nevertheless, that week in Toronto was one of the most interesting and stimulating weeks in my entire life. I had the pleasure of seeing again several prominent revisionists whom I had met previously, such as Professor Robert Faurisson and Ditlieb Felderer, both of whom had suffered greatly because they had the courage and decency to question propaganda myths such as the highly questionable Diary of Anne Frank. Felderer, who had frequently visited Auschwitz to look for information as to what had really gone on there during the war, astonished the court and the press with information on the facilities for internees at Auschwitz. His testimony had been given before I arrived. Udo Walendy was also in Toronto when I was there. Walendy publishes the important revisionistic series, Historische Tatsachen, many copies of which he had brought with him. I was able to purchase some of the more recent numbers in the

Instauration
May 1985, pp. 14-19: "Toronto's 'Trial of the Century'." (Perhaps the best and most thorough account of the Zündell trial hitherto published, even though it contains some minor errors.) [This article is now available from Liberty Bell Publications, both in the original English as well as in an excellent German translation.]

series, including those on the Eichmann trial, the question of guilt in the First World War, the suppression of objective historical investigation in western Germany, and two numbers (16 and 17) on the military functions of the Einsatzgruppen. (Verlag für Volkstum und Zeitgeschichtsforschung, 4973 Vlotho/Weser, Postfach 1643, West Germany.)

People whom I met for the first time included Douglas Christie, Miss Keltie Zubko, Christie's energetic assistant, Frank Walus, James Keegstra, and Thies Christophersen, the author of Die Auschwitz Lüge (The Auschwitz Lie), which was based on his observations of Auschwitz when he was stationed there during the war. Frank Walus is a diminutive man who has suffered greatly from a false prosecution. He was jeopardized and caused great physical suffering and expense by a number of witnesses who lied when they accused him of being a war criminal. Walus' defence attorney was able to prove that Walus would have been ineligible for membership in the SS because he was not tall enough and that, in fact, the then quite young Walus had been an agricultural worker during the war in Germany. The Walus trial shows again how lies have been unscrupulously told about the status of Jews during the war. James Keegstra, an Alberta high school teacher, has also been tried for questioning orthodox versions of history in the presence of his students, but he was tried on the basis of a different law. Also present during my week in Toronto was the brilliant young journalist, Michael A. Hoffmann II, who is interested in historical revisionism.

An atmosphere of camaraderie prevailed amongst the many visitors in the Zündel home. People who had come from many places to the defence of Zündel might have been strangers to him at first, but they were all aware of how important the trial was, not only with regard to justice for an individual, but also with regard to the preservation of freedom to investigate issues and questions important to society.

The Zündel house (which also contains his office) is one which gives the appearance of having been built around 1900. Its rather modest-sized front belies the rather large space contained in it, including a rather spacious basement. One large room in which I spent many fascinated hours contains the important library. This library contains a large collection of books in various languages pertaining to the history of the Second World War.

What kind of man is Ernst Zündel?

My most vivid impression of Zündel comes from the allocution to his friends and supporters at the end of the days on which the court sessions took place. He gave his summaries and observations in both a fluent German and a fluent English. The audience which gathered around him in the spacious basement of the Zündel house hung on every word.

Zündel is a successful publicity hound. I am aware that this phrase is often used in a pejorative sense, but when a publicity hound is trying to obtain publicity for constructive ideas and the truth, the appelation can hardly be a pejorative one.

What motivates Zündel? He has become aware that the deluge of anti-German propaganda that has existed for decades has done unjust psychological harm to Germans and persons of German descent, even to school children of German parentage.

When a man has native intelligence, a sense of purpose in his life, and courage, he can accomplish remarkable things, even against overwhelming odds. Zündel has all three of these attributes and has indeed accomplished something remarkable. He has brought the attention of the Canadian people (and to some extent the attention of people in other lands) to the fact that there are good reasons to doubt the "Holocaust"-centered anti-German propaganda with which the world has been inundated with unscrupulous objectives for many years.

At a cost of considerable personal sacrifice, Zündel has attempted to combat an injustice that involves much greater effects in the world than an insulting, humiliating action against the German people, grave though that might be in itself. The "Holocaust"-centered anti-German propaganda has perverted American foreign policy. It has gained an unjustified sympathy for Jews that has caused the United States to give generous support to the criminal, parasitic Jewish state which was established in Palestine in 1948. This support, in turn, has cost the American people not only money but also good will amongst the Islamic nations. Ernst Zündel's struggle is perhaps primarily motivated by a desire for justice for the German people, but his struggle has far wider ramifications. As an American, I am well aware that his struggle could have beneficial results for my own country if it paves the way for a more rational American foreign policy and in particular a better relationship with western Germany, a state which we now want to play a key rôle in the defence of the non-Communist parts of Europe.

Jewish organizations are in the habit of pouncing swiftly and ruthlessly onto anyone who raises questions about their destructive, mendacious propaganda. The assault can be in the form of threats of physical injury, arson, destruction of property, financially debilitating legal action, or causing a loss of employment. Let us pause at this point to review and enumerate the motivations for this sort of ruthless behavior, which really weakens the Jews' arguments in the eyes of all objective persons, even including a few righteous Jews themselves:

1. Jewish leaders, especially religious leaders, are painfully aware that in the United States a biological assimilation with the host population is taking place. Authoritative estimates have it that about one-third of Jews who are currently marrying in the United States are marrying non-Jews. For purposes of their own, Jewish leaders wish to preserve the cultural and racial identity of their people. They know that a sense of being persecuted can have a tendency to preserve the cultural and racial coherence of a nation, race, or tribe.

2. The constant drumming of the "Holocaust" material into American ears has a tendency to dampen the hostility toward Jews, no matter how rational and well-founded this hostility might be. The tales about gas chambers, terrible railway transportation to relocation centers, millions of deaths of Jews (usually the absurd and impossible six-million), heroic escapes and the like presented by the press and the television networks even forty years after the end of World War II, serve as an admonishment against the terrible sin of hostility toward Jews, commonly, but not accurately, designated as "anti-Semitism." If we doubt the effects of these tales, we need only recall the contrasting ridicule and even acerbic attacks on Jews in the American press a mere two or three generations ago. (See my review of Jews in American Graphic Satire and Humor in the July issue of the Liberty Bell.

3. There were some very solid, rational foundations of the hostility toward Jews which existed throughout Europe during the years following the Communist Revolution of 1917 in Russia to the end of World War II in 1945. The middle classes of European countries, by no means only Germany, were horrified at the slaughter of the best and most productive people of Christian Russia by a government which was quite correctly viewed as one very largely dominated by Jews, a view even published by Winston Churchill in 1920. The worry about the Jews' unscrupulous use of their rapidly increasing power was not confined to Europe. We need only think of Henry Ford's publications during 1920 to 1922, which later appeared under the title, The International Jew: The World's Foremost Problem, in four volumes (available from Liberty Bell Publications, $26.00 plus $2.60 postage and handling). U.S. Army intelligence reports from the year 1919 (declassified in 1958) also comment on the primarily Jewish composition of the Bolshevik government of that time. The Communist terror during the ephemeral government of Bela Kun in 1919 provided a vivid lesson to Europeans on what happens "when Israel is king." Bitterness toward Jews was also intensified by accretions of Jewish power, especially in the lands which had undergone hyperinflations. With their international financial connections, Jews found themselves in a position to buy up huge amounts of real estate and other tangible assets in such lands. Around 1930, e.g., approximately half the real estate in Budapest was owned by Jews. Later on in the United States, the espionage carried out by the Rosenbergs (executed in 1953) and other Jews for the U.S.S.R. had to be eased out of Aryan-American minds by a propaganda process we might designate as "obliteration by contrast." The "Holocaust" material has been quite useful in dimming out the real record of modern Jewry.

4. The Évian Conference of 1938 had made it clear to Jews that their emigration from Europe would be difficult, at best. By 1945 Jews were more eager than ever to get out of a hostile Europe, although the founder of modern Zionism, Theodor Herzl (1860-1904), had already made clear the urgency of emigration of Jews from Europe during his lifetime. The gross exaggeration of Jewish mortality in Europe during World War II was necessary to convey the idea that a Jewish immigration would take place only on a modest scale, involving only a small remnant of survivors. The guilt complexes engendered by the "Holocaust" material were produced to ease the migration of European Jews to Palestine and other lands, especially the United States.

5. Germany had to be denigrated after World War II on a continuing basis in order to collect huge contributions to Israel from the western German state established by the Allies in 1949. Even the United States had to be made to feel guilty for not having accepted more Jews in the 1930s. The continuing propagation of the "Holocaust" material has brought huge flows of treasure to the jewish state in Palestine, the behavior of which is a reflection of the behavior of typical individual Jews.

6. The ancient Jewish practice of causing dissention amongst host populations (cf. Isaiah XIX, 2) has also been aided by the constant propagation of the "Holocaust" material.

We would be committing a significant error, however, if we failed to recognize the rôle of Aryans in accepting and even helping to propagate the "Holocaust" material. (See my article in the Summer 1982 issue of the Journal of Historical Review, pp. 105-118, "Cui Bono?/An American Veteran's Views on Non-Jewish Toleration and Propagation of the Extermination Thesis.") Millions and millions of men from Canada, England, and the United States were militarily involved in Europe during World War II. It is only natural for most of them to want to believe that their efforts and sacrifices during the war were for a good cause. Anti-German propaganda, no matter how poorly founded in historical facts, is psychologically convenient and morally palliating for them in this regard. Moreover, many Allied soldiers witnessed the terrible destruction, psychological degradation, hunger, and cold which were everywhere during the postwar occupation of Germany. The idea that National Socialist Germany was absolutely evil and an irrational aberration of the human psyche helps ease the conscience of the millions of Allied soldiers who witnessed the conditions in postwar Germany. The Allied war effort and the attitudes of Roosevelt and Truman in dealing with the Communists resulted in the unbelievably cruel occupation of much of Europe. For that reason, many former Allied servicemen would like to believe that National Socialist Germany, which they defeated, was a far greater evil than Communism, even if that is by no means the case. The "Holocaust"-centered propaganda was also a practical tool used by Allied military authorities to keep their occupation personnel from "fraternizing" with the German population. I have my own recollections of that from my years in Germany after the war, 1945-1948. Then there is the question of war guilt. World War II did not start when Germany invaded its former territories then under Polish occupation on 1 September 1939. It started on 3 September 1939 when England and a somewhat hesitant France declared war on Germany.

The Communists also have their motivations for continuing their own "anti-Fascist" propaganda. (National Socialism is a term which is avoided in the U.S.S.R.) The Communists, for example, have their mass execution of Polish officers at Katyn to contend with, i.e., to obliterate by contrast. Auschwitz has been converted into a major tourist attraction with propaganda objectives by the Communist government of Poland.

We must not disregard these realities in attempting to understand the Zündel trial and its astonishing, legally questionable outcome. Judges, prosecutors, and jurymen are not above and beyond the psychological atmosphere and pressures in which they have lived, no matter what the logic of the legal situation.

Ernst Zündel has struggled against the lies which have been propagated for a variety of reasons against the nations which fought Communism during World War II. His struggle has brought positive results.

The trial of Ernst Zündel will not be forgotten. Too much is involved. The freedom to investigate objectively historical and social questions is one of the most crucial requisites for the future cultural, political, and intellectual integrity of the western world. □

Ernst Zündel has been convicted for Thought-Crime in Toronto and sentenced to 15 months imprisonment because he wants to separate fact from fiction in the so-called "Holocaust." He fought this long, costly court battle, not for himself, but for all European immigrants who understand the Communist question. Ernst Zündel now needs your help to fight, not only his conviction, but also the deportation order which the Zionists have demanded that the Canadian Government execute against him. The costs of 'justice' are great. Please help Ernst Zündel defend all our freedoms by winning his appeal. HERE IS A BOOK in lucid question/answer format that tackles virtually all the myths and distortions propagated by the "Holocaust" Establishment—a book for young and old alike.

- Presents ideas and information not found in other books in this field.
- Short, well-organized and up-to-date on the latest ideas and research.
- Suitable for the classroom as a counterbalance to "Holocaust" studies.
- Gives a historical background of the Jewish problem in Europe, examines the motivations of various groups with regard to the Extermination thesis, and introduces the reader to the more detailed literature on the subject.
- Written by a former professor with a Ph.D. in an historical discipline whose training as a linguist gave him access to literature in various languages, and whose U.S. military intelligence experience in WWII included his residence in Europe during 1945-48 with assignments involving him in preparations for the Nuremberg Trials.

In the classroom; in debates; for the novice revisionist, the inquisitive and skeptical—nothing could be as useful as Dr. Weber's The "Holocaust"—120 Questions and Answers. 120 questions that rouse thought. 120 fully-referenced answers that blow the lid off the blackout. A book of this scope and format has been needed for a long time. Here you have it: easy-to-read, written and priced for wide distribution—and an answer to today's obsession with Holocaustiana.

Netherlands so desire, it is willing to include that country too in this West-European security agreement.

"15. In order to seal this peace-pact, voluntarily entered into between Germany and France as the reconciliatory conclusion of a centuries-old dispute, Germany and France pledge themselves to take steps to see that in the education of the young, as well as in the press and publications of both nations, everything shall be avoided which might be construed to poison the relationship between the two peoples, whether it be a derogatory or contemptuous attitude, or improper interference in the internal affairs of the other country. They agree to establish, at the headquarters of the League of Nations at Geneva, a joint commission whose function it shall be to lay all complaints received before the two Governments for information and investigation.

"16. In pursuance of their intention to give this agreement the character of a sacred pledge, Germany and France undertake to ratify it by means of a plebiscite of the two nations.

"17. Germany expresses her willingness, on her part, to establish contact with the states on her south-eastern and north-eastern borders, in order to invite them directly to conclude the pacts of non-agression already proposed.

"18. Germany expresses her willingness to re-enter the League of Nations, either at once, or after the conclusion of these agreements.

"At the same time, the German Government again expresses as its expectation that, after a reasonable time and by the method of amicable negotiations, the question of colonial equality of rights and that of the separation of the Covenant of the League of Nations from its foundations in the Versailles Treaty will be cleared up.

"19. Germany proposes the establishment of an International Court of Arbitration, which shall be responsible for the observance of the various agreements concluded, and whose decision shall be binding on all parties.

"After the conclusion of this great work of securing European peace, the German Government considers it urgently necessary to endeavor by practical measures to put a stop to the unlimited competition in armaments. In her opinion, this would mean not merely an improvement in the financial and economic position of the nations, but above all a diminution of the psychological tension.

"The German Government, however, has no faith in the attempt to bring about universal settlements, as this would be doomed to failure from the outset, and can therefore be proposed only by those who have no interest in achieving practical results. On the other hand, it is of the opinion that the negotiations held and the results achieved in limiting naval armaments should have an instructive and stimulating effect.

"The German Government therefore proposes that future conferences shall have one clearly defined objective.

"For the present, it believes the most important task is to bring aerial warfare into the moral and humane atmosphere of the protection afforded to non-combatants or the wounded by the Geneva Convention. Just as the killing of defenseless wounded, or prisoners, or the use of dumdum bullets, or the waging of submarine warfare without warning, have been either forbidden or regulated by international conventions, so it must be possible for civilized humanity to prevent the senseless abuse of any new type of weapon, without running counter to the object of warfare.

"The German Government therefore puts foreward the proposal that the immediate practical tasks of this conference should be:

"1. Prohibition of dropping gas, poison, or incendiary bombs.

"2. Prohibition of dropping bombs of any kind whatsoever on open towns and villages outside the range of the medium-heavy artillery of the fighting fronts.

"3. Prohibition of the shelling with long-range guns of towns more than 20 km distant from the battle zone.

"4. Abolition and prohibition of artillery of the heaviest calibre.

"As soon as possibilities for further limitation of armaments emerge from such discussions and agreements they should be utilized.

"The German Government hereby declares itself prepared to join in every such settlement, in so far as it is valid internationally.

"The German Government believes that if even a first step is made on the road to disarmament, this will be of enormous importance to the relationship between the nations, and to the recovery of confidence, trade, and prosperity.

"In accordance with the general desire for the restoration of favorable economic conditions, the German Government is prepared immediately after the conclusion of the political treaties to enter into an exchange of opinions on economic problems with the other nations concerned, in the spirit of the proposals made, and to do all that lies in its power to improve the economic situation in Europe, and the world economic situation which is closely connected with it.

"The German Government believes that with the peace plan proposed above it has made its contribution to the reconstruction of a new Europe on the basis of reciprocal respect and confidence between sovereign states. Many opportunities for such a pacification of Europe, for which Germany has so often in the last few years made her proposals, have been neglected. May this attempt to achieve European understanding succeed at last!

"The German Government confidently believes that it has opened the way in this direction by submitting the above peace plan."

Anyone who today reads this comprehensive peace plan will realize in what direction the development of Europe, according to the wishes of Adolf Hitler, should really have proceeded. Here was the possibility of truly constructive work; this could have been a real turning point for the welfare of all nations. But once more he, who alone called for peace, was not heard. Only Britain replied with a rather scornful questionaire which avoided any serious consideration of the essential points involved. Incidentally, however, she disclosed her actual intentions by setting herself up as the protector of France and by instituting and commencing regular military staff conversations with the French Republic just as in the period before the Great War.

There could no longer be any doubt now that the Western Powers were following the old path towards an armed conflict and were steadily preparing a new blow against Germany, although Adolf Hitler's whole thoughts and endeavors were directed toward proving to them that he wanted to remain on the best possible terms with them. In the course of the years he had undertaken numerous steps in this direction, of which a few more shall be referred to here. He negotiated the Naval Agreement of 18 June 1935 with Great Britain, which provided that the German Navy should only have a strength of 35% of that of the British Navy. By this he wanted to demonstrate that the Reich, to use his own words, had "neither the intention nor the means, nor was it necessary" to enter into any rivalry as regards naval power, such as had had so fateful an influence on its relations to Great Britain in the well-remembered days before the Great War.

He assured France on every possible occasion of his desire to live at peace with her. He repeatedly renounced in plain terms any claim to Alsace-Lorraine. On the return to the Reich of the Saar territory as the result of the plebiscite, he declared on 1 March 1935:

"It is our hope that through this act of just compensation, in which we see a return to natural reason, relations between Germany and France have permanently improved. Therefore, as we desire peace, we must hope that our great neighbor is ready and willing to seek peace with us. It must be possible for two great peoples to join together and collaborate in opposing the difficulties which threaten to overwhelm Europe."

He even endeavored to arrive at a better understanding with Poland, the eastern ally of the Western Powers, although this country had unlawfully incorporated millions of Germans in 1919 and had subjected them to the worst oppression ever since. On 26 January 1934 he concluded a non-aggression pact with her in which the two Governments agreed "to settle directly all questions of whatever kind which concern their mutual relations."

Thus was his determination to preserve peace, and the way he strove to protect Germany in this manner. When, however, he saw that London and Paris were arming for attack, he was once more obliged to undertake fresh measures of defense. The enemy camp, as we have seen above, had been enormously extended through the alliance between France and Russia. In addition to this, the two powers had secured a line of communication to the south of the Reich through Czechoslovakia having concluded a treaty with Russia, which put her in the position of a bridge between east and west. Czechoslovakia, however, was in control of the high-lying country of Bohemia and Moravia, which Bismarck had called the citadel of Europe, and this citadel projected far into German territory. The threat to Germany thus assumed truly overpowering proportions.

The genius of Adolf Hitler found a way of meeting this danger. The conditions in German Austria, which, under the terror of the Schuschnigg Government, were tending towards civil war, offered him the opportunity of stepping in to save the situation, and to lead back into the Reich the sister nation to the south-east that had been sentenced by the victorious powers to lead the life of a hopelessly decaying "Free State." After he had thus established himself near the line of communication between France and Russia mentioned above, a process of dissolution set in in the mixed state of Czechoslovakia, which had been artificially put together from the most diverse national elements, until after the liberation of the Sudetenland and the secession of Slovakia, the Czechs themselves asked for the protection of the German Reich. With this the enemy's bridge came into Adolf Hitler's possession; and at the same time direct connection was made possible with Italy, whose friendship had been secured some time previously.

While he was gaining this strategical success for the security of his country, Adolf Hitler was again endeavoring with great eagerness to reach a peaceful understanding with the Western Powers. In Munich, directly after liberation of the Sudeten-Germans, approved by Britain, France, and Italy, he made an agreement with the British Prime Minister, Neville Chamberlain, the text of which was as follows:

"We had a further meeting today and have agreed in recognizing that the question of Anglo-German relations is of the first importance for the two countries and for Europe.

"We regard the agreement signed last night and the Anglo-German Naval Agreement as symbolic of the desire of our two peoples never again to go to war with one another.

"We are resolved that the method of consultation shall be the method adopted to deal with any other questions that may concern our two countries, and we are determined to continue our efforts to remove possible sources of difference and thus to contribute to assure the peace of Europe.

"September 30, 1938.

signed: Adolf Hitler Neville Chamberlain."

Two months later, on Hitler's instructions, the German Foreign Minster, von Ribbentrop, made the following agreement with France:

"Herr Joachim von Ribbentrop, Reichsminister for Foreign Affairs, and Monsieur Georges Bonnet, French Minister of Foreign Affairs, acting in the name and by order of their Governments, are, at their meeting in Paris, on 6 December 1938, agreed as follows:

"1. The German Government and the French Government fully share the conviction that peaceful and good-neighborly relations between Germany and France constitute one of the most essential elements for the consolidation of the situation in Europe and the maintenance of general peace. The two Governments will in consequence use all their efforts to ensure the development of the relations in this direction between their countries.

"2. The two Governments recognize that between the two countries there is no territorial question outstanding, and they solemnly recognize as final the borders between their countries as they now exist.

"3. The two Governments are resolved, while leaving unaffected their particular relations with other powers, to remain in contact with regard to all questions concerning their two countries, and mutually to consult should the later evolution of those questions lead to international difficulties.

"In token whereof the representatives of the two Governments have signed the present Declaration, which comes into immediate effect. Prepared in two original Documents in the French and German language respectively, in Paris, 6 December 1938.

Joachim von Ribbentrop — Georges Bonnet
Reichsminister for Foreign Affairs — Minister for Foreign Affairs"

According to all calculations, one should have been able to assume that the way was clear for collaborative reconstruction in which all leading powers would participate, and that the Fuehrer's endeavors to secure peace would at last meet with success. But the opposite was true. Scarcely had Chamberlain reached home when he called for rearmament on a considerable scale and laid plans for a new and tremendous encirclement of Germany. Britain now took over from France the leadership of this further encirclement of the Reich, in order to obtain a substitute for the lost Czechoslovakia many times its value. She opened negotiations with Russia, granted Poland a guarantee and also Rumania, Greece, and Turkey. These were alarm signals of the greatest urgency.

Just at this time Adolf Hitler was occupied with the task of finally eliminating sources of friction with Poland. For this purpose, he had made an uncommonly generous proposal by which the mostly German-inhabited Free City of Danzig would return to the Reich, and a narrow passage through the Polish Corridor, which since 1919 had torn assunder the north-eastern part of Germany to an unbearable extent, would provide communication with the separated area. This proposal, which moreover afforded Poland the prospect of a 25-year non-aggression pact and other advantages, was nevertheless rejected in Warsaw, because there it was believed, conscious as the authorities were of forming one of the principal members of the common front set up by London against Germany, that any concession, however minor, could be refused. This was not all! With the same consciousness Poland then started to be aggressive, threatened Danzig, and prepared to take up arms against Germany.

Thus the moment was close at hand for the attack on the Reich by the countries which had been brought together for the purpose. Adolf Hitler, making a final extreme effort in the interests of peace, saved what he could. On 24 August 1939, Ribbentrop succeeded in reaching an agreement with Moscow for a non-aggression pact with Russia. Two days later, the Fuehrer himself made a final and truly remarkable offer to Britain, declaring himself ready "to enter into agreements with Great Britain," "which. . .would not only, on the German side, in any case safeguard the existence of the British Empire, but, if necessary, would guarantee German assistance for the British Empire, irrespective of where such assistance might be required."

At the same time he was prepared "to accept a reasonable limitation of armaments, in accordance with the new political situation and economic requirements."

The reply to this was a pact of assistance signed the same day between Britain and Poland, which rendered the outbreak of war inevitable. Then a decision was made in Warsaw to mobilize at once against Germany, and the Poles began with violent attacks, not only on the Germans in Poland, who for some time had been the victims of frightful massacres, but on Germans in German territory.

But even when Britain and France had already declared war, as they intended, and Germany had overcome the Polish danger in the east by a glorious campaign without a parallel, even then Adolf Hitler raised his voice once more in the name of peace. He did so although his hands were now free to act against the enemy in the west. He did so, although the fight against him personally was proclaimed in London and Paris, in immeasurable hate, as a crusade. At this moment he possessed the supreme self-control to proclaim in his speech of 6 October 1939 a new plan for the pacification of Europe to public opinion throughout the world. This plan was as follows:

"By far the most important task, in my opinion, is the creation of not only a belief in, but also a sense of, European security.

"For this it is necessary that the aims of the foreign policy of each European state should be made perfectly clear. As far as Germany is concerned, the Reich Government is ready to give a thorough and exhaustive exposition of the aims of its foreign policy. In so doing, it begins by stating that the Treaty of Versailles is now regarded by it as obsolete, in other words, that the Government of the German Reich and with it the whole German people no longer see cause or reason for any further revision of the Treaty, apart from the demand for adequate colonial possessions justly due to the Reich, involving in the first place a return of the German colonies.

"This demand for colonies is based not only on Germany's historical claim to her colonies, but above all on her elementary right to a share of the world's resources of raw materials. This demand does not take the form of an ultimatum, nor is it a demand which is backed by force, but a demand based on political justice and sane economic principles.

"The demand for a real revival of international economic life coupled with an extension of trade and commerce presupposes a reorganization of the international economic system, in other words, of production in the individual states. In order to facilitate the exchange of goods thus produced, however, a new system of markets must be found and a final settlement of currencies arrived at, so that the obstacles in the path of unrestricted trade can be gradually removed.

"The most important condition, however, for a revival of economic life in and outside of Europe, is the establishment of an unconditionally guaranteed peace and of a sense of security on the part of the individual nations. This security will not be rendered possible by the final sanctioning of the European status, but above all by the reduction of armaments to a reasonable and economically tolerable level. An essential part of this necessary sense of security, however, is a clear definition of the legitimate use and application of certain modern armaments which can at any given moment strike straight at the heart of every nation and hence create a permanent sense of insecurity. In my previous speeches in the Reichstag I made proposals with this end in view. At that time they were rejected—presumably for the simple reason that they were made by me. I believe, however, that a sense of national security will not return to Europe until clear and binding international agreements have provided a comprehensive definition of the extent to which the use of certain weapons is permitted or forbidden.

"The Geneva Convention once succeeded in prohibiting, in civilized countries at least, the killing of the wounded, the ill-treatment of prisoners, war against non-combatants, etc., and just as it was possible gradually to achieve the universal observance of this statute, a way ought surely to be found to regulate aerial warfare, the use of poison gas, of submarines, etc., and also so to define contraband that war will lose its terrible character of a conflict waged against women and children and against non-combatants in general. The growing horror of certain methods of modern warfare will of its own accord lead to their abolition, and thus they will become obsolete. In the war with Poland, I endeavored to restrict aerial warfare to objectives of military importance, or only to employ it to combat resistance at a given point. But it must surely be possible to emulate the Red Cross in drawing up some universally valid international regulation. It is only when this is achieved that peace can reign, particularly on our densely populated continent—a peace which, uncontaminated by suspicion and fear, will provide the only possible condition for real economic prosperity. I do not believe that there is any responsible statesman in Europe who does not in his heart desire prosperity for his people. But such a desire can only be realized if all the nations inhabiting this continent decide to work together. To assist in ensuring this co-operation must be the aim of every man who is sincerely struggling for the future of his own people.

"To achieve this great end, the leading nations on this continent will one day have to come together in order to draw up, accept, and guarantee a statute on a comprehensive basis which will ensure for them a sense of security, of calm,—in short, of peace. Such a conference could not possibly be held without the most thorough preparation, i.e., without exact elucidation of every point at issue. It is equally impossible that such a conference, which would determine the fate of this continent for many years to come, could carry on its deliberations while cannons are thundering, or mobilized armies are bringing pressure to bear upon it. Since, however, these problems must be solved sooner or later, it would surely be more sensible to tackle the solution before millions of men are first uselessly sent to their death, and billions of dollars' worth of property destroyed. The continuation of the present state of affairs in the west is unthinkable. Each day will soon demand increasing sacrifices. Perhaps the day will come when France will begin to bombard and demolish Saarbruecken. The German artillery will in turn lay Muehlhausen in ruins. France will retaliate by bombarding Karlsruhe, and Germany in her turn will shell Strassburg. Then the French artillery will fire at Freiburg, and the Germans at Kolmar or Schlettstadt. Long-range artillery will then be set up, and from both sides destruction will strike deeper and deeper, and whatever cannot be reached by the long-range artillery will be destroyed from the air. And that will be very interesting for certain international journalists, and very profitable for the aircraft, arms, and munition manufacturers, etc., but appalling for the victims. And this battle of destruction will not be confined to the land. No, it will reach far out over sea. Today there are no longer any islands.

"And the national wealth of Europe will be scattered in the form of shells, and the vigor of every nation will be sapped on the battlefields. One day, however, there will again be a frontier between Germany and France, but instead of flourishing towns there will be ruins and endless graveyards."

The fate of this plan was the same as that of all the previous appeals made by Adolf Hitler in the name of reason, in the interest of a true renascence of Europe. His enemies paid him no heed. On this occasion also no response was forthcoming from them. They rigidly adhered to the attitude which they had taken up in the beginning.

And then, on 9 July 1940, almost 11 months after the war had started, a war which had brought German colors victory after victory, Adolf Hitler made his last peace offer. The French armistice had been concluded a month before. Great Britain had already started her indiscriminate night bombing of open German towns, killing German women and children, when Hitler in his historic address before the German Reichstag acknowledged failure of one of his most important aims of foreign policy and one that had been closest to his heart—friendship with England:

"Ever since the commencement of the National Socialist regime, two points were prominent in the program of its foreign policy: the achievement of a real understanding and friendship with Italy, and, second, the achievement of the same relationship with England . . . Even today, I still regret that, in spite of all my efforts, I have not succeeded in achieving that friendship with England which, as I believe, would have been a blessing for both peoples. I was not successful in spite of determined and honest efforts . . ."

After recalling all his attempts to bring about friendship and a lasting peace with Great Britain, he went on to say:

"In this hour, I feel it to be my duty before my own conscience to appeal once more to reason and common sense in Great Britain as much as elsewhere. I consider myself in a position to make this appeal since I am not the vanquished begging favors, but the victor speaking in the name of reason. I can see no reason why this war must go on. I am grieved to think of the sacrifices which it will claim. I should like to avert them also from my own people. I know that millions of German men, young and old alike, are burning with the desire at last to settle accounts with the enemy who, for the second time, has declared war upon us for no reason whatever. But I also know that at home there are many women and mothers who, ready as they are to sacrifice all they have in life, are yet bound to it by their very heartstrings.

"Possibly, Mr.Churchill will again brush aside this statement of mine by saying that it is merely born of fear and of doubt in our final victory . . . .

"Mr. Churchill ought perhaps, for once, to believe me when I prophesy that a great Empire will be destroyed—an Empire which it was never my intention to destroy or even harm. I do, however, realize that this struggle, if it continues, can end only with the complete annihilation of one or the other of the two adversaries. Mr. Churchill believes that this will be Germany. I know that it will be different . . . ."

Hitler had hardly finished when his offer was rejected with sneers.

These are the historical facts. Does anyone need an explanation of why Germany's enemies rejected Hitler's peace offers again and again? They had created Versailles and when Versailles collapsed they wanted to replace it with a new Versailles. The responsibility and guilt is their's. They are the disturbers of peace, they are the ones who meditate the forcible oppression of other peoples and seek to plunge Europe into devastation and disaster. If it were not so, they would have long ago grasped the hand that was held out to them, or at least made a gesture of honest desire to understand and cooperate on a basis of equality and thus spare the world so much "blood, sweat, and tears." World history is the world court; and in this case, as always, when it reaches its decision, it will pronounce a just verdict. □

Dear George: 11 May 1985

I appreciate the kind remarks of "R.S." of New York concerning my book, "British Public Opinion and the Wars of German Unification," and trust he or she will not think me ungracious if I presume to defend my position in my article "The 'Naked Communist' Thesis" vis-a-vis Francis Parker Yockey whom R.S. thinks is more realistic in the question of a possible future all-out nuclear war between the major powers. R.S. quotes Yockey as arguing that the A-bomb is just another high explosive device (although many times more devastating than anything previously available). I said much the same thing forty years ago. After all, the total destruction of cities and the massacre of almost all their inhabitants did not begin with Tokyo, Hiroshima, Nagasaki, Hamburg, or even that unspeakable crime of Dresden. Check out your "Old Testament" and the gloating over Joshua's campaigns. There is the case of Carthage in 146 B.C. or Kiev in 1240 or Magdeburg in 1631—just a few of the many examples of massive ferocity and devastation. The A-bomb, in Yockey's time, did indeed merely simplify the process.

The development of the H-bomb, however, and the multiple-warhead ICBMs have utterly changed the matter of major wars qualitatively and not merely quantitatively. It is no longer a matter of murdering all the men, women, and children indiscriminately in a limited number of selected cities to which the physical devastation is also confined. It means today rendering the whole planet uninhabitable—the end, not only of civilization which (although I would mourn the loss of much of the beauty that has been created in music, art, literature, and architecture) might not be altogether a bad thing, but the end of all higher mammalian life by reason of lethally high radiation and/or a nuclear winter. I will grant that there is some fairly strong historical evidence for a kind of maniacal and self-destructive element in Jewish (and—as with the Carthaginians and other Semites) racial psychology but there is its opposite, too, a capacity, like the cockroach, to survive where other races cannot. But the Russians are still at least as Aryan as our own polyglot, multiracial stew and they are as aware as we of the suicidal result of engaging in massive thermo-nuclear war. They are certainly no more fanatical than were the Japanese who surrendered in 1945 after two A-bombs. I agree we need a second-strike capability but only as additional insurance against a very unlikely occurrence. As a rider, it might be worth thinking about the non-use of highly sophisticated new lethal gases in World War II—by either side in extremity.

Sincerely,
Dr. Peter H. Peel, California

Dear George: 14 May 1985

I think we got to President Reagan about the 'verdammten Juden' and he decided to buck them at Bitburg to show that he was his own man—which he isn't. This may cost Reagan his life in the near future because the Jews must show other Jews that no one disobeys them, especially the despicable goyim. It will be interesting to see the outcome...

Dear Editor: 15 May 1985

I invite Mr. L.E. of New York (first letter to the editor printed in the May 1985 Liberty Bell) to prove to me that Lyndon LaRouche is a tool or agent of the Jews as he implies. I invite anyone known to Liberty Bell to prove to me that LaRouche is a tool of a Jewish Conspiracy. You may show this letter to all interested persons.

Yours truly,
N.S., Massachussetts

Dear George: 20 May 1985

I just want you to know that from now on Liberty Bell will get all my support. Liberty Bell is to me the voice of White America, and I think you work the hardest of anyone to expose the lie of lies—the Holocaust. These Jew rats will do anything for money—they make me sick. Some day they will get what they have coming to them!

Sincerely,
T.S., Wisconsin

Dear George & Landsmann: 20 May 1985

It was indeed an honor to have talked with you on the phone Saturday, May 4th and Saturday May 18th. I am enclosing a copy of a letter to President Reagan concerning his visit to the Bitburg cemetery. Also, I am enclosing a poem I recently wrote, entitled "Der Letzte Freiheitskampf." I failed to mention on the phone that my father was (through mother's side) a descendant of the famous Freiheitsdichter Ernst Moritz Arndt, whose book of poems I have. This makes me a descendant of this famous German poet. Please feel free to publish this Gedicht.

As I told you on the phone, my uncle Max was an officer in the German Wehrmacht, who was also politically active up to the time of his death of cancer in 1983. I was in constant contact with this wonderful man. He kept me informed of the political chicaneries, corruption, subversion, and decadence in the West German state, which he considered a colony of the U.S. and Israel. Many times he forwarded to me the famous "National-Zeitung," one of the few newspapers publishing the truth.

Here in little old Jew York we have been swamped with the so-called "Nazi atrocity stories." There wasn't one moment of objective reporting, or opposing views in the Liberal, Zionist, Bolshevik tabloids and the TV Establishment. The decibels rose higher and higher as the President's visit to Bitburg came closer. I was afraid that he would change his mind in the last minute, but he persevered. WOR, CBS, NBC, and ABC, and even the much touted Public TV Channel 13, put on continuous horror stories concerning the "Holocaust." There is no question that the Zionist Jews are going to cut their own throat, as they have been doing throughout history in many countries. They never know when to stop; they continuously cry "persecution" and "anti-Semitism," but never try to argue logically or intelligently. One only needs to read all the historical accounts of their activities in various countries in the past; one must be truly blind not to see what has been going on: Oliver Cromwell's England; the French Revolution; the Masonic Orders. Only a small minority of decent Jews are aware of what has transpired...

Please continue the good work. With best regards,

H.J.B., New York State

Dear Editor: 28 May 1985

Due to their obvious and largely successful efforts to get control of the nation's news media, and thus by controlling public opinion decide who shall be elected President and as members of Congress, the Jews in America show that they are incompatible with the Democratic form of government. The answer to this condition, it seems to me, is to deport the Jews en masse back to Russia where they can live under the Communist system they chiefly were responsible for creating. This certainly is the only permanent solution. In past centuries, many nations had to deal with their Jewish problem by deporting these people, and there is no reason why the same method should not be used today. If our system is to retain its respectability, it will have to do so.

Sincerely,
O.L.B., California

Dear Landsmann: 7 May 1985

I just want to make a comment on the letter of the man who wrote in concerning cancer and Dr. Kelly's program. I enclose a pamphlet by one of his daughters that explains how he got into the cancer curing business very much against his will [For a copy of this pamphlet, "Surviving a Healthy Childhood," by Kimberly S. Kelly, send small donation for postage, or $2.50 for 20 copies, to LBP, Box 21, Reedy WV 25270. –Editor]. I was hesitant to give any details of his address or of where to get his little book for fear it might get you into trouble for giving medical advice without being a member of the doctors monopoly. Dr. Kelly lost his dental license simply for writing his book! Frankly, I am surprised that the reader was even able to get it through Barnes & Noble. I have only seen this book in Health Food stores and in private circulation. Dr. Kelly now works for the Nutritional Counseling Service. People who have cancer can contact this company at 800-527-0227 or 214-241-3414 for more information. Perhaps you could put these numbers on your computer listing? [Will do! –Editor]

I would like to comment that it is practically impossible to get an overdose of vitamin C from carrot juice, even providing that you could force yourself to drink a gallon (!) of it per day. Only a fantastically concentrated source like bear liver could contain enough of this vitamin to be fatal. It is, however, possible to dissolve enough cancer into your blood to overload your liver and kill you, which is why Dr. Kelly recommends such treatments as the liver flush and coffee anemas and the drinking of vegetable juices (I find carrot juice cheap and good tasting, but almost any vegetable juice will do) to help your body eliminate this poison.

I am enclosing a donation as a small "thank you" for your good work.

Sincerely,
R.S., New York State

Dear Mr. Dietz: June 1985

The article entitled "Russian Jews and Gentiles" which you have reprinted in the June issue of the "Liberty Bell" from "The Century Magazine" of April 1882 is of great siginificance to us Aryan Americans, even though it was written over a century ago. Numerically, the Jews who migrated to the United States from lands under the Czar's crown after 1882 constitute by far the majority of the ancestors of the Jews now living in the United States. For that reason, the description of the mores of these Jews is of utmost importance for understanding a large fraction of the Jews living in this country. This understanding is necessary if Aryans living in the United States are to protect themselves and to survive as a racially and culturally identifiable group.

The article from "The Century Magazine" reminds us once more of the freedom which Americans had a century ago to disseminate information about the Jewish problem and to discuss it. The materials reproduced in "Jews in American Graphic Satire and Humor" (Cincinnati, 1984), most of which originated from 1879 to 1907, likewise remind us of that freedom.

One of the most important points demonstrated by the article is that the hostility toward Jews was not simply engendered by a different religious affiliation on the part of the Jews. The point is made by mentioning the benevolent attitude on the part of Christian Russians towards the Tatars, who were adherents of the Mohammedan faith (p. 12).

The fact that the article was written without malice is demonstrated by the concession that there is a minority of Jews who might be called "righteous Jews" (pp. 13 ff.), to paraphrase a rather condescending expression applied by Jews to Aryans whom they find useful.

The Jews' attitudes described in the article (p. 18) toward the property of members of other races remind me of a quite painful episode in my own life. Shortly after my mother's death in 1979, some young Negroes got into our family house in Cincinnati, which was temporarily unoccupied. They made off with some $25,000 worth of the property of my family, including eight fine old Oriental rugs and parts of my stamp and coin collections. The young Negroes were burglarizing many houses in our part of town and bringing the loot to a Jewish "antique dealer," who had been instructing them (as I later found out) as to what was especially valuable. Eventually the young Negroes were caught and the police took us to the Jew's "antique gallery," where we identified much, but by no means all, of our stolen property. One thing which especially embittered me toward the Jew was his complaining that he was losing about $6,000 by having been caught with enormous amounts of stolen property, as if HIS LOSS were anything to compare with the suffering of all the families whose property he had been buying up at perhaps 5% to 10% of its market value. Having been found guilty of eight counts of burglary, the Negroes whom the Jew had seduced were both sentenced to very long terms. However, not even an indictment was brought against the Jew whose greed for the property of others had caused so much misery.

I might mention one litte but notable detail to clarify a passage on p. 18 of the article. Of course, I do not have the original Russian text of the article by Mme. Ragosin available, but I suspect that the sentence at the bottom of page 18 is a mistranslation. This sentence reads, "....in the Talmud, which lays down as a fundamental axiom that 'the property of Gentiles is even as a waste, free to all' (i.e., all Jews)." I suspect that the correct or more readily understandable translation should have been "just like a desert" rather than "even as a waste."

Sincerely,
Dr. Charles E. Weber

Dear Mr. Dietz 4 April 1985

As usual, the April 1985 issue of Liberty Bell is most informative. For many years I have collected data as to the Holocaust issue and have many of the books you have kept in circulation. I enclose photostats as sent me some years ago, of pages from the "American Jewish Year Book." You will note the figures given as to the Jewish population of Germany as of 1939 are quite at variance with the six million figure. Also, with so much in the news as to the cost of Social Security and Medicare, the items from the "Jewish Press" of 1977 may be of interest. Many people wonder why we are not protected as to dentist bills, etc., yet Medicaid has been paying for a ritual [circumcision—Editor]. Also, the item from "The Patriot," England, 1949, 'The Preparations and Progress of Zionism,' is revealing. . .

Sincerely,
Mrs. D.L.H., Idaho

Dear George: 22 April 1985

The information you sent me about the Zuendel trial and the ADL newsletter really got my blood boiling. I enclose a copy of the letter I sent to the editors of the Toronto newspaper which opposed Mr. Zuendel.

I am also enclosing clippings from newspaper and magazine articles which I have noticed recently. The information in these news items is factual. It is not a matter of the opinion or the emotional bias of one group versus another. I believe if you would encourage all your readers to keep their eyes out for similar information and to make this a regular feature in your Liberty Bell, your work will be even more effective and helpful to all concerned.

Keep up the good work and remember that you are not alone in your struggle.

With best personal regards,
R.R., M.D., Texas

Dear Mr. Dietz: 5 May 1985

Please renew my subscription for another year and send me the books listed below.

I wish I could be a regular contributor, but I can not. Things are terribly bad and are getting worse down here in Argentina. One must be absolutely blind not to see that a few Jews are getting more and more powerful and the Gentiles are losing all power they ever had.

I am tired of wandering from one country to another, especially since I know that anywhere I would go, I would not find much difference except for a temporarily better economic situation. That is why I'll remain here unless things get absolutely unbearable.

Sincerely yours,
G.S., Argentina

Dear Sir: 5 June 1985

A friend of mine gave me the little pamphlet on Ben Franklin and the Jews; I am well aware that a conspiracy exists, and I would love to own every book and pamphlet you sell. I want to make this very important comment at this time, along with placing an order. A friend loaned me one of your books, "The Iron Curtain over America" and I couldn't put it down until I finished reading the whole book. It's dynamite and very revealing. . . I am a member of the V.F.W. and I am going to place an order for ten of these books so that I can get them into the right hands of former Commanders-in-Chief of the V.F.W.

Respectfully yours,

Dear George: 29 May 1985

I hope that you and your loved ones are fine. Since you "hit the headlines" in the Pittsburgh paper I have less difficulty to loan my "Liberty Bell" to the people to read it. Hopefully, things will get tougher and will make our work easier among the "goy sheep." The old "rabbi" is doing remarkably on the radio talk shows. They keep cutting him off and even threatened him because of his strong pro-German views. Nothing can frighten the old man. The next day he comes on stronger. These rotten Yids know that OUR TIME WILL COME!

Please give my regards to your lovely wife.

Best wishes,

Dear George: 31 May 1985

. . .It seems the Jews are working on "anti-hate" laws in Michigan now, which shouldn't surprise me. However, these two enclosed articles from two recent "handouts", sent by the Wisconsin Lutheran Synod to students, did. My mother found our pastor undisturbed by the race-mixing article, except for the father "sinning" by being concerned about his daughters morality, maybe. No verdict on the one equating queers with all us rotten sinners, yet.

I am letting you know this because I believe many of our comrades are adherents of Western Christianity, but may be taken by the "conservative" but respectable holy men who are slowly perverting Western Christianity towards Judaeo-Christianity, with the accompanying destruction of White civilization. I urge such comrades to ask how their churches stand on race-mixing, the Jewish threat, and other immoralities before continuing to finance their destruction voluntarily, as we must now do involuntarily through the wog-loving traitors in Washington, the District of Corruption.

Our ancestors fought the Persians at Thermopolae, the Moors in France, and the Huns in Eastern Europe. For the sake of all civilization, let us now unite against the Untermenschen that are invading at this moment, or watch civilization die! . . .

Our race is in your debt for your superhuman efforts to educate our people. Take care and good luck.

Hail Victory!

Dear George: 11 June 1985

I had a wonderful visit with the Roeders in Germany! Saw Herr Manfred on Monday, 20 May, at Butzbach prison. Frau Traudel drove us there on the Autobahn and three of their children went along. The others were in school, and Albrecht, the oldest, is serving in the Bundeswehr.

Herr Manfred looked real good and was in a jovial mood. Of course he was surprised to see me and it was an honor to shake his hand and wish him well. Naturally he was disappointed that the prison authorities denied him his Christmas leave but he seemd optimistic that things would change for the better. He said they had asked him to do carpenter work for the prison. His wife later told me that this is just another of his talents. She is such a gracious lady and so devoted to her husband and family. And the children all love and respect their parents. I'm so thankful to have had the opportunity to visit with them. I even helped prepare the "Rundbrief" for mailing. Also got a lot of practice speaking German with the family.

When I left, I was undecided where to go next so Frau Roeder suggested the town of Hannoversch-Muenden and also the city of Detmold and the "Hermannsdenkmal." Both were excellent choices. The "Fachwerkhaeuser" in Hann. Muenden were beautiful, and so many of them. It rained in Detmold, but I went to the top for a view. Also visited "Die Wacht am Rhein" at Ruedesheim. Had a great trip with many fond memories. I even went to Bitburg a week ahead of the President. There was much controversy over the visit in the controlled German press and so I went to take a look. Had to take a bus from Trier, then a cab out to the cemetery to pay my respects.

Had almost 7 weeks in Europe and enjoyed every minute of it! One of the highlights, naturally, was the visit with the Roeder family and I thought you would be interested. They both send their very best wishes to you for your good work, and so do I. I am enclosing check for $25. to renew my subscription.

Alles Gute!

What a great Article "The Case Against the Holocaust" in your March issue of the "Liberty Bell" proved to be—a real knock-out. Enclosed find five bucks for several copies. Dear Mr. Dietz: 17 June 1985

Enclosed is my contribution for June. . . On 26 May my mother was walking home from the bus stop at night and some blond junkie punk ran up to her from behind and grabbed her. "I've got a knife, and if you scream, I'll kill you." She screamed and he ran away. America the beautiful! Not one day goes by in which I do not regret Hitler's defeat in 1945. I had told my mother to call me up when she is coming home from work, so that I could meet her at the bus stop (I have to walk the doberman/labrador anyway).

My response? I am now the proud owner of a Harrington-Richardson .32 magnum revolver with a 4" barrel, and when the punk is identified, he and his family will pay the price.

Heil Hitler!

Dear Kinsman: 25 June 1985

My renewal was in my last week's mailing. We are pleased that you are continuing L.B. R.P. Oliver's articles are always interesting and informative, and the article in the June L.B.—"Russian Jews and Gentiles"—was VERY informative and interesting. When one reads what "little" Free Press we have left, one understands why our enemies want our TRUE Free Press ended. Surely you must get a great satisfaction out of YOUR patriotic and courageous actions of informing your readers monthly of such truths! Surely you must be proud of your outstanding efforts to awaken our kinsmen to the fact that our Western heritage and culture, our White Race, is in a total war for survival! Your action proves YOUR HONOR—AND PATRIOTISM—is anything more important?

Dear George: 2 July 1985

Enclosed is my check for $25 to renew my subscription.

To change the subject slightly, your last "Bell" with the Kahalla operations in Russia was more than of passing interest. The insights of the minds involved were like a floodlight put out into a great darkness. If you hadn't published anything else these past two years, that one article would have been ample compensation.

But that is not to denigrate anything else; Mr. Zuendel's trials and tribulations and his attitude as court jester (seems the Jews have no real sense of humor on sensitive things; on the other hand, we can and do laugh at our own foibles and make music out of it; Johann Strauss wrote music on talking ladies (Trish-Trash Polka), excursion trains (Excursion Train Polka) complete with sound effects, etc., etc., and so forth.) Your other writers and contributors, of course, make the "Bell" one of the best, and we really make up what White men really are. . .

For the furtherance of the Cause

KEEP THE LIBERTY BELL RINGING!

Please remember: Our fight is Your fight! Donate whatever you can spare on a regular—monthly or quarterly—basis. Whether it is $2., $5., $20., or $100. or more, rest assured it is needed here and will be used in our common struggle. If you are a businessman, postage stamps in any denomination, are a legitimate business expense—and we need and use many of these here every month, and will be gratefully accepted as donations.

Your donations will help us spread the Message of Liberty and White Survival throughout the land, by making available additional copies of our printed material to fellow Whites who do not yet know what is in store for them.

Order our pamphlets, booklets, stickers, and—most importantly—our reprints which are ideally suited for mass distribution at reasonable cost. Order extra copies of Liberty Bell for distribution to your circle of friends, neighbors and relatives, urging them to subscribe to our unique publication. Our bulk prices are shown on the inside front cover of every issue of Liberty Bell.

Pass along your copy of Liberty Bell, and copies of reprints you obtained from us, to friends and acquaintances who may be on our 'wave length,' and urge them to contact us for more of the same.

Carry on the fight to free our White people from the shackles of alien domination, even if you can only join our ranks in spirit. You can provide for this by bequest. The following are suggested forms of bequests which you may include in your Last Will and Testament:

1. I bequeath to Mr. George P. Dietz, as Trustee for Liberty Bell Publications, P.O. Box 21, Reedy WV 25270 USA, the sum of $ . . . . . for general purposes.

2. I bequeath to Mr. George P. Dietz, as Trustee for Liberty Bell Publications, P.O. Box 21, Reedy WV 25270 USA, the following described property . . . . . for general purposes.

SOME QUOTABLE QUOTES FROM AMERICA'S DECLINE

On the 18th Amendment (Prohibition): "Very few Americans were sufficiently sane to perceive that they had repudiated the American conception of government and had replaced it with the legal principle of the 'dictatorship of the proletariat,' which was the theoretical justification of the Jews' revolution in Russia."

On Race: "We must further understand that all races naturally regard themselves as superior to all others. We think Congoids unintelligent, but they feel only contempt for a race so stupid or craven that it fawns on them, gives them votes, lavishly subsidizes them with its own earnings, and even oppresses its own people to curry their favor. We are a race as are the others. If we attribute to ourselves a superiority, intellectual, moral, or other, in terms of our own standards, we are simply indulging in a tautology. The only objective criterion of superiority, among human races as among all other species, is biological: the strong survive, the weak perish. The superior race of mankind today is the one that will emerge victorious—whether by its technology or its fecundity—from the proximate struggle for life on an overcrowded planet."

FREEDOM OF SPEECH—FREEDOM OF THOUGHT
FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION

The editor-publisher of Liberty Bell does not necessarily agree with each and every article in this magazine, nor does he subscribe to all conclusions arrived at by various writers; however, he does endeavor to permit the exposure of ideas suppressed by the controlled news media of this country.

It is, therefore, in the best tradition of America and of free men everywhere that Liberty Bell strives to give free reign to ideas, for ultimately it is ideas which rule the world and determine both the content and structure of culture.

We believe that we can and will change our society for the better. We declare our long-held view that no institution or government created by men, for men, is inviolable, incorruptible, and not subject to evolution, change or replacement by the will of the people.

To this we dedicate our lives and our work. No effort will be spared and no idea will be allowed to go unexpressed if we think it will benefit the Thinking People, not only of America, but the entire world.

SALT ON THE BOOBY'S TAIL

Among the pests that afflict us in summer, and more annoying than flies and mosquitos, are swarms of addle-pated little zombies, hatched out in the public schools, who squawk as they "demonstrate" against nuclear weapons. It is unlikely the little creatures know what they are saying. They merely make a noise, and they can repeat any simple phrase their trainers teach them before sending out a swarm to distract attention. The zombies are squawking about nuclear weapons today; yesterday, they were making the same sounds about apartheid in South Africa; tomorrow, they may be screeching about "Nazis" or "abortions." I remember having seen a swarm of them scuttling and scrambling around a high school in southern California; they were "demonstrating," as I recall , against the Birch Society, but were noteworthy because their "Liberal" teachers had managed to scrub them and dress them in clean clothes before opening the doors of their zoo.

What is remarkable about these demonstrations of Schwärmerei is that so many Americans, instead of calling the fire department to hose off the street, seem to think that the squawking means something more than, say, the racket that comes from a frog pond in the evening.

Equally odd is the strange disposition of some Americans to pay attention to what are called "SALT talks" that have been going on for years in Geneva. The purpose of those talks is unknown. Some persons think the purpose is to reduce the risk of unemployment among the call girls of Geneva. Others think that it may be an elaborate psychological experiment to determine how long human beings can utter meaningless jabber without becoming certifiably mad. If one read the pontifications of the scribblers in newspapers or watched a song-and-dance act that is used to fill in idle moments on the White House show, one would suppose that the Americans and Russians who draw salaries to stay in Geneva were "negotiating" about an agreement on the part of the Soviet to limit its manufacture of certain kinds of weapons. And while I try not to seem overly pessimistic in my estimates of my contemporaries, I must admit that there are indications that a considerable number of Americans believe such a thing to be possible. If that seems unlikely, remember there are Americans who believe in virgin births, ghosts that haunt houses, and the equality of races. If they can believe things like that, they can also believe in magic spells that would so enchant and stupefy the Soviets that they would not equip themselves with every kind of weapon they deem effective.

Now any intelligent man would know that the masters of the Soviet, not being nincompoops with skulls filled with drivel about "world peace" and "peaceful coëxistence," are equipping themselves with every military weapon they deem effective and endeavoring to develop new and better ones.* It

(*) A publication called the Washington Report in its issue for August 1985 gives some details, partly from secret American documents recently declassified, of the enormous superiority of the Soviet over the United States in weapons now ready for use and the overwhelming superiority that will be attained by the proximate production of a large number of new and even more effective weapons devised by Soviets' scientific research (much of which, no doubt, has been done in the United States) for which there is no American counterpart. The Washington Report is the house-organ of the National Security Council, which, if you send them enough money, will try to talk the Congress into taxing you some more for weapons, since so much of the present Budget must go to finance the Jews' massacre of Semites in Asia Minor. The Council hopes to influence a Congress which has complacently watched while every administration in Washington, from Eisenhower to Reagan, has worked for the Soviets and carried out for them their encirclement of the United States, beginning with the establishment of a base in Cuba and continuing step-by-step to the recent transfer to the Soviets of strategically located islands off the coast of Alaska in preparation for the eventual occupation of Alaska. The Congress not only watched the Communist encirclement but took an active part in it by stripping the American boobs of their Panama Canal. The Council does not estimate how many tons of gold would be needed to buy a few ounces of patriotism from the Congress of the United States.

On the subject of our weapons, there is a book by Daniel Ford, The Button, published this month, which raises the question, "If the Soviets should attack the United States with intercontinental missiles, could the United States mount a counter attack?" Mr. Ford's answer: "Probably not." (What that suggests to him, naturally, is more gabble about world peace-posh.) It would be interesting to know how many of our enormously expensive missiles would really work. Some years ago, there was a test of the "Minuteman" missiles that were then touted as a sure-fire deterrent of the Soviet. It took the experts more than half an hour to get one of the things out of its underground silo in North Dakota. And before the is also obvious that in devising new weapons they must make experiments which, given modern methods of detection, must be known to properly equipped observers in civilized nations. It therefore follows irrefragably that the Soviets' collaborators in Washington and the Jews' newspapers for goyim are simply lying when they pretend to know nothing of the ever increasing superiority of the Soviets in weapons. This may, however, be of little practical importance, since no matter what weapons the United States might have, the alien government of this country would never permit them to be used against the Soviets anyway.

About twenty years ago, seemingly reliable information from within the Soviet Union indicated that a place named Plesetsk, in sparsely inhabited territory about 125 miles due south of Archangel (the port on the White Sea), and perhaps at others, the Soviets were conducting intensive experiments to develop more effective nuclear weapons, although they cheerfully signed scraps of paper that purported to "outlaw" such research, since they were willing to humor nitwits when they could conveniently do so. There were efforts to give this information to the few Americans who are interested in the possible survival of their kind, but the reaction of "Liberal intellectuals" is as automatic as the reaction of chickens when a hawk flies above their pen, and it was authoritatively proclaimed that only "neo-Nazi alarmists" would spread such damnable falsehoods.

I now learn from the Skeptical Inquirer (Summer 1985) that as long ago as 1983 the official Soviet newspaper, Pravda, admitted the existence of the missile center at Plesetsk, and that late in 1984 two Russian scientists publicly admitted that such experimentation was in progress. Furthermore, in its issue for Spring 1983, the Inquirer reported (pp. 7 f.) the finding by James E. Oberg that many reported sightings of "flying saucers" (now called "unidentified flying objects," UFOs in the strange jargon of journalists, who imitate the Communists' use of acronyms) were really the reëntry into the atmosphere of Soviet missiles designed to carry nuclear warheads in a coming war. Characteristically, the Soviets, who had signed a treaty that established an "international law" that "outlawed" such tests, had published in the hunk of well-printed propaganda that is distributed to Americans at the expense of American taxpayers, Soviet Life, articles with "scientific" reports on "authentic" observations of "UFOs," and the Soviet Academy of Sciences published an elaborate report on such "authentic" but "unexplained" sightings of flying saucers, which excited and vastly elated Americans wo want to believe in wizards from distant planets or want to make money out of suckers.

"Minuteman," there was the appallingly expensive "Titan," which was never intended to work at all, since, as one of the subcontractors disclosed before he was silenced, it was so designed that its fuel lines would almost certainly clog, if it were fired.

I was a little amused some years ago when I supplied a statement to a group of earnest people who were trying to discourage the wave of almost hysterical nonsense about "UFOs" at that time. I said that it was indubitable now that all reports of "flying saucers" are either hoaxes, optical illusions, hallucinations, or the lies that are told by inferior people who want to attract notice, except that certain sightings could well be of secret weapons produced experimentally by research technicians in Israel or the Soviet Union. My statement was used except my exception. The group evidently felt that it would be simply wicked to suggest that the saintly Jews or the high-minded Communists might be doing anything secretly. And they felt that, although I had merely named the two countries, and had left to intelligent readers to recognize them as enemies of the American people, although not of the American people's rulers, who rule in the interests of our evidently allied, if not identical, enemies.

On 16 March and 3 July 1984, huge clouds, glowing as though with reflected incandescence, appeared in the evening skies above Argentina and Chile, producing, of course, a great deal of excitement among mercurial people. The current Skeptical Inquirer, no doubt correctly, identified the phenomon as caused by the firing of the fourth stage of a rocket carrying an intercontinental missile that the Soviet will equip with activated nuclear warheads when the time comes. I assure you that such missiles do not know they are "outlawed," and would not in the least deviate from their course if they did.

In the meantime, however, there is a very large number of Americans who believe in "international law," "flying saucers," "brotherhood," leprechauns, and ghosts. Even the most resolute optimist cannot deny that damning fact. And such persons naturally talk seriously about "negotiations" to "limit armaments" and "SALT agreements."

As Euphues said, "It is a foolish bird that stayeth the laying of salt on her tail." Hence our proverb, which, so far as I know, comes from Lyly, although we may doubt that there are such birds.

There is, however, a species of small gannet, now nearing extinction, that is so extraordinarily stupid that sailors can entice one to alight on or near the deck of a ship, using almost any kind of lure, and then wring its neck. Now although the etymological dictionaries would have it the other way around, I am quite sure that sailors called those small gannets 'boobies' because of their obvious similarity to the boobs who people our great "democrcy."

ACQUIRED IMMUNITY DEFICIENCY AND RACE

In Liberty Bell for May 1985, I commented on indications that the disease generally designated by the acronym AIDS, propagated by male homesexuals, seemed lethal only to our race and, probably, mongrels who had a significant admixture of our racial genes. In its August issue, Instauration publishes, from an unstated source, statistics that classify by race 4,943 "Americans" who, on 30 June 1984, had died or were then suffering from the disease. The percentages given are:

White	58.18%
Black	25.23%
Hispanic	14.44%
Other	0.32%
Unknown	1.82%

The Negro population in the United States, taken as a whole, contains from 20% to 25% of White blood, and includes many quadroons and octoroons, who are more White than Black (and correspondingly intelligent), and since 'Hispanic' is now misused to designate mestizos, who have White and Indian blood in varying proportions, the statistics are about what one would expect on an hypothesis that the disease, perhaps endemic in a milder form among pure-blooded Congoids, is made virulent by some genetic weakness peculiar to our race and transmitted by some of our racial genes. Other explanations are possible, of course, but, for the reasons stated in my "Postscript," are less plausible.

Statistics will become significant when the classification of the victims is made scientific. The term 'White' lumps together radically different races, Aryans, Jews, Semites,[1] and others;

1. It may be significant that there are no reports of an epidemic of Ac-and when we know what percentage of victims are Aryan, we shall then want to know how many are Nordic, Alpine, Mediterranean, or Dinaric-Baltic. Blacks and Mestizos should be classified by percentages of White blood, since it is unlikely that the racial component of the non-negro blood could be ascertained in many cases. Most anthropological determinations would be approximations and there would be a large margin of error, but even so the results would be significant, if a serious study of the malady is to be undertaken.

Reports of research on this malady seem to be somewhat less inhibited in England than in this country. Americans who spoke on the subject in Britain recently said that in the United States they were under great pressures to conceal the gravity of the growing epidemic, lest knowledge of the facts generate some prejudice against the darling perverts.[2] (It might even check the campaign to make male homosexuality ever more fashionable among Aryans and especially Nordics, who are, of course, the target of the efforts to promote that form of race-suicide.)

The repression of which American research workers complained in England seems to have been discontinued, at least in part. The widely-read periodical, Newsweek, featured a series of articles on "AIDS" in its issue for 12 August 1985, making it clear that "no one has ever recovered from the disease," that "the number of cases is doubling each year," that an individual may be infected for many years before the disease becomes virulent and produces its first symptoms, and that "once infected, a person is infectuous for the rest of his life" and may even infect persons who will die of the disease before he is aware that he has it himself. The African origin of the malady was recognized, but there was, naturally, obfuscation to prevent recognition of racial differences. It was reported that a means of identifying infected blood and thus preventing transmission of the disease by transfusions in hospitals was believed to be accurate, but it was admitted that there was no certainty that the test was infallible. Females may be infected sexually by males or otherwise by contact with infected blood and then transmit the disease to a child in the womb.

The articles in Newsweek will augment the concern felt by many Americans, but the majority will doubtless react as they do to mention of their present national plight: they will try to avoid hearing or reading anything unpleasant or, if they cannot do that, will steadfastly refuse to think about it.

The October issue of the Scientific American is almost entirely devoted to articles about the "molecules of life," ribonucleic and deoxyribonucleic acids. One of these deals with the functioning of the immune system, of which the intricacy is baffling. No one seems to know, for example, how the lymphocytes produced by the thymus control the immune system—if they do! There is no mention of Acquired Immunity Deficiency, but the reader will infer that we do not even know what it is that the prion or virus of the disease destroys.

In Britain, concern over the smouldering epidemic has been greatly increased by the death in August of the Earl of Avon, who was the spokesman of Mrs. Thatcher's kosher government in the House of Lords. He was the son of Anthony Eden, for quired Immunity Deficiency among the predominantly Semitic populations of the Near and Middle East, among whom homosexual perversion is, so to speak, practically normal. These are the countries that Sir Richard Burton, a diligent and experienced observer, called the "Sotadic zone," on which see his appendices to his translation of the Arabian Nights. There have been many attempts to discredit Sir Richard since he published a book in which he did not stand in awe of Jews (thus sacrificing his career in the British consular service), but tourists in those regions who look beneath the surface know that he was right. Sir Richard, it must be remembered, was so fluent in the various dialects of Arabic, so keen an observer of the mentality of the Semitic races, and so courageous that he traveled throughout part of the Orient disguised as an Arab and, posing as an orthodox Moslem, he entered even places, such as Mecca, where he would have been killed, had it been suspected that he was an Aryan. He started from India, where his fluency in Urdu enabled him to observe intimately the descendants of the predominantly Semitic hordes that followed Mahmud of Ghazni (A.D. 1001) and later conquerors into India. Probably no other member of our race could have observed so closely the mores and domestic life of the inhabitants of the "Sotadic zone."

2. Although some instances of male homosexuality are simply the results of biological degeneration, the perversion has been made so common in the United States and elsewhere by the intensive advertising campaign that is conducted through the press, the schools, and the pulpits. Even more fundamental as a causative factor is a society that has been so structured that many thoughtful and conscientious Aryan men refuse to engender children to suffer the horrors of the future that Americans are so zealously preparing for themselves. Incidentally, the articles in Newsweek that I mention below remind one again that the prostitutes of the press are willing to prostitute even their mother tongue by using the adjective 'gay' to designate male homosexuals. Literate persons will not be deterred by the journalistic pimps and will continue to use English correctly.

whom the Earldom of Avon was created in 1961 as a reward for his work in hastening the dismemberment of the British Empire and the reduction of once Great Britain to the Little Britain of today. Although their title was of such recent creation, the Edens did have noble blood, since they were descended from a cadet line of the Barons Auckland. The death of Anthony Eden's son was immediately caused, according to the death certificate, by meningoencephalitis, a deadly inflammation of the brain that often follows Acquired Immunity Deficiency, and it was finally admitted that his death was really the result of that deficiency (see the Sunday edition of the (London) Mail, 25 August 1985). Baron Denham, who succeeded the Earl of Avon as Maggie Thatcher's spokesman in the House of Lords, told the press, when the real cause of death became known, that the deceased Earl had "a great number of friends who would be very upset." No wonder!

PROPHETIC FICTION

An odd coincidence has brought me The "F" Certificate, by David Gurney (London,, Bernard Geis, s.a. [1968?]). It is not literature—but who would expect to find great art of any kind in the nightfall of civilization? It is what is called "a novel of suspense," vividly written and with a plot contrived to keep the reader in a suspense and emotional excitement to the very end, even if he realizes that the effect is obtained, as is inevitable in such stories, by sequences of improbable coincidences and odd blunders by intelligent characters. And, of course, the reader must be left with the satisfaction of a miraculously happy ending. But Gurney's book is much more than that.

The text is preceded by the notice, "The time of this story is the immediate future." That was true by extrapolation from the present when the book was written, and it will soon be true again. We are now only in the lull between two waves.

The protagonist is an Englishman of good family who has attained a considerable success as a producer of high-grade motion pictures, in partnership with a talented director, a "refugee" from Mitteleuropa. Although no one would dare say so explicitly, the partner is obviously a Kike, who naturally stabs the Englishman in the back financially, partly from greed, but primarily, as he confesses, because he hates gentlemen. He plans to use the studios to produce films of the hardest "hard-core" pornography to induce and spread corruption by exciting the sexual urge that is innate in all viable species of mammals and in our species has been further acuminated by the Judaeo-Christian notion of sexual magic. Only the strongest minds can resist the corrosive effect of such morbid excitation. Greed does enter into the Yid's motives, but he is supplied with large sums of money from unidentified sources to achieve his purpose, which obviously cannot be that of capital investment. It is clear that his greed is merely superficial: he is driven by an innate lust to pollute, to defile, to destroy a civilization he instinctively hates, and to that end he is prepared to sacrifice everything, including his own children. In this part of the story there is a fundamental and timeless truth—a fact of life that it is suicidal to ignore.

The extrapolation from the present brings us to a time in which the "hippie culture," as it is called, has reached its natural result. And that result is, of course, the calculated product of the powerful but clandestine forces that created the "hippies" in our time, who, as everyone not befuddled by the press and boob-tubes must see, are a form of cunningly induced degeneracy. In the story, the nigger-noise, sometimes oddly called "rock music," has been reduced to its primitive essentials, a rhythm destructive of sanity and producing by itself the kind of addiction that we witness daily, when we see scantily clothed individuals out "jogging" but carrying tiny radio receivers to produce the din that keeps their minds in abeyance. The improved "hippies" of the story are equipped with such miniature noise-boxes, which also have a hole through which the victim can see "psychadelic" splinters of light that have an hypnotic effect.

The marijuana of today has been a little improved and is purveyed in pills that produce more vivid and constant hallucinations and are as addictive as heroin. The drugged creatures become mindless zombies with latent criminal instincts and are, of course, easily manipulated by their masters. The degenerates, known as "drummers" from the loud sounds produced by their noise-boxes, are, of course, nourished and fostered by the hellish travesty of a society called the "Welfare State." They are equipped with motor scooters and wander in packs. They have a distinctive "unisex" costume, so that males and females are indistinguishable in appearance, and they naturally include many specimens of physical degeneracy, flat-chested animals that can be classified anatomically as female, and pudgy animals that have to be called male for want of a more specific word. Roaming in packs on their motor vehicles, they terrorize the countryside and population so rotted with humanitarian idiocy that individuals flee instead of simply shooting the creatures as one would shoot a rabid dog. In a sane world, shooting the anthropoid pests would be recognized as a duty civilized men owe to their society, but in a country as rotted as our own now is with the dregs of Christianity, people gabble about the "sanctity of human life." And when some of the creatures are arrested and put on trial for one of their killings on impulse, even more poisonous vermin appear in the guise of "sociological experts," complete with academic titles and honors, who argue that the degenerates "are not criminals. They are children lost in a hostile world." Whether the great sociologists are moronic or hired by the occult forces that are determined to abolish us, is always uncertain. There are doubtless both kinds, equally pernicious.

So there you have the substance of Mr.Gurney's astonishing book—astonishing because it could be published by a major publisher in England (though not in the United States) today. It is based on a fundamental fact of our dying civilization, and its "immediate future" is like the line of a graph that records an overall progression and is logically projected beyond the immediate present. If you want a vivid portrayal of what I have briefly described, or if you want only a tale of suspense that you will be compelled to read to its conclusion, read the book, but remember that the author had to sweeten it with some unwarranted optimism.

A STRANGE BOOK

War Cycles—Peace Cycles (Lynchburg, Virginia, Virginia Publishing Co., 1985) is a paperback volume of 250 pages printed by photo-offset from a good computer's print-out. Although the type is ordinary typewriter type with bold face produced by the usual overprinting, justified but without the ugly gaps between words that are so often found on such print-outs, the result is a readable text, almost as comfortable to one's eyes as normal printing. I thought this worth mentioning because this is the first successful use of this technique that I have seen. It is certainly not to be preferred to orthodox printing, but it may be sufficiently more economical to justify its use for books that will have a very limited circulation. This is such a book.

It deals with a fundamental and crucial problem in political economy, and it furthermore offers an analysis of the present plight of the American people from which can be made a cogent extrapolation to forecast the immediate future of the nation and even probable trends in the stock and commodity markets, but it will have a very limited readership. I do not refer to the well-known fact that most Americans are determined to avoid the painful sensations in their cerebrum that would be caused by serious thought. I consider only the tiny minority that is not afraid of cerebration. Of that minority, approximately 0.2% will read beyond the first few pages or go far enough to find out what the book is really about. The author has seen to that. That is what makes the book so strange.

War Cycles—Peace Cycles is the work of Richard Kelly Hoskins, who will be remembered for Our Nordic Race, published in 1958. But he is a changed man. He tells us that at four o'clock in the afternoon of Wednesday, the twenty-eight of April, 1965, he got Jesus. And Jesus, I am sorry to say, got him.

When the reader reaches p. 3 of this book, he faces a salvo of four quotations from Holy Writ, which prove that usury is wrong because the god who dictated the passages from Deuteronomy and inspired the others said it was streng verboten to charge interest on loans to one's fellow tribesmen, although it was entirely proper to exact usury to exploit members of other races.[1] So at p. 3 rational men, who are always confronted

1. Mr. Hoskins properly restores the antithesis that is obscured in English Bibles by translating as 'brothers' words that mean 'kinsmen,' and translating as 'strangers' two entirely different sets of words, viz. (1) ĞR and TWŠB, which designate racial kinsmen who reside in foreign lands, and (2) ZWR, NKR, and NKRY, which refer to members of alien and therefore enemy races. A quick check in a good lexicon, with reference to passages cited, will show that Mr. Hoskins is right, although there are some occurrences of ĞR and perhaps other words in contexts in which they, especially when applied to things, seem to mean only 'unfamiliar.' I should perhaps remark that I simply transliterate Hebrew words, whereas Mr. Hoskins uses the vowels that were consistently supplied in Biblical texts by the Jewish Massoretes in the Ninth and Tenth Centuries. Vowels were earlier indicated in a few proper names to make them misleading, e.g., 'Jesus' was converted into 'Joshua' when the failure of the christs bearing that extremely common name made it unpopular in Jewry, and YHWH, which we know to have been pronounced Yahweh at one time, was changed to with many more books of possible interest than one human being could find time to read, exclaim "Jesus, a christ!" while Mr. Hoskin's book is describing an arc into the waste basket. And they never find out what it is about.

Quotations from Scripture make Christians purr, of course, and they read on eagerly, but even they are a little worried by p. 3. Some of them believe that although their god helped his pet tribe of swindlers and killers prey on the rest of mankind in "Old-Testament" times, he became peeved when they crucified and temporarily killed a big piece of him, and seeing he had made a big mistake in ever trusting them, he wrote them off as a loss and decided to try "converted" goyim for a while. So what he said in Deuteronomy et alibi is obsolete. Other Christians, however, wooed by Jerry Falwell and the other Jesus-jerks who perform on the Jews' boob-tubes, believe their god still dearly loves his old pets and will slap down nations that wickedly imagine it isn't a privilege to have their lowly blood sucked out by divinely ordained vampires. So they will wonder why Mr. Hoskins thinks it wrong for the Jews to use usury on us.

Christians read on in ever greater perplexity until they discover that their god's pet freebooters were not Jews at all. They were the Israelites; they were, in fact, our Nordic ancestors. You see, the temperamental old god up in the clouds got into a huff one day and let Babylonians and Assyrians carry our ancestors into exile farther east. Thence, most of them headed for Northern Europe, including Scandinavia and the British Isles, and their descendants flourished there in ignorance of their exalted ancestry until it was revealed to them in 1822 by a certain Richard Brothers, who, by a genealogy I cannot trace, was God's Nephew.[2]

Most Christians have never even heard of "British Israel" and "Indentity," but they have been well trained, and they sense

Yĕhōvāh, whence the 'Jehovah' found in English Bibles. The origin of YHWH is obscure; it may have been devised by the Jews when they decided to become henotheists and venerate only one tribal god, to modify the name of their chief male god, whom they had called Y', a word which, as we know from transliterations into languages that wrote vowels, was pronounced Ya'ō. . Henotheism seems to have spread among the Jews in the fifth century B.C., although it was doubtless advocated by some 'prophets' earlier. It made possible the later audacious change from henotheism to monotheism when it became advantageous to emulate Graeco-Roman Stoicism.

2. I commented briefly on "British Israel" in 'Populism' and 'Élitism,' pp. 65 f.

that the idea smacks of "racism," the kind of wickedness that pretends that Aryans are not a species of inferior beings created by Yahweh to serve not only Jews, but niggers and wogs and mongrels from Mexico and Indo-China. Most Christians who have heard of "British Israel" and "Identity," have been told by their dervishes that those are damnable heresies that seduce souls for Satan's psychic barbeques, so they hastily put War Cycles—Peace Cycles in the garbage pail and hasten to cleanse their polluted hands with their favorite germicide.

The readership is now down to the faithful of the strange cults for which educated Aryans must feel a kind of compassionate sympathy, wishing their doctrines were not so historically preposterous. But even veteran devotees of the cults will read Mr. Hoskins with misgivings. He assures us that "everyone knows that the God of Israel is not 'harsh,' but gentle and long-suffering." And he proves it by quoting from Numbers and Deuteronomy passages in which our god explicitly commands us to drive out, without hesitation or mercy, all the inhabitants of countries we take over for ourselves; not only must we drive out every last one of the natives, but we are explicitly ordered that in the lands we occupy, "thou shalt save alive nothing that breatheth: but shall utterly destroy them," as, indeed, we did when we occupied Canaan and slew not only all human beings but also the cattle and the dogs and everything that lived and moved. Now that divine commandment makes Aryans uneasy. Granting that we sinned grievously in God's sight when we occupied North America and did not simply exterminate all the aborigines, and granting that we have been chastised for that sin, for the Indians that we so sinfully spared have been a perpetual nuisance, as God warned us they would be, still we cannot quite bring ourselves to believe that it was also our duty to exterminate all the deer and the buffalo and the wolves (animals especially dear to our race)[3] and the pigeons and the song birds and just everything else that was alive and breathed. I am sorry. It may be just proof that we are a weak people who find it hard to keep God's Commandments and deserve his favor, but while we may see the wisdom of obeying him and exterminating other races, who are necessarily our enemies and should not be tolerated in lands that we have taken for our own, and while we may furthermore have no reluctance about exterminating animals that are useful to us or that we instinctively like. So even "British Isrelites" who perservere and read Mr. Hoskins' book, will do so uneasily, wishing they had not been reminded of religious duties they would prefer to forget.

All this is a great pity, because the barrage laid down by Jesus-Yahweh's howitzers will exclude from the book's pages almost all of the persons (including a few Christians) who could understand Mr. Hoskins' real subject and appreciate the learning and prudential judgement he brings to it.

We must charitably disregard Mr. Hoskins' strange notions that the Jews are the descendants of the Samaritans (!) and of the various other peoples who occupied the land left vacant by the deportation of the Nordic Israelites, and the Jews were later augmented by the too famous Khazars, and we must ignore the even stranger modification of this revelation by the claim that while most of the Nordics transported themselves in some way to the Northland,[4] a passel of them remained in Babylon and later (after they had betrayed that city and empire to Cyrus the Great) returned to Jerusalem, where, alas! they were called Jews because they lived in Judaea and were confused with the real Jews. (This makes it possible to make Jesus-God our Nordic relative, but it reminds one of some of the most disgusting canards that have been excited by a yen to make that transformation.[5]) But when we have shoveled away the last layer of

4. The "British Israelites," if I am not mistaken, offer no explanation of the great mass-migration of our ancestors. Since the Orient Express was not running in those days, the homing Nordics' trek overland must have been a memorable event, with old Yahweh perhaps leading His People in person, disguised as a cloud by day and a pillar of fire by night. Some Israelites might have taken passage on the first ship sailing to London or Bremen or Oslo, but the majority must have had to march overland. It is a pity that no early "British Israelite" had the happy idea of composing a gospel, an Ephodus, that could have begun with a stirring account of how our valiant ancestors escaped from the Assyrians who had taken them captive. Some good gospels were composed in the Nineteenth Century; I mentioned a few in Liberty Bell, February 1984, p. 2.

5. I cannot begin to say how weary I am of the old chestnut, which I recently saw hauled out again in an item in a periodical I respect, that there is no mention of 'Jews' in the original texts of the Bible; that is, of course, perfectly correct, and it is also true that there is no mention of God or sin or righteousness or even a person named 'Jesus' (pronounced 'Gee-sus'). That, of course, is obvious, since the texts were written in Hebrew, Aramaic, and Greek, and nothing could have been written in modern English until after the time of Chaucer, at the very earliest. 'Jew'

Jesus-jargon, we find that Mr. Hoskins gives a succinct account of the ways in which the Jews preyed upon our race in Europe after the fall of the Roman Empire—an account that is historically accurate, except for a few slight slips and oversights.[6]

The Jews did not invent usury, but that has always been their principal means of predation. So long as Europe was Christian and usury was forbidden to Christians by the Church, the Jews had a monopoly of banking, except insofar as some Christians may have been willing to realize profits at the cost of being damned forever.

This takes the author to a consideration of the disastrous effects of usury on an organized society and of the sheer fatuity of an economic system based on debt. It has now reached sheer lunacy, since everyone knows the aggregate indebtedness, public and private, in the United States will never be paid—never could be paid, since it not only exceeds by many thousandfold the amount of available currency, but greatly exceeds the total value of all property, public and private.

A people that tolerates usury is automatically reduced to serfdom, since "the borrower is the servant of the lender," and the great international bankers, the Jews and the unscupulous Aryans whom they find expedient to take as confederates for protective covering, now have all Americans by the neck and can do whatever they wish with the tax-paying animals. They compel all corporations and businesses to pay them usurious is simply the modern derivative of Iūdaeus, the Latin form of the Greek word for that strange people. I am also heartily sick of the snide evasion that Iūdaeus meant a 'Judaean,' not a 'Jew.' The noun Iūdaea simply means 'land of the Iūdaei,' and those people were so called because they gave themselves that name, the Greek being derived from Hebrew YHWDH, which seems to have been pronounced something like Yehūdah, and was contracted to YDH, Yūdāh, applied to the descendants of the famous Jacob, who swindled his brother Esau by the well-known trick by which he cheated his blind father. 'Judah', as a personal name, becomes 'Judas' in English. I know that it is absurd to expect simple honesty of holy men, but I do wish they would make their impostures on the ignorance of their congregations less crude.

6. E.g., although he is well aware of Marranos in Spain and elsewhere, he tells us that when 16,000 of the pests were run out of England in 1290, "this handful was all there were," and he does not see that many Jews must have had themselves sloshed with holy water and remained in England to prey on the natives and genetically pollute their race.

tribute,[7] and at times they encourage the multiplication of small independent banks for the express purpose of later, by financial manipulations, gobling them up at the expense of the unfortunate depositors or the stupid taxpayers.

This crazy system can be maintained only by periodically producing world wars to increase the supply of currency by ruthlessly plundering the befuddled belligerents and squandering the accumulated surplus of foods and manufactured goods. The author, by a detailed examination of events from 1763 to the present with a projection to c. 1988-1992, identifies the regular succession of war cycles, marked by a large-scale war between major military powers, and peace cycles, which are the intervals between major wars, with only a continual succession of local wars. In the planned "peace cycles" the economy, crushed by accumulated usury, climaxes in a period of ruin and destitution, which is then relieved by the war cycle, when an enormous squandering of resources and enormous borrowing to create a fresh supply of fake currency, produces a boom.

In his projection of the immediate future, Mr. Hoskins differs from most Americans, who assume that the big counterfeiting ring will just go on printing paper currency until the stuff becomes worthless and, as happened in Germany and Hungary under Jewish ownership, we will reach a time when a few billion dollars will suffice to buy a palatable meal. Mr. Hoskins believes that the plan is to produce a return to 1933.[8] This will permit the total ruin of American farmers and the transfer of the land they now precariously hold to large corporations, mostly foreign; this will in turn permit the equivalent of the Jewish capture of Russia in 1917, by which a country that exported a large agricultural surplus was transformed into one that could not provide sufficient food for its own population. Thus the American imbeciles can be starved delightfully, increasing, if possible, their abject submission to their masters. Furthermore, the Jews are determined to annihilate the Semites of Asia Minor, especially the Arabs in the oil-producing countries, whom the Jewish governments in Washington and London incited years ago to take over the oil fields that Aryans had opened in those countries. This may be done by driving herds of American cattle, pepped up, as usual, with righteousness and blood-lust, into the Near East to destroy the oil fields, thus putting on the boobs the squeeze for which all preparations have been made by making virtually the whole of the American economy depend in one way or another on imported oil. The miserable nitwits will find their automobiles and buses useless, and will have to learn to walk again, and, of course, most farms will become inoperable, thus helping consume the present surplus of largely devitalized food and hasten starvation.

7. Years ago, a friend of mine, conversing with one of the proprietors of what may be the largest privately held corporation left in this country, was told that the proprietors had to exercise extreme care to avoid offending the Jews, because if they incurred Jewish displeasure, all their bank loans would be immediately called and they would become insolvent. My friend, knowing that the proprietors were all wealthy men and women, probably with good incomes from other investments, asked why they did not forego part of their dividends each year until they were able to operate without paying high interest on loans from the banks. The man replied that they could easily become thus independent of the banks, but that as soon as they tried to do so, their prosperous business would be totally ruined in one way or another. I seem to remember that one of the ways in which the business would be destroyed would be by use of governmental agencies and the press to assure the public that the corporation's products were noxious and unsafe. If my friend reported the conversation correctly, this is a neat example of the financial lords' axaction of tribute from every business, large and small. One hears vague and unverifiable rumors that pressure from the banks forces some corporations to show greater favor to homsexuals, "minorities," and the like, and to advertise their degradation, as they go even beyond what they are required to do by the alien and effectively tyrannical government in Washington.

As for the next war, Mr. Hoskins believes that it is unlikely to

8. Mr. Hoskins specifically foresees default by municipalities on their bonded indebtedness, thus making worthless the tax-free bonds in which prosperous individuals invest to reduce the exactions of Infernal Revenue, and he advises such investors to dispose of their tax-free holdings at the next and perhaps last opportunity to do so, a rally in the market for such bonds in the immediate future. Mr. Hoskins, it should be noted, is a veteran of the brokerage business, now manages portfolios for investors, and publishes Portfolios Investment Advisory, P.O. Box 997, Lynchburg, Virginia, of which he offers a specimen copy to readers of his book. His analyses of the market, one may be sure, do not incorporate advice from Jesus. I disclaim competence in financial matters, and on that understanding I will remark that the only flaw I can see in Mr. Hoskins' extrapolations is that they assume a continuation of the cycles he identifies, and that depends on what the Jews will decide to do to inflict maximum suffering on the Americans who so stupidly let them occupy the United States. Mr. Hoskins, for example, foresees the reënactment of 1933 in 1988 or soon thereafter, i.e., the bottom of the "economic depression" engineered by the Federal Reserve and its accomplices. But 1933 was a major step in the Jews' capture of the United States, and now their ownership of the country is virtually complete and they may think it time for a new tactic, perhaps the race war that Mr. Hoskins also foresees, which would cancel all calculations based on a continuation of the cycle.

be one arranged with the Soviet Union. The encirclement of the United States by the alien government in Washington, begun by establishing a huge Soviet military base in Cuba, carried on by stripping the mindless wights of their Panama Canal, and to be completed by "fighting Communism" in Central America with the result, as in Vietnam, of turning the whole area over to Soviet dominion—this encirclement, he evidently believes, is merely a precaution to make sure that the dumb brutes do not get out of control. An armed invasion of the United States could be mounted promptly, if perchance that should be necessary. It is more probable that the next war will be the civil one for which Washington is preparing so assiduously by importing hordes of our enemies from Mexico, Indo-China, and elsewhere to supplement the vast number of niggers and Jews already here. Our domestic enemies, Mr. Hoskins estimates, now number almost half of the total population and soon will number two-thirds. They can start the joyous work of putting the White nincompoops in their place, doubtless using a large proportion of them as fertilizer on the land, and running the rest into pens in which they will work for their masters and perhaps remember the tales told by their fathers about a time when White men had such fabulous food as porterhouse steaks and apple pies.

Mr. Hoskins' extrapolations, which I do not have time to criticize in detail, are certainly plausible and persuasive. If one accepts them, the future is indeed utterly hopeless and one can only conclude that the dim-witted Aryans are no longer a viable form of mammalian life. But at the end, good old Jesus pops up again. Mr. Hoskins bids us be of good cheer. Two-thirds of us will perish, of course, but Yahweh has promised that he will preserve one-third of us nice Israelites. See Zechariah, 13.8.

So we end where we started. I went through this book for your sake, dear reader, but don't ask me to do it again. □

BOOK REVIEW

THE TRIAL OF THE GERMANS, by Eugene Davidson. New York: The McMillan Company, 1966. Reviewed by Major Donald Vincent Clerkin.

Although the book here reviewed was published in 1966 and is no longer in print, and although its author endorses the Jews' implacable hatred of the German people and the Aryan race, it contains some significant admissions, made at a time when the infamous Holohoax was, for all practical purposes, still unexposed in publications reaching the public. Major Clerkin's new review of it is therefore of current interest. —Editor.

This is an account of the twenty-two defendants before the International Military Tribunal at Nuremberg, usually known as the "Nuremberg Trials" though there were two sets of trials that generally go by that name, the IMT just mentioned and the Nuremberg Military Tribunals (NMT), which were run by the Americans and tried the second echelon of German military and SS leaders.

Davidson dedicated his book to those who conspired against Adolf Hitler in the plot to kill the German leader of July 20th, 1944, which, to the uninitiated, is the case of the briefcase bomb placed next to Hitler's legs in a military conference room in East Prussia. Thus, one gets the idea right off where Mr. Davidson is coming from, and that little that is good will be said of Germany, Germans, and the National Socialist government.

Some facts are brought out which help to clarify the true intent and meaning of the Nuremberg Trials. Each of the jurists who listened to the 'evidence' as presented by the Allied prosecutors had read Hitlerite Responsibility Under Criminal Law, by the Soviet professor of law, A. N. Trainin. In fact, Justice Robert Jackson, the American judge at the Nuremberg Trials, followed very closely Professor Trainin's book in his rulings on defense arguments and motions (p. 14, note), which should give some indication of how 'objective' were the trials of the German leaders. Trainin called the Germans "brigands," and stated that the Soviet Union "would not permit herself to be restricted by traditional legalisms." This was obviously the true spirit of the Nuremberg Trials, where thinking bad thoughts about the Jews and Communism had suddenly become a punishable crime. Nearly everything that Trainin had called for was implemented by the Trials, which were Soviet-style show trials from start to finish.

The American supporters of such 'war crimes' trials thought that this particular international court had ushered in a new world order. The Soviets, who already were aware that the One World ploy was on the agenda of the Western plutocrats, used the trials to pillory their foremost anti-Communist foes, the Germans.

The procedures of the trials were simply this: The Germans were 'guilty' of "crimes against humanity," "crimes against peace," of waging "aggressive war," etc. The Germans were to be declared 'guilty' after the formalism of a trial in which torture had been used to compel testimony by witnesses. German soldiers of the highest ranks were not allowed to wear insignia of rank, so as to preclude enforcement of Geneva Conventions against holding prisoners of war in solitary confinement (p. 21). This was the same, identical procedure used by the North Vietnamese against downed American pilots. It also provided the reason for having Field Marshal Keitel and Colonel General Jodl hanged, not shot, and their cremated remains dumped down a privy at Spandau; though not before Jew members of the 'American' prosecution staff had an opportunity to urinate and defecate on the ashes in the latrine. Jewish hatred and spite knows no limits!

Witnesses who were not indicted by the Nuremberg tribunal often found themselves behind bars for either refusing to answer questions which might incriminate others, or for trying to say too much in defense of the defendants. Consider the case of German Colonel Sottmann, who was willing to testify as to what he knew of British plans to occupy Norway, which Germany managed to pre-empt by just a few hours. Sottmann was locked up and did not get a chance to present this evidence in defense of Admirals Raeder and Doenitz, Field Marshal Keitel, and Colonel General Jodl. (p. 28)

Like the practices of the U.S. Department of Justice and the FBI today, the Nuremberg prosecution frequently locked up wives of the major defendants, so as to force compliance with demands that the defendants confess and give 'evidence' against others. (p. 30)

Defense counsels were not allowed to see documentary evidence before its presentation in court by the prosecution. The court ordered the files of the prosecution to be made available to defense attorneys, but the prosecution staff did everything they could to thwart this order, against which the court did nothing. Allied files on their conduct of the war were not open to the defense at Nuremberg; consequently defense arguments that German troops did no more nor less than Allied troops were challenged as being unsupportable with firm evidence. This was explained away with the blithe statement that the Allies were not on trial at Nuremberg. The victorious Allies felt no obligation to provide fair trials to the defeated Germans. What the Allies had done to the German people in the course of the war was not admissible; the treatment of ethnic Germans in occupied Europe just after the conclusion of hostilities was held to be not germane to the "issues" at hand before the Nuremberg tribunal. And while these trials progressed against the lawful government of the German Reich, the German people were systematically frozen and starved to death under the brutal "Morgenthau Plan."

So the next time someone claims that the Nuremberg trials 'proved' anything against the Germans, remind them of what really went on there. The Trials of the Germans is recommended, but the intelligent Aryan reader must carefully read between the spiteful lines to get the BIG PICTURE. The historical view in the book is distorted by the author's idea that the German National Socialist government was a criminal venture from the beginning. That more than 70 millions of Germans did not agree is little matter to the author, Eugene Davidson. The character studies of the German defendants at Nuremberg are detailed, though highly prejudiced, which reminds us that the most interesting people in the world are old National Socialists—at least in the minds of the neurotic Jew. If you decide to read The Trial of the Germans, then read it for what it tacitly reveals about the motives of the victorious Allies. □

ABC's 20/20 Myopic In "SEEDS OF HATE" REPORT On Farmers And Identity

by
Michael A. Hoffman II

On 15 August 1985,. ABC's 20/20 TV news magazine aired a 22 minute special investigative report, "Seeds of Hate," about the alliance of bankrupt American farmers with the Christian Identity movement. It was anchored by Geraldo Rivera whose chief claim to fame thus far has been his status as an obsequious camp follower of splatter-rock video star Mick Jagger and as the producer of a whitewashing 20/20 report of the Israeli atrocities in Lebanon.

"Seeds of Hate" opened with Rivera giving the ZOG version of the murder of populist farmer Arthur Kirk. Kirk's widow, as well as independent investigators, say that Kirk was shot to death in cold blood by a Nebraska SWAT team who also left behind a possible token of satanical ritual, the remains of the family cat which bore marks of torture.

But instead of giving Mrs. Kirk's version of the events or making any mention of the fact that reporters were not allowed on the scene while Kirk's house was under siege (a modus operandi of Israeli army forces in Lebanon), Rivera mindlessly painted Mr. Kirk as a gun-crazy madman. This is the racist stereotype of American farmers, who won't acquiesce to the theft of their birthright, painted by ABC. Had Kirk been a Black South African militant shot by the police, we can be sure Rivera would have cast serious doubt on the police version of events. But in the assassination of an American patriot and farmer, the cop's account of the shooting is the only account Rivera gives. Rivera is as transparent and phony as the absurd farmer-chic clothing he felt compelled to sport while reporting "down on the farm."

In order to give his report the air of a scoop, Rivera falsely reported that he had made an important "discovery" heretofore unknown. While doing his report on farmers in distress, the hot-shot reporter supposedly learned from his outstanding research methods that there was a mind-blowing link between Christian Identity and the farmers. Rivera got this bit of late-breaking news from Gary Lee Yarbrough, a White Power activist and Christian Identity believer now in prison.

But who is Rivera trying to kid? The connection between the farmers and identity was made by Cable News Network in late 1984 and broadcast nationwide on 30 December in a CNN "Special Assignment" report. In fact, Rivera even used some of the footage from the CNN report for his 20/20 broadcast even as he claimed that his smearing of the farmers and the Christians was a groundbreaking scoop.

This wasn't the only falsehood the comicly mustachioed ABC reporter committed in his exercise in left-wing McCarthyism. In a mini-debate on the Holohoax with a defiant Identity minister, who insisted that Christians died in greater numbers than Jews in the Third Reich, Rivera pompously waved a pornographic photo of a pile of naked corpses from Buchenwald at the minister. "Those are dead Jews," Rivera pontificated. But Buchenwald was one of the camps in Germany proper that interned mostly native Germans—Protestant and Catholic dissenters, Jehovah's Witnesses, petty criminals, and similar non-Jews. The actual Jewish population at Buchenwald was a minority. The Identity minister was right, the photo was of mostly Christians. Rivera was the ignorant one.

If the grievances of the farmers and the Christians are really so "sick," "stupid," and "paranoid" as Rivera claims, why did he feel compelled to omit the central thesis of their grievance against Zionism? Rivera permitted Mrs. Kirk to refer to a plot against farmers on the part of Zionist bankers, to buy up and control the farms. He allowed this statement the better to paint Mrs. Kirk as a paranoid who is fantasizing plots and imaginary scapegoats, thus fitting her into the neat ZOG stereotype available for dismissing inconvenient facts and ideas. But in point of fact, what Mrs. Kirk was intimating—that multinational agribusiness cartels controlled by Zionists as well as their cronies, White Christian renegades, seek to destroy the family farm in order to obtain monopoly control of the food supply—was correct. Rivera could have had that corroborated among populist farm economists in the Midwest. But it was also only part of the story. The best and most telling aspect of the tale was, typically, omitted by ABC TV.

The omission consisted of the overwhelmingly obvious and damning fact that American taxpayers are being forced by a craven, sycophantic Israel-first Congress to pour billions of dollars down the Israeli war machine's rat hole while informing America's farmers that the destruction of their essentially yeoman way of life—the backbone of the Jeffersonian ideal for these United States—is just tough luck.

Rivera couldn't even hint at this reality because it would have shown how understandable it is for American farmers to be exactly what they are—mad as hell. If Rivera and his Zionist paymasters at Capital Cities/ABC Inc. (Leonard Goldenson is chairman of the executive committee), had really wanted to defuse tension, they could have advocated that American taxpayers stop subsidizing the state of Israel with welfare payments that amount to $3,400 for every Israeli family, and use that money to maintain the credit of our American farmers.

While the media engage in their favorite sport of White Patriot baiting, reveling in depictions of our people as blind bigots and ignorant killers, the ominous spectre of Jewish terrorism and religious extremism is on the rise as never before. When will ABC see fit to broadcast a "Seeds of Hate" expose on the West Bank settlers groups like Gush Emunin, whose rabbis recently proclaimed, according to Noam Chomsky, that it is a mitzvah (an act pleasing to their god) to kill Amalek (i.e., Gentiles)? When will they expose Rabbi Kahane and his decree that Jews are superior to goyim and when will this religious extremism be linked to the Jewish "Defense" League terrorists in the U.S. who bomb and bully anyone who disagrees with their version of World War II history or their policy decisions for the Middle East? These reports are not being broadcast because the racist hatemongers who control Hollywood are only interested in promoting stereotypes: White Patriots as haters, Jews as victims, even when the reality is something else.

This writer is not a follower of Christian Identity, although I admire their tenacity and fortitude. But if we must subscribe to a chosen people concept, I nominate America's farmers for that honor. These are the men and women who feed all of our own people, most of Russia, and half of the Third World. They are the most productive people on earth, yet they are a dying breed. Supporting their right to live and flourish is an infinitely more worthy endeavor than bankrolling a foreign nation of Khazar usurpers from Eastern Europe who masquerade as Biblical "Israel."*

* One of the most astonishing and crucial books written about the so-called "Jews", and the occult books they revere, is Theodore Winston Pike's

It is a matter of simple justice and not hate that is the issue. Hate only develops as a natural consequence of injustice and the withholding of the truth, as ABC withheld it on 15 August in a nationwide broadcast.

Israel, Our Duty, Our Dilemna. This book offers outstanding documentation on neo-Zionist hate literature. White Christian truth literature is routinely and boringly referred to with the pejorative, knee-jerk "hate literature" label to prevent compassionate and idealistic Whites from reading it. But the actual existence of a hideous corpus of Zionist hate literature is glossed over by the Swaggarts and the Falwells. Author Pike provides a devastating analysis of these Zionist tomes in his book which ought to be brought to the attention of every Christian who follows along with Swaggart and Falwell for their anti-pornography and anti-abortion stands, but who misses the hidden hook in their idolatry of the state of Israel, a secular political entity on a par with the Old Testament golden calf. THE GREAT HOLOCAUST TRIAL

In the catalogue of heresies, none is regarded by the modern secular-liberal state as more pernicious or offensive than the denial of the Jewish "Holocaust," as dissident German-Canadian publisher Ernst Zündel discovered in the fateful Orwellian year of 1984.

In that year, Zündel was prosecuted for publishing a pamphlet of "Holocaust" revisionism. The ensuing show trial in Toronto in 1985 occupied front pages and television screens throughout Canada and was widely reported in the U.S. and Europe. Surprising admissions from "Holocaust survivors" and historians, and testimony from a world-wide gathering of revisionist scholars, turned the trial away from the objective of the state—to showcase a formal judicial anathema of a 20th Century equivalent of flat-earth advocacy—into the first-ever trial of the extermination allegations. In this remarkable and historic turnabout, the Zündel inquisition became a trial of the "Holocaust" itself.

In this study, journalist Michael A. Hoffman II sketches Zündel's life and evolution as a German human rights activist and provides an intense account of the spectacular trial proceedings, which he recorded as a member of the press gallery. In the book's final section, Mr. Hoffman critiques the Establishment media in terms of the consignment of important trial facts and participants to the "memory hole."

Israeli Aid
What It Costs Americans

by
Robert G. Hazo
reprinted from Arab Perspectives, May 1985

When Israeli Prime Minister Shimon Peres visited the United States some months ago, he said that there would come a time when Israel would no longer need American aid. Viewed in the context of Israel's current, desperate economic plight, the statement has to be seen as an instance of ingenuous stroking or, if disingenuous, then as little more than a pious hope. There is certainly no known Israeli plan for achieving economic self-sufficiency, nor can there be one for the foreseeable future.

Many reasons are offered for the dire Israeli crisis. One is the cost of replacing the hugh losses in planes and tanks in the October 1973 war, particularly since the new weapons systems proved to be so much more expensive than the ones lost. A Phantom jet, which used to be the mainstay of the Israeli air force, cost $2.4 million. By contrast, an F-15 now goes for $24 million.

Another factor, clear now in hindsight, was the Menachem Begin government's election-inspired increase in government subsidies for various commodities that totaled $1.5 billion, a burden inherited by the Peres government. Equally important was the Begin government's removal of currency controls that led to an adverse balance of payments which rapidly drained the Israeli foreign currency reserves and brought the country to the point of bankruptcy.

The cost of the abortive invasion and three-year occupation of Lebanon, conservatively estimated at $3.5 billion, also has played a decisive rôle, as has the continuing expenditure for West Bank settlements. Indexing prices to a rate of inflation that, at times, rose as high as 1,000 per cent per annum only exacerbated the problem. continued on page 33

The Character Of Your Newspaper

How about your press, is it honest? The shocking but truthful answer to that question was given by John Swinton, one of the best-loved newspaper men in the United States, the dean of his profession. At the annual dinner of the American Press Association in 1914, John Swinton, the one-time editor of the New York Times, a Jewish-owned paper, when called upon for a toast to journalism and the press of America, responded as follows:

"There is no such thing as an independent press in America, if we except those of the little country towns. You know this and I know it. Not a man among you dares to utter his honest opinion. Were you to utter it, you know beforehand that it would never appear in print. Anyone who was so foolish as to write his honest opinion would soon be out on the street looking for another job. I am paid $150 a week for keeping my honest opinion out of the paper with which I am connected. You are paid similar salaries for similar conduct and if you or I allowed your honest opinions to appear in one issue of our papers, before twenty-four hours had elapsed we would be out on the street looking for another job and our occupation would be gone. It is the duty of the New York journalist to destroy the truth, to lie, to pervert, to revile, to vilify, to toady and fawn at the feet of mammon, and to sell his country and his race for his daily bread or, what amounts to the same thing, his salary. You know it and I know it, and what folly it is for us to be here today toasting to an independent press. We are the tools and vassals of the rich behind the scenes. We are jumping jacks, marionettes. These men pull the strings and we dance. Our time, our talents, our capacities, and our lives are all the property of these men. We are intellectual prostitutes."

WORLD PRESS CONTROL

While John Swinton was referring to the New York press and in general to the American press, it is not generally known that virtually all forms of the news media and of general public education such as the press, the magazines, the radio, television, book publishing, textbook publishing, the motion pictures and the theater, are owned or controlled by Jews, and that through this control of all forms of the media the mind of the public is controlled. In general, the American public is conditioned to do what the Jews tell them to do, but, of course, that public is too ignorant and stupid to realize it. While that is the situation today in America, and it is the situation as it has existed in the nation for the past sixty years, what is the situation throughout the world concerning the matter of press control? The answer to that question was given at a meeting held in 1897 at Basel, Switzerland. That meeting in 1897, which was held under the sponsorship of Lord Edmond Rothschild of London and Jacob Schiff of New York, Mr. Theodor Herzl, author of the book, The Jewish State, which has been referred to as the Zionists' Guide to World Conquest, arranged for the World Zionist Congress at which 197 delegates met for world planning. At that meeting Mr. Herzl stated:

"We are neither American nor Russian Jews, but only Jews, and our aim is to establish Jewish power throughout the world, and to achieve that goal it is our intention to obtain and maintain Jewish control of the press of the world and thus of the public mind."

Mr. Herzl also stated at that meeting that,

"In the furtherance of that objective, I may note at this time that, with a few exceptions that do not figure at all, the entire press of the world is in our hands."

Behind the figures, however, is a much more fundamental cause of the Israeli predicament. Israel always has lived beyond its means and, since 1973, way beyond its means. It was in those years that Israel acquired the bulk of its national debt of $22.5 billion, the rough equivalent of the current national budget as well as its current GNP, and the highest debt per capita in the world.

Arguing that a third of its budget must go to defense, a major portion for debt servicing and the rest for everything else, Israel has made only token gestures of austerity in slightly reducing subsidies and, thus, allowing prices to rise while putting a ceiling on wages. Since the result in savings was not even within hailing distance of a solution to the problem, Israel asked the United States for more than $4 billion in military and economic assistance for Fiscal Year 1986, plus a one-time emergency fix of $800 million in 1985, over and above the $2.6 billion it has already received this fiscal year. That made a total of nearly $5 billion over the next 18 months, virtually double the 1985 aid level.

In addition, Israel has indicated it will need a hefty $4 billion-plus from the U.S, for each of the subsequent two years, meaning that it was seeking a staggering $15 to $16 billion over the years 1985-1988. Since all of this aid is now in free grants that do not have to be repaid, no one seriously expects that the billions Israel owes from previous years will ever be paid back to the U.S.

Israel's request means, in effect, that it not only proposes to go on living beyond its means but, given the hugh $200 billion or more deficit projected for the U.S. budget, that it intends to live way beyond America's means.

The response of the United States to this dramatic increase in Israeli aid requests was disturbing, to say the least. The Congress was all for granting Israel everything it wanted and more. The Reagan Administration, and specifically Secretary of State George P. Shultz, stalled for several months while Shultz, a noted economist and former Treasury Secretary, insisted that Israel come up with meaningful fiscal and economic reforms to bring its resources in line with its needs. In early May, the administration caved in to congressional pressure and approved almost all of the Israeli request, lamely citing a letter from Peres to Shultz detailing certain reforms that fell far short of what earlier had been described as a must.

Instead of the $800 million emergency additional aid in 1985, Israel will now get $1.5 billion spread out over 1985 and 1986, while economic and military assistance for 1986 will reach $3 billion, a total for the two years of $7.1 billion, which is just a couple of hundred million short of Israel's original request. It should be made clear that neither the Reagan Administration nor the Congress has slammed the door on additional requests for 1986, an election year when Republicans and Democrats traditionally vie with each other in loading Israel with gifts.

All this while Israel continues in its spendthrift ways. Imports generally exceed exports by a wide margin. There are now more autos in Israel, which has no auto industry, than ever before, despite a 100 per cent import tariff. Employment remains high, dropping only slightly from the full employment figure of some 96 per cent, partly because a bloated 40 per cent of the labor force works for the government. A freeze on West Bank settlements is not contemplated. A serious reduction in defense expenditures also does not appear to be in the offing.

Even though the problem is one of guns or butter, the intention of the Israeli government seems to be to avoid that choice. As Peres said when he visited the United States: "Our own problem is to make Israel weak militarily and strong economically, or to sustain our military posture and try to look for economic assistance." In other words, guns and butter, with an increasingly generous bailout from Uncle Sam.

Favors given regularly over a period of time come to be taken as a right and it is hardly stretching credibility to believe that the Israeli government fully expects the aid figures it has projected to 1988 to be granted, since the U.S. Congress frequently has increased the administration's proposals for Israeli aid.

Seeing how Israel is getting what it wanted through 1986, there is no reason to doubt that assistance in 1987 and 1988 will be at the $4-billion level. That will confirm the widely held belief that U.S. support for Israel goes beyond the declarations of moral commitment, certainly beyond what the United States would do for any other ally.

Since the Israeli economic situation is more than likely to worsen, many already conclude that the U.S. will pay whatever subsidy proves necessary to keep Israel viable and militarily strong. Such a conclusion, in the Arab world and elsewhere, simply means that Israel is being maintained as an extension of U.S. policy, a strategic asset that is not merely, as is claimed, an obstacle in the path of "Soviet expansion," but an effective tool in U.S. dealings with other countries of the region, which long have believed Israel to be America's proxy.

The amounts are substantial. Quite apart from the increases being granted, the $2.6 billion Israel has already received so far this year is more than all the money the U.S. government spends on efforts to purify the environment, and as much as it spends on the State Department, the Peace Corps and the United Nations combined.

For openers, the additional $4.5 billion through 1986 comes to almost a full 10 per cent of all the budget cuts or eliminations proposed by the Reagan Administration in its compromise agreement with Senate Republican leaders in all federal programs. In other words, it is readily apparent that aid to Israel, whatever the final figure will be, will come at the expense of American deprivation.

There are many ways to quantify that deprivation, of which the following examples are only some of the most obvious:

It was estimated that the originally contemplated freeze on Social Security and welfare cost of living increases would save $6.6 billion in 1986, but at the cost of pushing 530,000 Americans below the poverty line over several years. The initial one-year loss would be compounded since the figures for the subsequent years of 1987 and 1988 on which cost-of-living increases would be added would be reduced from what they would have been, as a result of the 1986 freeze. The total loss to the recipients for those three years was estimated at $20 billion-plus and is approximately the same figure that results from the compromise plan which spreads the grief by allowing for only a 2 per cent increase for each of the three years (assuming inflation does not go above 4 per cent). Senator Patrick Moynihan, Democrat of New York, has declared that over a million Americans would be forced below the poverty line by the end of the decade under the compromise plan. What is clear is that the neediest in U.S. society will be the most hurt by cost-of-living increases not keeping pace with inflation, and that a diversion of the $15 billion Israel is likely to receive over the next three years to Social Security and welfare costs would go a long way in reducing the hardship the proposed cuts would work on the recipients and prevent hundreds of thousands of them from going into poverty.

Under the compromise plan, federal employees and very likely those in military service will be asked to take a one-year wage freeze in 1986, for a savings of $3.2 billion. That figure is almost the same as aid to Israel in 1986.

The best estimates by educators are that an additional $1 billion is required to fully meet the overall financial need of students for loans. Instead, the $8 billion set aside by Congress in 1985 for student loans (an increase of 20 per cent over the previous year) is slated for a cut. The original ceilings placed on the amount of aid a student can get plus the income eligibility ceilings placed on students and their families, coupled with other measures, were estimated to reduce the number of student awards by a million, or 10 per cent of the total. Over three years the proposed cuts were to save $4 billion. The compromise plan with its more liberal ceilings will yield $2.6 billion in savings. Even though the compromise plan will cut less and allows for more affluent families to borrow money through another program at a higher rate of interest, hundreds of thousands of American students, perhaps half a million, will be prevented from, or delayed in, getting higher education. Again, the $2.6 billion saving over three years is what Israel has already received this year and about a third of what Israel stands to get by the end of 1986.

The cuts in Medicare and Medicaid proposed under the compromise plan are $4 billion and $750 million respectively for 1986. The total of $4.5 billion almost equals the total of the extra $1.5 billion Israel is getting in an emergency grant now and the $3 billion it will get in 1986.

The $15 billion or more Israel may receive over the period 1985-88 could provide the strapped American farmer with much needed relief. The compromise cuts in farm-price support and credit programs will come to $3 billion in 1986, less than half the $7.1 billion Israel is getting in 1985-86, and will amount to $14.9 billion over the next three years, which is less than what Israel is more than likely to end up with by 1988.

In 1985 the federal government is spending about $700 in American tax dollars on each Israeli, or about 25 per cent of what it spends on individual Americans. With the additional aid through 1986, and with the U.S. budget in the vicinity of $900 billion, the U.S. spending on each man, woman and child in Israel will more than double to nearly $1,500, as compared with $3,700 for every American, an increase in ratio from about 25 per cent to around 40 per cent. If Israel gets the billions requested in one lump sum at the beginning of each year rather than in quarterly payments, that 40 per cent ratio will rise, due to the millions in interest income Israel will gain and the U.S. will lose.

More important, the U.S. government will be giving almost $1,500 to every Israeli at the same time it is loading onto every American an additional $1,000 of the 1986 deficit, thus increasing the huge debt every American already bears.

Poor families in the U.S. get around $3,000 a year in food stamps. Combined with Aid to Families with Dependent Children, the 1984 average was nearly $7,000; in view of the proposed cuts, the average figure is not expected to go above $7,000 in 1986, and may even dip below that. Compare that to the $7,500 every Israeli family of five will be getting from the U.S. next year.

In addition to the deprivation resulting from the proposed termination of programs such as Job Corps, Urban Development, Rural Housing and Electrification, Small Business Administration, etc. (and the many cuts or freezes in various others), the one close-out that is sure to cost the American wage earner additional expense is General Revenue Sharing. To compensate for this lost revenue, state governments must look to an increase in state taxes, as many have already. The billions Israel is getting clearly would not preclude such increases if it were distributed for state services through Revenue Sharing, but it is equally clear that the U.S. largess to Israel is misplaced in these hard times for Americans at the federal, state, and local levels.

In the new and rapidly developing U.S. economic relationship with Israel, American jobs are clearly being lost. Normally, U.S. military aid is given with the stipulation that it must be used to buy American arms. In the current year, $250 million was exempted from this requirement and Israel was allowed to use it to buy its own defense products for the development of the Lavi aircraft. Since the U.S. Commerce Department estimates that 24,000 jobs are generated for every billion dollars in U.S. exports, America lost 6,000 jobs this year because of the Israeli exemption. If the $400 million earmarked for the Lavi next year is approved, another 9,600 American jobs will be lost. Since the entire Lavi project is estimated to end up costing anywhere from $6 to $9 billion, a great deal more American unemployment will result from the continued and increased funding of the project. Joblessness in U.S. aerospace and related industries will be compounded when the Lavi is sold on the world market in direct competition with American produced planes. It does not take a great deal of imagination to see that the U.S. is in the process of exporting American jobs in this area as elsewhere.

Additional U.S. unemployment is likely to result from the implementation of the Free Trade Agreement with Israel, whereby Israeli goods (particularly in the area of high technology where Israel is strong) will be sold duty-free in direct competition with U.S products in the American market. No one can quantify the total loss in U.S. employment that will result from the long-range flow of large grants, the subsidization of Israeli industry with both public and private funds from the U.S. and the opening of duty-free trade with Israel. But it is hardly daring to claim that it will be substantial and may even be enormous. In the view of some, it is already so. Both Joseph C. Harsh in the Christian Science Monitor and Washington lawyer Fred Dutton, in tstimony before Congress, have claimed that, including direct costs, Israel right now, before the increase in aid, is costing the United States well in excess of $10 billion per year.

What, Peres was asked during his visit here, has the U.S. been getting and will it get for the large price tag? His answer: "Imagine the Middle East without Israel." Israeli President Chaim Herzog came more directly to the point when queried on televison recently about the massive aid request. He said flatly that the U.S. would be getting a "bargain" because such subsidy has been and will be made in America's own geopolitical interest to support a strategic asset and, as is so often said, its "only reliable ally in the Middle East."

An ally, particularly a client ally, presumably supports in a general way the policy of its sponsor and at least consults with or informs that sponsor when it plans controversial moves in order to retain the subsidy. In fact, contemporary Middle East history is littered with examples of Israel doing just the opposite. The following are only some of the more obvious examples:

In 1956, President Dwight D. Eisenhower condemned the Israeli-British-French invasion of Egypt.

In 1967, Israel attacked the U.S.S. Liberty, killing 34 and wounding many other American sailors. No serious student of that event now believes it was a case of mistaken identity, as Israel claimed.

Since 1967 Israel has diverted hundreds of millions in U.S. aid to create settlements in the occupied Arab territories, which every American administration since has declared illegal or at least an obstacle to peace. Israel's response to President Reagan's peace initiative in 1982, which envisioned the West Bank as a homeland for the Palestinians, was not only immediately to reject it but to reiterate its claim to sovereignty over that area and announce the building of new settlements in defiance of America.

Following the 1967 war, Israel annexed East Jerusalem and its suburbs despite condemnation by the U.S. and the unanimous condemnation by the U.N. More recently, it reaffirmed its sovereign claim.

In 1981, Israel used American weaponry to destroy a nuclear reactor in Baghdad, an action deplored by the U.S. government.

In 1981, Israel annexed the Golan Heights, an action again condemned by the U.S. Israel's response was to excoriate the American administration in terms that can only be called contemptuous.

In 1982, Israel launched an unprovoked and savage invasion of Lebanon and violated U.S. law, which stipulates that U.S. arms can only be used for defensive purposes. The U.S. deplored the invasion and the wanton slaughter of civilians, particularly with the use of cluster bombs and incendiary devices. As a result of the chaos and carnage produced by the three-month siege of Beirut, the U.S. felt compelled to send troops to separate the combatants. In the end, 261 American marines lost their lives.

It is hardly surprising that U.S. tolerance of these and other Israeli actions and the continuous funding and supply of Israel have alienated many in the Middle East and beyond and made the situation very difficult for those who still want to retain U.S friendship in the area.

Indeed, some Arab countries provide lucrative and much needed markets for American goods, given the growing U.S. balance of trade deficit. Over the last decade, Saudi Arabia alone has purchased $40 billion in American goods. In a good year, such as 1982, the U.S. enjoyed a trade surplus of $1.5 billion with Saudi Arabia and a $4.6 billion surplus with the Arab world in total. In the same exports to all Arab countries were over $18.5 billion, which generated some 600,000 jobs in the United States. Unconditional U.S. support of Israel jeopardizes the U.S. position in Arab markets.

Despite Israel having demonstrated again and again that it does not hesitate to undermine and thwart U.S. foreign policy in the Middle East, many argue for its continued support as a bastion against communist encroachment. This is a dubious proposition at best, given Israel's opportunistic bent. In any case, it behooves those who make this argument to remember that not one country in the Middle East, not even Israel, looks upon Soviet aggression or communist subversion as a primary danger.

The fact is that U.S. foreign policy has little to do with the realities of the Middle East and even less with Israel's frequent hostile and impertinent behavior. It is dictated in large measure by domestic forces, working with a very potent political lobby. How else can we explain a superpower such as the U.S. being manipulated so frequently by Israel? How else can we explain Israel doing what it wants and getting what it wants no matter what it does?

A new factor, however, has entered the domestic equation, a qualitative difference that is the result of quantitative changes. While virtually every American is being asked to take less, Israel is asking for a double helping. For the first time a mass audience can be shown, and is beginning to see, that the average American's economic self interest is in direct and self evident conflict with the interest of Israel. It is, therefore, more than a hope to suggest that, more likely sooner rather than later, the result of that growing perception will be an American-Israeli relationship that would be built on U.S. rather than Israeli interests. Such a relationship would be spectacularly different from the one with which we are all too familiar. □

Wodenson

Race or Religion? This is the most fundamental problem of our age. Since the majority of the remnant of the White Aryan Race at least nominally supports some branch of the Christian religion, and since the Christian churches have made it their fondest hope and fervent duty to mix, mongrelize, and murder this remnant, the Race or Religion issue is literally the choice between life and death for the White man and the type of civilization which he alone designed and which he alone can maintain.

The concept of a superior being, i.e., "God," (something I refer to as either the "Godforce" or the "Godsense") is as old and pervasive as the Aryan race itself. Some would say as old as all so-called humans, but it is my guess that any "Godsense" among the primitives is simply a memory of contact with the "White Gods" described in so many tribal cults. At any rate, this "Godsense" exists among our people, and while it could be used to secure our existence, it is currently being used to destroy us.

The conflict between "reason," which now tells the rational White man that his dominant religion is suicidal, and his inherent "Godsense" is forcing thinking Whites in several directions. Some simply abandon any belief in a higher moral power altogether. Others abandon their race and a future for their children by choosing to remain with the suicidal religion. Another group has returned to the nature-based religion of their Teutonic and Norse ancestors. Still others have chosen the "Identity Christian" option. Messrs. Butler, Miles, Emry, and Gayman are the leading teachers of this Identity faith. I have met and spent time with most of these Identity teachers. They are all men of the utmost racial loyalty. Richard Butler in particular, with whom I have spent much time and for whom I have the highest respect, has attempted to teach his followers the eternal and unyielding laws of nature.

For myself personally, however, my beliefs must coincide with both the facts and the realities. The Identity teaching is that the Caucasian Race are the descendants of the "lost tribes of Israel," and so must follow the Old Testament laws of racial separation and survival. This was apparently the belief of a great many of our American ancestors as they spread across the continent, establishing a White Nation and singing hymns such as "Ye sacred seed of Jacob's Race." Apparently, from an objective study of history, neither facts nor realities have anything to do with the success of a religion. This is determined by the motives of its founders and the fanaticism of its adherents. If indeed this religion can preserve the White Race on planet earth, then we should all promote it with the zeal of the desperate. After all, religions evolve and change just as do political and economic systems, and ultimate truth can be taught at a later date. Only the pollution of our blood and the death of our Race cannot be undone, once accomplished.

If, however, the success of a movement is based on fact, truth, and reason, then we must look elsewhere for our salvation. It is a fact that Stonehenge predates Abraham, the supposed founder of Israel, by hundreds of years. So do the once White civilizations of Egypt, Sumeria, Minoa, and others. Furthermore, the Patriarchs of Israel far more resemble the evil tribe that has been working toward our destruction than they do us. Note here that when I use the word "evil" it is not meant as the subjective term common to religion. To me, "evil" is that which contravenes nature's eternal laws and thereby destroys nature's highest creation. To those who have studied history and are aware of Jewry's unique rôle as the catalyst and engine in the decomposition and destruction of every civilization the White man has created, the word "evil" is appropriate, though an understatement, as there exist no words to properly condemn this seemingly eternal, parasitic pestilence.

Here I should like to take a moment and detail some of the characteristics of the Hebrew patriarchs. As a child, I was raised in a Christian family that forced me to attend Sunday School and venerate those deviates. I resent that to this day. My first example is my favorite since I was named after this character and since the tale of desiring another man's wife is common to many, including myself.

In the second book of Samuel, in the 11th chapter, we find the story of David and Bathsheba. Now King David was the all-time favorite of the Hebrew God and supposedly the direct ancestor of Jesus Christ. One day King David sees a beautiful married woman next door and decides he wants to have sex with her. He promptly sends for her and enjoys her favors. As things turn out, however, he not only gets her pregnant but it seems she is the wife of his most loyal servant and general, Uriah. This is no problem for the resourceful King David though; he just murders his faithful general, and steals his wife. This story sort of hits home with me personally, because I, too, have loved a kinsman's wife for some time. However, instead of murdering my kinsman and trying to steal his wife, I moved to the other end of the country so as not to cause problems in his family. I believe the difference is not personal but is a racial trait. Perhaps even more indicative of the Jewish nature of King David is the phallic worship found in first Samuel, chapter 18. Here we find that David slays 200 male Philistines and brings their foreskins to King Saul as a dowry. I cannot imagine a mentally healthy Aryan lopping off the ends of 200 penises for a present, nor can I conceive of an Aryan king degenerate enough to want them. In the first book of Kings, in the first chapter, we find that King David is getting old and stricken with years. The old leacher was close to his death, but he was still trying for a new lease on life. He sent his servant out to find the fairest young virgin in the land that she might lay with the king. Finally they found a sexy young virgin named Abishag. She used all her charms but the old goat just couldn't perform, and shortly thereafter he passed on to the great Jew money bank in the sky.

The next King of Israel is David's son Solomon, who was given a blessing by the Hebrew God which made him the wisest man who ever lived. The story of his first act on becoming king is found in the second chapter of First Kings. It seems that Solomon and another of King David's sons, Adonijah, both lusted after the fair young virgin named Abishag, who had been been procured to put some life into old King David. Now Solomon was his father's son, heart and soul. Apparently he took careful note of how his daddy disposed of his faithful servant, Uriah, in order to steal beautiful Bathsheba. Therefore we read in the second chapter of First Kings how Solomon's first act as king was to murder his brother to get the woman Abishag. This was apparently pleasing in the sight of the Lord, for he gave Solomon 700 wives, 300 concubines, and made him the richest man in the world.

We would be remiss if we didn't mention the story of Lot, whom the Lord considered the most righteous man in the city of Sodom. In the 19th chapter of Genesis we read that Lot offered his two virgin daughters to a mob of perverts, then, later, gets drunk and sleeps with them himself. Of course, Lot was a piker compared to his uncle Abraham, from whom he must have learned the joys of incest. In Genesis, chapters 12 and 20, we read of how Abraham married his own sister, Sarah, and how twice he pimped her off on Egyptian Pharaos in order to steal the cattle, silver, and gold of the land. Later, in Genesis, we find the story of Judah who sold his own brother into slavery. In Esther we have the story of a Jewess pimped off on the King of Persia in order to eventually allow the slaughter of 75,000 Persians, which happy event the Jews still celebrate to this day in their feast of Purim.

In the 47th chapter of Genesis, we can find another revealing story. It seems that a large number of the Israelites had come into Egypt and now managed all the affairs of state. Now we read in the 14th verse, "and Joseph gathered up all the money that was found in the land of Egypt," and in the 15th verse, "for the money failed," and in the 16th verse, "and Joseph said, 'give me your cattle and I will give you for your cattle if money fail.' " It seems that the International Jew Banker is an everlasting plague. I am tempted to continue, but a whole book could be written on the subject, and in any event, I could not do a better job of exposing these perverts than Ben Klassen has already done in his excellent, Nature's Eternal Religion (available from Liberty Bell Publications; $8.00).

It may well be that since a large part of the White Race has been raised to venerate these degenerates that only the "Identity" teachings can preserve our people at this time. I, however, cannot accept that I am a descendant of these perverts, nor can I compromise with historical inaccuracies. For the vast majority of our people who at least nominally embrace the Christian faith, neither the racial nor moral aspects of their heroes is of any importance. All that matters to them is that every semblance of reason, and all understanding of Race in the events of history, as well as the future of higher man, must be mercilessly stamped out. To understand the implacable hatred that Christianity has for all that is beautiful and superior, it is necessary that we not only study its deeds but also ascertain its origins.

By the time of Julius Caesar (100 to 44 B.C.), Rome was already 700 years old. From the statues and busts we can tell that the founders were Nordics. The first beginnings of racial decay were recognized and condemned by far-thinking leaders, but as always, they were ignored or silenced by those who had the power of money and would sell their race for immediate gratification. At this time, Caesar and his contemporary, Cato, discussed the possibilities of a common religion to unite the factions, races, and cults of the Empire. Octavius, later to become Augustus Caesar, also discussed this with Cato around 42 B.C. It is probable that Cato was even commissioned to do what today we call a "feasibility study" on the subject. It was somewhere around 42 B.C. that Cato issued his now famous declaration on the subject: expedit esse deos, et ut expedit esse putemus, "it is convenient that there be Gods, and that we should think that they exist." Cato, of course, is renowned as history's greatest cynic, so we can forgive him for failing to differentiate between the "Godsense" and the obviously man-made religious Gods. It does show, however, that the question of a superior force, as well as the possibility of uniting the Empire through a common religion, was a topic at that time. This attempt to consolidate the many Gods of the Empire continued through the reign of Augustus and, intermittently, for the next 300 years. Finally, under Constantine and at the Nicea council, a new religion was established which formed the basis for the Holy Roman Empire.

In order to gain acceptance among the diverse cults of the Empire, a multitude of concessions had to be made in the new religion. Over the last several hundred years, the primary Roman God, Jupiter, had been merged with the Greek God Zeus, and Zeus was then the primary Roman God to the time of the Nicea council and, as we shall soon see, he still is. The second major God of this era, and the primary God of the Legionaries, was the sun God called Mithra. A giant temple was erected to Mithra on the field of Mars in the year 215 A.D. Every year a huge festival was held at this temple on the 25th of December to celebrate the birth of the sun God. The date December 25th being Christmas is no coincidence either.

The name "Jesus" is further proof that the new religion of 325 A.D. was completely contrived and formed by powerful men of that time, using the currently popular Gods. By 325 A.D., the cult of Chrestus, i.e., Christ (Chrestus was the individual name given to the teachings of the Essenes), was ranked behind only Zeus and Mithra in acceptance by the populace. The problem was to combine the three major religions. The solution they used was to change the name of Chrestus to Zeus, or perhaps more correctly, to 'the same as Zeus.' In Spanish, Italian, and most importantly in Latin, Jesus is pronounced

'aa-zoos.' Zeus is pronounced 'Zoos.' Furthermore, the Latin spelling of Jesus is 'Iesus.' 'I.E.' is the short form for 'Id Est,' in Latin meaning 'the same as.' Thus we find the new God is named, 'the same as Zeus Chrestus,' or in English, Jesus Christ. The major concession to Mithra was to make the birthday of the new God fall on the same day as the Legionaires celebrated the birth of the sun God.

But now let's see how this explains the pathological hatred that Christians have for the beautiful and the superior human being. Religions reflect both the racial soul of the people that adopt them and the historical era in which they are created. The religions of a hardy, independent, and expanding Aryan nation worship Gods of strength and beauty, such as Appolo, Woden, Zeus, and Thor.

However, when the nation becomes sedentary, and especially after it has come close to being all powerful, then the rulers begin to desire a less aggressive populace. In addition, although the nation is created by strong Aryan stock, the fully developed nation inevitably submits to the subtle takeover by Jewry. There are those who claim that Julius Caesar was surrounded and controlled by Jews and that is why patriotic senators found it necessary to get rid of him. I have no reason to doubt this. Already 400 years earlier, the Greeks had complained bitterly that no commerce could be carried on anywhere in the world without first paying the Jews their accursed usury. We know also that the Roman historian Josephus was a Jew. Poppea, the wife of Nero, was a Jewess. Probably all affairs of state were already dominated by the tribe. The best interests of both the race traitor nobility and of the Jews was then best served by the introduction of a pacifist religion. Let's break the train of thought here for a moment and define that term "pacifist religion."

In no way is the religion meant to be passive or tolerant in defense of itself. The whole idea is to be totally intolerant of all ideas which are not beneficial to the founders and promoters of the religion. "Resist not evil," "turn the other cheek," and "love your enemies," were meant for the destruction of those who would defend their race, nation, and culture. Luke 19, verse 27: "Those that would not that I reign over them, bring them hither before me and slay them," was the creed of those who would benefit from the new religion.

The Gods who inspired the Legionaires as they conquered most of the known world were no longer necessary. There was, to be sure, the problem of the still free Germanic tribes and their neighbors to the north. These people would have to be conquered by subversion, though. This was demonstrated when Hermann destroyed the Legions invading central Europe in 9 A.D. The religion of the fiercely independent men of the North was unstructured but functional. The Gods developed from the Norsemen's observance of nature and all its laws. As such, their Gods furthered their sense of kinship and gave them a realistic attitude towards both life and death. The defense of one's territory, kinfolk, and family, were exalted as life's greatest duty and honor. In accordance with nature's laws, reverence for the beautiful and the superior was never questioned.

Into this harmonious and natural society the new religion struck like a berserk buzz bomb. Priests of this new religion roamed the land teaching that healthy and natural instincts were now something called sin. Where once the pride and duty of a man was to have and defend a large and beautiful family, now this priest taught the words of 'St. Paul,' namely, that only men who had never slept with a women would be the highest in some life in the hereafter. Where once a man was revered for his courage in defense of kin and culture, now he was admonished to "love his enemies," and soon the words of the new religion, "I have come to turn father against son," came all too true. In fact, in the name of this new God, more White men would slaughter each other in the next several centuries than had been killed from all causes in the known history of the race. Soon reverence for beauty and knowledge became crimes even among the Aryan remnants in Greece, as exemplified by the story of Hypathia. By orders of Cyril, the Archbishop of Alexandria, in the year 415 A.D., a Christian mob dragged a woman named Hypathia from her coach and, with typical Christian zeal, used oyster shells to scrape every ounce of skin and flesh from her still living body. Her crimes were twofold. First, she was reputed to be the most beautiful woman in Greece. Second, she taught the works of Plato at the University. The Christian God decreed, however, that every two-legged creature on this planet is equal in his eyes, and if an individual or a Race is so obviously superior that the Christian cannot deny the evidence of his own eyes, then he must either destroy the superior beings or admit that his God is a liar and his religion is a hoax.

At this point it is necessary to discuss the reasons why the unnatural sexual repression and hatred of beauty were incorporated into the new religion. In the entire history of our people there has never been anybody that defended their heritage, culture, territory, and kinfolk with the courage, wisdom, and determination of the Spartans of ancient Greece. The tales of homosexuality among the Spartans are a base canard and a Jewish lie. A Spartan soldier was not even permitted to go into battle until he had fatherd a child. If there is one period in history where it can be said that our people loved and promoted their own kind, this is it. In art and sport, this extended to a visual appreciation of bodies. Sex was recognized as a natural, pleasurable, and necessary part of life. That the male is stimulated visually to perform sexual union, and that there is no higher calling than the perpetuation of their species, was recognized as a fact of nature. No White man except one that is racially dead, i.e., mentally ill, can deny that the White woman is the standard of beauty over every female creature on earth. Nature made her so in order to inspire the White man to perform otherwise undreamed of deeds of aggression and heroism in the pursuit of sexual union and in defense of this female treasure. Nature has, likewise, decreed that it is the duty as well as pleasure of the woman to reveal the charms of her body in the subtle and mysterious ways which I, as a mere male, do not understand but by which I have been conquered on numerous occasions. We can conclude then that the stimulation of a beautiful, provocative, and sexual woman is both healthy and necessary for the life of a people. We can also conclude that no red-blooded young White man who has ever studied the charms of a nude White woman is going to be persuaded by any amount of either Christian or Communistic equality garbage, that his woman is of no more value or beauty than a central African negress. The founders of the new religion even then were promoting their "one race," "one religion," "one world government," where all are exactly equal except, of course, for themselves, who would reign over the muddy brown, ignorant Goyim. Incidentally, for those who don't already know, the Jews refer to a White women as Shiksa. The literal definition of Shiksa is "unclean piece of meat;" so next time you see a Jew, think about what he calls your daughter, wife, and mother. Anyway, as I was saying, the founders of the new religion knew that a nation of sexually healthy and aggressive White males could not be conquered by force of arms, so sexual repression and hatred of beauty became integral parts of the faith.

But hatred of beauty was far from being the only trait of the new religion, nor was it confined to the formative years. On 16 February 1600, one Giordano Bruno was dragged to the center of Rome. There the Christian guards of the Vatican burned him at the stake. His crime: he refused to recant his belief that the earth revolved around the sun. The life of the Christian Church, of course, is founded on the absolute suppression of "Reason." Any evidence of the surfacing of reason among the masses, even on unrelated subjects, is dangerous and must be ruthlessly and quickly suppressed. For anyone who thinks that this is a thing of the past, I might point out that no group on this earth more frantically desires and promotes the death of the White Race than the Christian churches.

A detailed history of the expansion of Christianity from 325 A.D. to the present time would fill many volumes, so here I shall detail just a few of the tactics.

The conversion of the White man to the new Eastern religion was accomplished in three ways. First was conversion by the sword. Either you were baptized or you got your head lopped off. Charlemagne, in the late 8th and early 9th centuries, was a leading practitioner of this method. Second was subversion of reason by the priests. This laid the groundwork for the great civil wars, which were the biggest cause of bloodshed. In the Thirty Years War alone, one third of the people of Europe slaughtered each other in the name of Christ. In addition, five-sixths of the housing in Europe was destroyed in this war. This same war is, of course, still being fought in Ireland today.

The third method of conversion was economic oppression; this method was used successfully in the conversion of the Scandinavian countries in the 12th and 13th centuries.

So what have we gained by this study of the formation of the Christian religion? Hopefully, knowledge of both, who is destroying us, and how to build a defense. Why do we need to know more about those who would destroy us? Primarily because we need to end any illusions that we may harbor about neutralizing the Christian monolith by force of reason. Our numbers and our time are too scarce and too valuable to be wasted on "dead-end streets." Except for the few who can be converted to "Identity," they are totally, if unknowingly, dedicated to the murder of their own Race. The unholy Three-C triumvirate of Christianity, Communism, and Capitalism share a common disregard, and often hatred, of all that is wisdom, beauty, reason, and superiority. Do not doubt that if and when the time comes that the last White men who care about the life of their Race gather into small communities, both here and abroad, that it will be the Christians, many of them White Race Traitors, flying the star spangled banner, and singing "Onward Christian Soldiers," who will come to slaughter the last hope of their own kind. With the same fervor they scraped the flesh from the body of the beautiful Hypathia for being too beautiful, with the same fervor they burned Bruno alive for being too wise, with this same fervor they will murder the last searchers for beauty, truth, and wisdom. Do not waste your time seeking recruits among the Christians.

Potential recruits for the White survival movement will come from among the already disillusioned and disenfranchised. The "Godsense" exists among our people and millions of them are searching for answers. A total unity of belief will not be attained among our people at this time. Rather, we must strive for the common goal, which is the survival of our people. Race is the issue and all other issues are secondary. For those who retain the "Godsense" but cannot accept "Identity," there are other alternatives. To be sure, there are those who have forsaken all belief in a higher power and some of them function extremely well in the White survival movement. The majority of us, and I include myself, while basing our actions on reason alone, retain a conviction that there exists a higher power, some greater order, some cosmic purpose, that I define as the "Godsense" or "Godforce."

From time to time, throughout history, a truly superior man appears. It has not been given to mortal man at this time to know if supernatural or as yet undiscovered natural forces cause their appearance. If courage, honor, intelligence, leadership, sacrifice, truth, and perserverance are attributes of a God, then on the 20th day of April, 1889, at a place called Braunau on the Inn, on the German-Austrian border, the nearest image of a God yet seen on earth was born. While he was known as the "Leader," he made no claim to be a God, and often spoke of one greater than himself who was yet to come. According to Savitri Devi, who studied the ancient Sanskrit writings, the "Leader" was the last divine image before the coming of Kalki, the final avenger. I am not a student of the ancient Sanskrit writings, but if Kalki can bring on Ragnarok before the last Whites have been either mongrelized or murdered, then I pray for Kalki.

At any rate, the "Leader" made a statement that relates to the "Godsense."

"When human hearts break and human souls despair, then from the twilight of the past the great conquerors of distress and care, of disgrace and misery, of spiritual slavery and physical compulsion, look down on them and hold out their eternal hands to the despairing mortals. Woe to the people that is ashamed to take them."

When I despair for the life of my people, when I am near conceding victory to the Jewish Hydra, I often go out alone to a forest or hilltop. There, as I contemplate the vast expanse of the universe, the exact interplay of all the forces of nature, I marvel at the perfect order. It doesn't take long to realize that whatever force or power might have been involved in the originating of this expanse is far beyond the ability of mortal man to describe. No wonder all religions are man-made, and since any definition of the "Godforce" is limited by the knowledge and vocabulary of mortals, no wonder these religions are imperfect. To stand in awe of nature, and to obey her exact, perfect, and eternal laws, is my best understanding of the "Godforce."

For those who feel the need for the trappings and rituals of a religion to enhance or express their "Godsense," there is, of course, the old Germanic and Norse Odinist faith. I confess an affinity for this religion since, as far as I know, it is the only one developed solely by and for our people. It evolved from a study of nature and it fits our Racial Soul.

The greatest White man it has ever been my privilege to personally know was Bob Matthews. He was slain in a gun battle with 1700 agents of the Z.O.G. (Zionist Occupation Government) of the United States on the 8th day of December 1984. He was a devotee of the Odinist faith and his favorite quotation came from an old Icelandic saga: Cattle die, kinsmen die, we, too, will die, the only thing I know that does not die is the fame of dead men's deeds. To die a noble warrior in defense of Race, Nation, or Family, gives eternal life in the hearts of our kinfolk. This is the religion of the Norseman.

Compare that with the alternatives offered by the Judaeo-Christian. The best that can happen is an eternity of untold trillions of years sitting on a cloud, playing a harp, and shouting "Jehovah is Great." If, however, you miss out on this deal, you get to be the hotdog at a divine and eternal Wiener roast.

Some might say that in this dissertation I have discussed too much the insanity of the Christian religion to the near exclusion of the real menace of Jewry. Be assured that the author is well aware that the unholy Three-C triumvirate of Christianity, Communism, and Capitalism are composed of a blind mass of Goyim being led to the slaughter house by the hidden Jew.

What I wish to point out is that the human mind has a limitless capacity to rationalize, and to deceive itself when in the short term it appears beneficial to do so. Therefore, the recruits necessary for the defense of our Racial existence will not be found in the Christian community. These people are already dead, and I mean that in the almost literal sense. They have traded the future of their children and their Race for a religion of death. Complete peace of mind can be found only in the complete absence of thought. The Christian is fond of saying, "I found peace when I found Jesus." This is absolutely true. There is peace of mind for those that abandon all reason. It is the same peace of mind that comes to the dead. These people are brain dead; they have deliberately short-circuited and disconnected any mental process that might conflict with their safe, profitable, and respectable religion.

Before I sum up the points I've been trying to make, I want to head off a pointless debate that the Christians like to bring up. Those Christians who are aware of the evil of Jewry inevitably bring up some of the statements in the New Testament condemning Jews. Let me remind them that Jewry has always led the "Loyal Opposition." Jewry runs Communism and Capitalism. Jewry runs the Democratic Party and the Republican Party. Jewry leads the Liberals to victory and Jewy leads Conservatives to defeat—but Jewry leads. There is absolutely no defense against Jewry except to call our sons back to a pride in their Race.

What, then, can we conclude from this study of Race and Religion?

First of all, that in the majority of our people the "Godsense" exists and must be accommodated. Second, that the "Godsense" and religion are exclusive and different entities. Third, that, except in the highly unlikely event that the majority of our people were to return to the form of Christianity called "Identity," the Christian religion is our deadly enemy. Fourth, that our religion must not contravene natural law, or rational thought. Fifth, that the Gods of a healthy Racial organism must represent beauty, strength, wisdom, heroism, honor, vengeance, duty, and natural law. Sixth, that the Norse religion of Odinism is the only one designed exclusively by and for our people through their observance of the laws of Nature.

Odin or Woden, also known as All-Father, has wisdom and strength. Thor defends the Nation. Freya represents fertility. Heimdal represents loyalty. Loki represents the court Jew, forever the chamelion subverting from within. Tyr represents sacrifice, honor, and heroism. Valhalla rewards courage. As a man of reason, I, of course, realize that even this religion is an attempt to define the "Godsense." Nonetheless, these are the Gods of my fathers, the expression of my Racial Soul; they are the Gods of my people and no other, and to them I shall be true. I pray for the day when Woden's sons, led by Thor and his mighty hammer, Mjollner, smash the false temples of Judaeo-Christianity and lead my people out of this dark age.

Only then will the words of the Leader come true: "My spirit will rise from the grave and my people shall know I was right."

Letters to the Editor

Dear George: 5 July 1985

Here is a $30 Donation. The Jews pushing their Holocaust myth everyday on the boob tube is backfiring. I heard 8 guys at work discussing the TV over-exposure of the "Holy Hoax" during lunch break. And they all said basically that they are sick and tired of the kikes' belly-aching.

Best regards,
D.M., Michigan

Racialist Greetings, Herr Dietz: 13 July 1985

The enclosed is for a one year renewal subscription to the best publication in print today. Hard-hitting, informative articles by Dr. Oliver, Dr. Weber, and John Tyndall (just to name a few) will undoubtedly have a long-range effect in convincing more Aryans that we must get the Jews off our backs permanently in order to survive racially.

Tyndall's article in July's "Liberty Bell" is one of the most thought-provoking arguments against so-called Democracy I have ever read. The points discussed can easily be utilized to blow the liberal thinkers right out of the water.

Sieg Heil!
H.A., Wisconsin

Dear Landsmann: 20 July 1985

Really enjoyed your last "Liberty Bell," especially the quote on why Democracy always fails. Applying that to our present situation makes it clear that the real political struggle now is what sort of dictatorship will replace the present Jewocracy. One of your books commented that Communism is really State Capitalism. All property is in the hands of the State, meaning the group that controls the state. In post-1917 Russia, this was the Jews and they clearly intend to repeat the process here. The alternative to this messianic Jewish slave state would be a National Socialist state. The Jews will do everything to prevent this, but they were unsucessful in Germany and seem to be losing some of their grip in Russia as well. The fact is that their Communism is getting old and feeble. It only survives in America as a theory because of the multitude of Jews here and their non-stop propagandising.

President Reagan seems to have received his reward for being a good Shabbaz Goy. What a fool he was to go to Bethesda Navy Hospital and let a Jew operate on him! The Jew that announced his cancer claimed that "We got it all." Well, one of Dr. Kelly's early discoveries was that cancerous tumors always occur in threes. Thus, Reagan has at least two more growing in him. This provides a good test of my views vs. the Jew AMA's. If I am right, then Reagan will soon be found to have further tumors.

Actually, I have no doubt that Reagan is as good as dead as the survival rate for those who get the Jew's cut-and-burn cancer "treatment" is virtually zero. This will facilitate the mideast war now being planned. Contacts of mine within the US Army have told me that mobilization of the RDF began 48 hours after the TWA hijacking and still continues. We are now in the 5th week of mobilization and two divisions have already been moved to Egypt for "exercises." The mobilization will be complete by 5 August. I don't know if the forces mobilized will be used or not, but I know another oil war is intended. We will see whether it comes off or not. One thing is sure, if something does not happen soon to prop up the oil price, the entire banking system will collapse. The failure of Bank America or a half dozen Texa banks or another 50 midwest banks would break the FDIC, leaving the whole nation in the position of Ohio and Maryland before their banking collapse.

Yours truly,
R.S., New York State

Dear George: 23 July 1985

They say that the rock 'n roll debacle called "USA for Africa" will raise $70 milion for those lovable Ethiopians. One of the "performers," Bob Dylan (real name Zimmerman), who claims to have renounced Judaism since being 'born again,' announced on stage that he hopes "one or two million" will be used to help American farmers pay off their debts to the banks. As you know, the great majority of American farmers are Anglo-Saxons, Germans, and Scandinavians. Several years ago, when questioned about his Jewishness, he replied, "I have blue eyes—I don't know how Jewish that is." This Mr. Dylan, who clearly does not like Jews—and who has millions of fanatical followers—needs a gift subscription to "Liberty Bell." Is there a reader (wealthier than I) in search of a worthy cause?

Best regards,

Dear Mr. Dietz: 15 July 1985

Although the Jewish community in this country raised a howl about President Regan's visit to Bitburg in the Spring, the Jews have failed to denounce a secret letter, recently made public, by Dr. J. Oppenheimer (a Jew who was head of the Manhattan A-Bomb project in World War II) in which he discussed a plan to poison hundreds of thousands of enemy forces with radioactive strontium!

This information was disclosed in the 19 April 1985 issue of the "New York Times" (page 20A) which stated that Oppenheimer's letter was written on 23 May 1943 to Dr. Enrico Fermi. The letter, originally published in the prestigious Massachusetts Institute of Technology's "Technology Review" magazine, stated that Fermi should delay and further work on the mass poisoning scheme until "we can poison food sufficient to kill half a million men."

I have written to prominent Jewish breast-beaters, such as the author who refused to accompany Reagan, asking them to disavow Oppenheimer's view, but no one has done so to date. Perhaps you can shame them into admitting that the Jews are as strong for genocide as anyone, as shown by their refusal to denounce their very own Dr. Oppenheimer for even considering the use of radiation for mass extermination via food poisoning.

Yours truly,
W.W.H., Virginia

I enclose my check for $25 for a renewal of my subscription to "Liberty Bell." You get lots of things in it that will wake people up and keep them moving. I, of course, find Dr. Oliver's articles very illuminating and stirring.

Sir: 14 August 1985

The outlines of a sinister plot are presently emerging, whereby Israeli scientists, physicians, and secret-service personnel are authorized by the Bonn government to carry out medical and armament research in this country, using "anti-Semitic" Germans as human guinea pigs. Experiments range from common-cold research over various types of radiation and their effect on the human body, right up to complex microwave processes, brain-wave manipulation and—this is the very latest discovery—mind-reading. To camouflage the human-experiment aspect, victims are tortured, making it appear that torture is the real and ultimate aim. As a useful sideline, West Germany's Jewish population is called in as helpers, being taught to handle modern armament and torture devices in preparation for 1-W-Day.

Experiments mostly concern radiation (laser rays, supersonic waves, microwaves), and the Jews can therefore operate from neighboring houses or flats. The police has strict orders to steer clear of Mossad operations, and the hundreds (some say: thousands) of Mossad victims have become resigned to their appeals for help being shrugged off as imagination by the pro-Zionist authorities.

I myself have been maltreated since the early sixties. Jewish-born and a convert to Christianity, I believed all these years that I was being tortured out of sheer spitefulness. It was only in August 1984, that a letter arrived from Ernst Zuendel, Toronto, telling me that I should get in touch with two (Aryan) Germans (Dipl.-Ing. Willy Hammon, Nordhellen 14, D-5882 Meinerzhagen, and Theodor Schuermann, Fuerstenbergstrasse 17, D-4740 Oelde 1) who were being maltreated in exactly the same manner as myself. From then on, things began to unravel. What had seemed to be an internal Jewish matter, suddenly took on general, political significance. Only then did I discover that, cleverly disguised underneath the torture palliation, medical and armament experiments were being carried out on literally hundreds, some even say thousands, of Germans. The millions of squandermaniaqued dollars—spent mainly on palm-oiling neighbors and one of the greatest riddles so far—now turned out to be armament money.

For almost a year now, I have done little else but to try to mobilize editors into revealing this well-guarded secret to an unaware public, but in vain. All of our publications turned away, refused to tackle the subject which, some editors explained, would mean their being driven out of business by the pro-Zionist Bonn rulers. From a revisionist friend, I got a list of what he calls "right-wing groups and publications," and it is to these that I now turn in quest for help. Help not so much for myself but to get this story of confirmed and verifiable Zionist atrocities to the public at large and into the history books. For how shall we ever counter the tall fabrications levelled against us, if we fail to bring factual Jewish misdeeds such as this into the open?

Though from a distance, Ernst Zuendel has long been an observer of these goings on. As you probably know, he is forbidden by court order to take part in any anti-Zionist activities, but I am sure he will be able to confirm to you what has been said above. He has read my book in both Germand and English, which will be sent to you on request against non-profit recompense of Deutschmark 20.00 for the German, or Deutschmark 10.00 for the English version.

Three parts of the 250-page German version describing the two decades of torture were written before receipt of the August 1984 letter from Zuendel, i.e., before learning that I was just one of hundreds of Mossad victims. When that transpired, part IV was added to the hectographed German version. The English version, which is printed, still lacks these very latest developments.

Needless to say that I am available for reporters' interviews, recordings for broadcasts, etc., the object being to either promote the sale of my book or, better still, to get an overseas publication interested in the story.

When writing to me, please keep in mind that the Federal Republic of Germany is a near-police-state with mail and phone censorship. All mail will be answered by me, hence, if no answer is forthcoming, it means that the censor has been active again. Sending mail registered will help prevent its "getting lost."

Once again: If ever there was an opportunity for hitting back at the atrocity-propaganda world-champions: this is it!

Sincerely,
Hans Kaufmann

Dear Mr. Dietz: 12 August 1985

We now appear to be approaching an even more terrible time in history than all that which has passed; the forces of evil have full control of every scrap of the news media.

We hardly ever see any of our own kind of people on TV; all we ever see are Artificial Aryans and other kinds of odd characters.

I enjoy reading "Liberty Bell," it's a breath of fresh air beside all the other muck that passes as news programmes and entertainment; every bastion of Western Society has been taken over by those dedicated to our destruction. How else could one describe the ongoing degeneration throughout the whole western world? It is a completely different world now compared to that when I was born in 1907. Oh, yes, there had always been some kind of on-going warfare between the European countries; but there was never the degree of bitterness and outright hatred which exists these days and is constantly encouraged to grow and spread to all corners of the world. I do not believe that the disaster which is right now destroying South Africa could have happened without being planned by certain elements of the International News Media.

Unless we chuck all the outdated chattels of Christian-Democracy, the Aryan race will disappear from the face of the earth.

My subscription renewal and a donation enclosed. My very best wishes to all concerned with "Liberty Bell."

Sincerely yours,
J.G.L. New Zealand

Dear Mr. Dietz: 20 August 1985

Please send 6 copies of Kaufman's genocidal book "Germany Must Perish." I am appalled by the number of concerned, "informed" Americans who have never heard of, let alone read, this vile plan, published prior to our involvement in World War II, which called for the eradication from the earth of all the German people.

If every subscriber to "Liberty Bell" would distribute one copy of this monstrous book, it would not remain hidden from the public eye for long. Due to the cost, I am limited to the number I can distribute. This plea is repetitious I know, but won't some of your subscribers lend a helping hand in making the general public aware of this former, 44-year-old "best-seller"?

Sincerely,
Mrs. P.L.R., Washington

Dear George: 27 August 1985

I have been a steady customer and supporter of yours for nearly a year now. Ever since your last fund appeal in November 1984, I have regularly received your literature. At first I didn't know if my money would just be going down the drain for a dying cause or if there was hope for the "Liberty Bell." It appears that the "Liberty Bell" made it.

Not only has L.B. continued to ring, but I have discovered a virtual wealth of spiritual and intellectual worth in your publications. When I hunger for intelligent material to feed my mind, I merely turn a few pages written by Henry Ford or R.P. Oliver and I can go away feeling satisfied.

I wish you and your wife much prosperity and luck. Keep on fighting, George, for our Aryan Race!

Dear Friends: 12 September 1985

Due to the recent course of events that have disrupted my life, I am literally forced to turn to YOU, the readers of this publication, with a plea for financial aid that I need desperately.

On 26 July 1985, I was innocently accused by the U.S. Federal Government of crimes supposedly committed during WWII. According to their allegations, I am to have guarded inmates at the concentration camp at Majdanek, Poland. This is not true. At that time I was stationed on the Hungarian front, where I was severely wounded and taken to a military hospital in Austria. Here I remained till February 1945.

My dear friends, I find myself in a very frightening and dangerous situation at the present time. My Social Security pension is $660 a month, not nearly enough an amount to cover living expenses and defend myself in a Federal Court. I need your Help! I ask all contributions for my defense be sent to:

KEEP THE LIBERTY BELL RINGING!

Please remember: Our fight is Your fight! Donate whatever you can spare on a regular—monthly or quarterly—basis. Whether it is $2., $5., $20., or $100. or more, rest assured it is needed here and will be used in our common struggle. If you are a businessman, postage stamps in any denomination, are a legitimate business expense—and we need and use many of these here every month, and will be gratefully accepted as donations.

Your donations will help us spread the Message of Liberty and White Survival throughout the land, by making available additional copies of our printed material to fellow Whites who do not yet know what is in store for them.

Order our pamphlets, booklets, stickers, and—most importantly—our reprints which are ideally suited for mass distribution at reasonable cost. Order extra copies of Liberty Bell for distribution to your circle of friends, neighbors and relatives, urging them to subscribe to our unique publication. Our bulk prices are shown on the inside front cover of every issue of Liberty Bell.

Pass along your copy of Liberty Bell, and copies of reprints you obtained from us, to friends and acquaintances who may be on our 'wave length,' and urge them to contact us for more of the same.

Carry on the fight to free our White people from the shackles of alien domination, even if you can only join our ranks in spirit. You can provide for this by bequest. The following are suggested forms of bequests which you may include in your Last Will and Testament:

1. I bequeath to Mr. George P. Dietz, as Trustee for Liberty Bell Publications, P.O. Box 21, Reedy WV 25270 USA, the sum of $ . . . . . for general purposes.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR: Dr. Revilo Pendleton Oliver, Professor of the Classics at the University of Illinois for 32 years, is a scholar of international distinction who has written articles in four languages for the most prestigious academic publications in the United States and Europe.

During World War II, Dr. Oliver was Director of Research in a highly secret agency of the War Department, and was cited for outstanding service to his country.

One of the very few academicians who has been outspoken in his opposition to the progressive defacement of our civilization, Dr. Oliver has long insisted that the fate of his countrymen hangs on their willingness to subordinate their doctrinal differences to the tough but idealistic solidarity which is the prerequisite of a Majority resurgence.

SOME QUOTABLE QUOTES FROM AMERICA'S DECLINE

On the 18th Amendment (Prohibition): "Very few Americans were sufficiently sane to perceive that they had repudiated the American conception of government and had replaced it with the legal principle of the 'dictatorship of the proletariat,' which was the theoretical justification of the Jews' revolution in Russia."

On Race: "We must further understand that all races naturally regard themselves as superior to all others. We think Congoids unintelligent, but they feel only contempt for a race so stupid or craven that it fawns on them, gives them votes, lavishly subsidizes them with its own earnings, and even oppresses its own people to curry their favor. We are a race as are the others. If we attribute to ourselves a superiority, intellectual, moral, or other, in terms of our own standards, we are simply indulging in a tautology. The only objective criterion of superiority, among human races as among all other species, is biological: the strong survive, the weak perish. The superior race of mankind today is the one that will emerge victorious—whether by its technology or its fecundity—from the proximate struggle for life on an overcrowded planet."

FREEDOM OF SPEECH—FREEDOM OF THOUGHT
FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION

The editor-publisher of Liberty Bell does not necessarily agree with each and every article in this magazine, nor does he subscribe to all conclusions arrived at by various writers; however, he does endeavor to permit the exposure of ideas suppressed by the controlled news media of this country.

It is, therefore, in the best tradition of America and of free men everywhere that Liberty Bell strives to give free reign to ideas, for ultimately it is ideas which rule the world and determine both the content and structure of culture.

We believe that we can and will change our society for the better. We declare our long-held view that no institution or government created by men, for men, is inviolable, incorruptible, and not subject to evolution, change or replacement by the will of the people.

To this we dedicate our lives and our work. No effort will be spared and no idea will be allowed to go unexpressed if we think it will benefit the Thinking People, not only of America, but the entire world.

HIGH IDEALS

According to the Washington Post (11 September 1985) six men and one woman, all now in their early thirties, have filed suit against a long-haired, long-bearded swami who does business under the name Maharishi Mahesh Yogi, each asking damages of $9,000,000 for physical and mental harm sustained during the ten years or more during which they were such suckers that they were taken in by his spiritual claptrap. All seven were students in colleges in or near Philadelphia in the early 1970s and so ignorant and stupid that they swallowed sucker-bait about "spiritual values" and transferred themselves to a pest hole in Fairfield, Iowa, that is called the Maharishi International University. There they learned the sublime science of "transcendental meditation," a system of auto-hypnosis that can be guaranteed to produce simpering idiocy. They believed that by paralysing what brains they had they would become "Masters of Creation," able to transcend the laws of physics not only by using thought waves to bend spoons but by soaring aloft to frolic with the birds and play hide-and-seek among the clouds.

After assiduously practicing frog-leaps for a decade, while keeping their minds stuffed with transcendental garbage, they still had enough glimmerings of thought left to come at last to the conclusion that holiness cannot overcome gravity and that they would never experience the exhilaration of becoming oversized skylarks. From that, they were able to reason to the logical conclusion that they had wasted a large and precious part of their lives. So they are asking damages from the hokum-peddler who, having turned his "university" of mind-addling over to understudies, has, it is said, retired to the security of a luxurious life in Switzerland, enjoying transcendent peace and comfort, far from the brawling of court rooms.

One wishes the plaintiffs well, of course, for their own sake and even more for the sake of society. The Christian News (10 June 1985) reports that a jury in the Federal Court in Portland, Oregon, awarded $2,850,000 to a woman who had been cozened by the particularly malodorous Saviour (Bhagwan) who moved his cosmic copulation parlors from India to Oregon (see Liberty Bell, March 1981; cf. Is there Intelligent Life on Earth?, pp. 24 f.). About the same time, another jury in Oregon awarded $39,000,000 to a lady who had been diddled by the Church of Scientology, which learned enough to settle immediately for $150,000 a suit in Massachusetts, rather than face trial on a charge of having harassed a fish who broke the hook and escaped from their line. According to a despatch from St. Paul, Minnesota, (3 July 1985), a Mr. and Mrs. Anderson are suing the Worldwide Church of God for $6,000,000 damages for a swindle carried out when God's witch-doctors convinced them that God said that Germany (!) was going to destroy the United States in 1975 and they could save their lives only by fleeing to the famous ruins of Petra in what is now Jordan. This case, so far as I have heard, has not yet come to trial.

A few more large verdicts will probably convince the innovative salvation-mongers of the wisdom of the old-fashioned and orthodox Christian marabouts, who promise their customers only that they will have a high old time with Jesus after they die. Such canny dervishes have never been sued by a dissatisfied customer.

Now I see from the Washington Post (19 August 1985) that a supple actor named Pat Robertson, who expertly pitches the Jesus-jabber to the boobs over the Jews' boob-tubes, boasts that he's the top man in the racket and extracts $230,000,000 a year from the nitwits. According to the newspaper, he tells his customers that Yahweh pays off financially to people who give Robertson a tenth of their income. I wonder whether some disappointed investor in heavenly fools' gold will ask the courts to give him part of the $230,000,000 as compensation for having had a tenth of his income taken for some years by a fast-talking salesman who sold him worthless stock in Jesus & Co. with a guarantee that it would promptly pay dividends in cash.

The suit that I really want to see, however, will be brought by a "creation scientist" who has sobered up. He will sue the National Education Association and the public schools he attended for ten or twenty million dollars as compensation for their having so soaked his brain in "One World" swill and hogwash about the equality of races that he was left with so little intelligence that he could believe the creation-myth in the Jew book and make a fool of himself publicly.

That will be the day!

NEW HOAXES FOR OLD

In the April issue of Liberty Bell (pp. 15-20), commenting on an article by the Reverend Mr. L. F. de Boer, I discussed briefly the activity of Unitarians in spreading superstition and subversion to incite the revolution that irreparably destroyed the American Republic in 1861. That many Unitarians promoted that calamitous and crazed agitation is indubitable. It is, of course, most unlikely that all of them did. And, so far as I know, there are no statistics to show whether the agitators formed a majority or a minority in the Unitarian churches at that time.

A number of readers have written me about that little article. Several justly observed that the Unitarian doctrine, which denies that the Jesus of the "New Testament" was a piece of the Christian god, was far from being a heresy, as Mr. de Boer supposed, but was, instead, the belief of the earliest Christian sects; it is thus more authentically Christian than the Trinitarian nonsense. That, of course, is quite true. Historically, the absurd notion of a three-in-one god was excogitated by a pack of holy men, led by an agitator named Athanasius, who wanted to have both Yahweh and Jesus as gods, but wanted also to be able to claim that their cult was a monotheism. It required a century of frantic persecution and slaughter to compel a majority of the Christians to pretend to believe anything so absurd as the doctrine stated in what is called the "Athanasian Creed." (No one who knows anything about the history of Christianity will need to be told that the text of that creed, so commonly recited in churches today, was not written by Athanasius; it was, naturally, a later forgery under his name, although it incorporates, with some modifications, the Trinitarian unreason that he championed.)

There is nothing remarkable about a trinity of gods. Everyone thinks at once of the Hindu Trimūrti (Brahman, Vishnu, Siva), the Capitoline Triad at Rome (originally, Jupiter, Quirinus, Mars; later, Jupiter, Juno, Minerva), and the three gods who shared the great temple at Uppsala (Odin, Thor, Frey). A pantheon headed by a trinity of major gods is the natural form of an Aryan religion, and Dumézil is doubtless right in believing that such a pantheon is required by the tripartite thinking that is inherent in the Aryan mentality.[1] Thus a trinity would make a new religion appeal to Aryans by satisfying this subconscious proclivity, and Jesus could have been represented as an avatar of the second of the three gods, just as Krishna was an avatar of Vishnu.[2]

The wily Fathers of the Church, however, did have a rather difficult problem in formulating their doctrine. Their most urgent task was to exterminate the numerous Christian sects, including the Marcionists (probably the largest of all Christian sects at that time), who rejected the Jews' ferocious god, and who did regard Jesus as the avatar of a much greater and nobler god. So the Fathers had to canonize the Jew-book as an "Old Testament" to bring in Yahweh, and they couldn't describe Jesus as just an avatar, because that was what was said by the Christians whom they were going to slaughter as soon as they got their hands on the powers of government. And a trinity could be filled out by including that vaporous figure of legend,

1. Perhaps the most convenient introduction to the work of Georges Dumézil available in English is his Gods of the Ancient Northmen, translated under the supervision of Professor Einar Haugen, with two scholarly introductions, by C. Scott Littleton and Udo Strutynski, which will give a fairly complete account of Dumézil's many other writings (Berkeley, University of California Press, 1973; paperback, 1977). The tripartite form of Aryan thinking appears in everything from fairy tales, in which it is always the third attempt that is successful, to the Hegelian model, thesis, antithesis, and synthesis. When Christianity was first peddled to the Norse, they were quite willing to add another god to their pantheon, and seem to have admitted Jesus to the Trinity in place of Frey (see the Eyrbyggja Saga, which, so far as I know, has not been translated; there is an edition by Einar Sveinsson in the Icelandic Fornrit).– Incidentally, let me remark here that when we speak of the first god in the Hindu Trinity, we should always spell his name Brahman (masculine) to distinguish it from Brahma (neuter), the impersonal force that is the origin of the cosmos and all in it.

2. As is well known, quite a few details of the Jesus-myth were taken from the story of Krishna, and it is not a coincidence that the long interpolation in the Mahābhārata called the Bhagavadgītā, a lecture by Krishna, is the work of Sanskrit literature that most strongly appeals to modern readers who may know nothing of the rest of that literature. It seems "Christian" to them, although it is, of course, much older than the tales in the "New Testament."

the Holy Ghost, whom they chose to regard as male instead of female, as a few Christian sects believed it to be. But a simple trinity wouldn't do, because the Jews had by this time had the brilliant idea of stealing Graeco-Roman Stoicism by claiming to be monotheists also. The Fathers' solution was to squash the three gods into one, although even so they couldn't quite make the cult a monotheism, because they needed an anti-god, called Satan, to explain their chosen myths.

What makes the Fathers' attempt to have everything both ways at the same time so offensive to rational men is the claim that the three gods are one and the same, existing from all eternity as parts of a single whole, but that one-third of the compound, Yahweh, became the daddy of another third, Jesus, vicariously (!), sending the third piece of himself, the Holy Ghost, to seduce and impregnate a human virgin. That, of course, is simply incomprehensible, but, as that sleazy old shyster, Tertullian, brazenly boasted, Christians must believe such poppycock precisely because it is absurd and impossible. Good Christians should have bird-brains, as they were instructed to have by Jesus in the ranting that Perier aptly calls the Drivel on the Mount, and just stop thinking. If one can suspend thought to believe the "Divine Mystery," he could also believe the story that Jack climbed the beanstalk to the ogre's castle in the clouds, but poor Jack does not have swarms of shamans to excite Faith in that Mystery. (If the beanstalk is an impediment, it could be advantageously replaced by one of the ladders on which, as all Christians are taught by their "inerrant" Holy Book, angels climb down to earth for wrestling-matches.)[3]

Needless to say, there have always been Christians who do not turn off their minds, as they were ordered to do; they could not stomach the Trinitarian rubbish of Athanasius and his successors, and if they were not cowed by the Orthodox threat of fire and sword, they kept executioners and sometimes armies busy during the Dark and Middle Ages, as the Establishment had to suppress heresy after heresy. The Arians and many others could be called "Unitarians," but it is best to reserve that name for the theological movement that began in Poland with the dissident holy men who identified their doctrine by calling themselves Unitarii and so coining the name by which their theological position has subsequently been known in a cult that more or less directly descended from their writings.[4]

3. According to the version of the tale in Genesis, 32.24-30, it was old Yahweh himself on whom Jakob tried to get a half-nelson, and Yahweh won the bout by a foul, trying to cripple his opponent. Yahweh would automatically have been declared the loser and disqualified from further competitions by a modern referee and judges' committee, but the rules of the sport had not been codified at that early date. Whether Yahweh climbed down the ladder or came down by a different route is not stated, so True Believers must be content with another Mystery at that point.

The early Unitarians claimed—I know not how sincerely—to be expounding the true meaning of Holy Writ, the infallible Word of God, and quibbled (as did Socinus) about the kind of religious respect that should be shown to Jesus, but Aryans whose moral sense has not been anaesthetized are naturally repelled by the Jewish ethics of the "Old Testament," e.g., by

4. The term Unitarii first appears on a collection of tractates by Crellius, Socinus, and quite a few other "Unitarians" in Poland, published at Amsterdam as the Bibliotheca fratrum Polonorum quos Unitarios vocant in 8 volumes, 1665-1669. In the turmoil that followed the great schism of Luther, a considerable latitude of theological opinions was temporarily and precariously possible in Poland, thanks to the power of the nobility and the weakness of the central government, until the intrigues of the Jesuits put a stop to it. Persons interested in that period would do well to read the De republica and other writings of Andreas Fricius Modrevius, whose Opera omnia were collected and reprinted by the Polish Academy in Warsaw, 1954-1958. They are particularly instructive because Fricius was neither an ecclesiastic nor an amateur dervish; he was a landed gentleman, whose principal interest was in devising some sort of compromise that would end or at least abate the endless logomachies and furious disputaillerie of the many individuals whose imaginations had severally disclosed to them what old Yahweh really had in mind.– It may be significant that Unitarianism seems to have been sparked by the treatise De operibus Dei (Argentorati, 1527), written by Cellarius but often supposed to represent the acroamatic teaching of his master, Johan Reuchlin (Johannes Capnio or Capnio Phorcensis), the eminent Humanist who unfortunately became acquainted with Giovanni Pico della Mirandola, whose heavy purse had been lightened and whose brain had been addled by the Jewish colony in Florence. Reuchlin was infected with a belief in Kabbalistic hocus-pocus by Pico, and it was through Reuchlin that the Kabbalah exerted so great an influence over Protestant theologians and clergymen. We should remember that without Reuchlin, Luther's Reformation would probably have been squelched in short order. The Dominicans' ruthless persecution of Reuchlin aroused his admiring and grateful pupil, Ulrich von Hutten, who probably cared much more for Ciceronian diction than for theological fantasies, and it was to defend Reuchlin that von Hutten not only wrote a large part of the Epistolae obscurorum virorum but used his position as a military adviser to lead Franz von Sickingen and the whole Ritterstand in on the Protestant side. Nice arguments are good, but first-rate fighting men are better.

the shocking tale that when the Israelites were running out of Egypt, laden with all the loot they had obtained by pilfering and swindling the stupid Egyptians who had trusted them, their accomplice up in the welkin not only miraculously parted the waters of the Red Sea and instantly dried the mud on its bottom to help his pets escape, but used his miracle as a trap to drown all the pursuing Egyptians, who were trying to recover their stolen property, thus providing a lesson for goyim who are so filled with prejudice that they do not appreciate the honor of being robbed by Jews. So vicious a god is unacceptable to our moral standards, and the Unitarians soon came to a position of Deism, retaining a tenuous link with Christianity by according to selected tales in the Holy Book the value of moral stories that convey ethical lessons and examples. That is obviously what Thomas Jefferson understood Unitarianism to be.

I do not know whether it would be possible to trace precisely the development of Unitarian doctrine from a Scriptural exegesis to a complete Deism, modified only by a rather sentimental esteem for the morally acceptable parts of the pronouncements attributed to the protagonist of the "New Testament." The English Unitarians moved most rapidly toward Deism, but a prudent concern for avoiding persecution, legal and social, and a constantly increasing tendency to let doctrine depend on the individual's conscience and reason, make it hard to be certain how far toward unmitigated Deism a given individual went.

From England, Unitarianism spread rapidly to the Puritans of New England with the decay of their Calvinism and the loss of faith in strict predestination. By c. 1810, Unitarians, nominally Puritans, controlled almost all the churches in Boston and the theological studies at Harvard. A noted Unitarian, said to have had great influence, was the Reverend "Dr." Theodore Parker, the well-known conspirator and sponsor of the much-admired homicidal maniac, John Brown. Parker never stated his religious doctrine explicitly, as he could have in one sentence: "There is but one god, the one who has wisely given his power-of-attorney to Theodore Parker."

In sum, since the tradition of Western Christianity made Jesus a god, Mr. de Boer is entirely correct in regarding the Unitarians of New England as heretical. But since they rejected the authority of the "New Testament," they are saved from the guilt of calculated deceit, of which we must convict all the Abolitionists who were Protestants and claimed to base their doctrines on the text of the "New Testament," but pretended mendaciouly that their god had not specifically authorized slavery.[5]

Two of the persons who wrote me were particularly interested in the status of the Unitarians today. They visited local Unitarian churches and asked friends in other parts of the country to do likewise. The reports agree that congregations are small and probably declining; that the members represent a level of education and social decorum markedly higher than could be found in other churches; that there is nothing of the proselytism that makes other cults so often offensive; and that the clergy are civilized men who pointedly abstain from fanaticism and such vulgarity as that of the holy men who are constantly agitating for free advertising of their businesses in the schools ("prayers"). There is no talk about gods and other holy spooks; and wedding ceremonies, for example, do not pretend that some supernatural being is authorizing the marriage. The anthems are based on the traditional ones, the words being rewritten to eliminate "the usual nonsense." The ministers were generally praised as "a gentleman," "an extremely well-educated scholar," "a fine man," etc. The emphasis of sermons was heavily on brotherhood, "love," and good relations between people. Biological evolution was generally accepted, and there was never a hint of the tomfoolery called "creation science." And despite the prevailing notion about "brotherhood," one clergyman deprecated the activity of the pulpit punks who are committing treason by reviving the "underground railways" of the Abolitionist conspirators and using them to import enemy aliens and give them "sanctuary" by a fraudulent pretense they are reviving the practices of Mediaeval Catholicism.

One report was extremely interesting, and I have mentioned contemporary Unitarianism here as an introduction to consideration of it. It comes from a man who had obviously never heard of Liberty Bell and probably had never seen any publication of what is called the "right wing." He was, however, a man of native intelligence.

He was much pleased by the learning and civility of the

5. There can be no question about what the "New Testament" says on this point, on which I touched briefly in Liberty Bell, April 1985, p. 19. In the period before 1860 and even thereafter, there were many honest clergymen who admitted that the "New Testament" explicitly sanctions slavery as an institution, which must therefore be approved by all Christians, but in the Northern states they were howled down by the revolutionary agitators, who lied brazenly, if they claimed religious sanction of their subversion of the Republic.

Unitarian minister, whom he met before attending a service in the church, and by the assurance he would hear nothing about God, Jesus, or similar nonsense. But when he attended the service on Sunday, "it happened to be some sort of anniversary or other of what the Jews have called the Holocaust, when Hitler murdered some six million of them." Accordingly, "the minister preached a sermon on the inhumanity of the Nazis and the tortures inflicted on the Jews. He had everyone practically in tears as he described the atrocities. At the end, everyone was simply oozing with pity and sympathy for the poor persecuted race. On the face of it, that was logical and natural and I was sympathetic and realized, as I always have, that that was no way for the Nazis to behave, in the name of common decency and humanity."

So far, the writer of the letter and the minister are on the same footing. Obviously, neither had ever heard of Professor Butz's definitive Hoax of the Twentieth Century or any of the many books and articles that tell the truth about what happened to the Jews during the National Socialist régime in Germany. That is not remarkable. The Jews are using every resource from open terrorism to their control of all the media of communication to force their Aryan cattle to believe their great hoax. And whenever there are any indications that White Americans might be beginning to use their brains, the word goes out to the media of communication, "The swine are becoming restless. Man the pumps and squirt more sludge in the faces of the dumb brutes." And well-coached "survivors" appear from the woodwork to tell everyone how they saw their dear poppas and mamas and their so sweet Schwesterlein and all their so innocent uncles and aunts and dear little cousins stuffed into the ovens by the horrid Nazis, who, unaccountably, overlooked the Sheeny who "survived" and is now wailing in public. And there are even Germans so despicable that they perform for the Jews on well-paid lecture-circuits and beat their breasts on the stage as they confess to collective guilt for having killed all of the six million Jews who are now in the United States and paying them to lie to the stupid goyim. In Canada, the courts are already being used to teach Aryan curs that they must not presume to have thoughts that do not bear the Kosher seal of approval, and pseudo-legal terrorism is already well under way in the United States. Most Americans have the stinking swill squirted in their faces every day, and it is not remarkable that they believe at least some part of what they are not only told but are shown in motion pictures produced with all the technical expertise of Hollywood. Few even notice that the actors who impersonate the poor, brave, persecuted Jews are Aryans, whereas the actors who impersonate the nasty Nazis are Kikes who have only to exhibit their natural personalities to seem repulsive and inhuman.

Both the writer of the report and the minister believed that the Holohoax was not just a filthy fiction, but was instead a veracious account of what had actually happened. Neither noticed that the hoax describes events that are physically and chemically impossible; one needs a little knowledge about poison gases and cremation of bodies to see that. But there was a great intellectual difference between the two men. At that point, the minister turned off his mind and started emoting. The other man did not. "I could not help thinking," he said, "that Hitler must have had some reason for what he did. Why did he do it? Then the answer struck me: the Jews are the last word in clannishness. Jews usually intermarry, to the extent that there are some specific illnesses among them due to inbreeding. All else being equal, a Jew will only do business with another Jew. All Jews feel that first they are Jews and only incidentally citizens of their country. But if I state some of these things, I will instantly set off screams of 'Racist!' The Jews are a power-hungry and money-hungry race. That sort of minority is not good for any country, and Hitler decided to do something about it. Most emphatically I disagree with his methods, but still I can see his reason for them. Regardless of whether we consider Hitler a genius, a lunatic, an evil agressor, or whatever, he certainly needed a united Germany to attain his ends, and I can see clearly that he must have figured that with such a clan as the Jews in the country, Germany could never be united, especially as the Jews had probably cornered most of the wealth in Germany and would undoubtedly have tried to corner the remainder in the turmoil of a war. It is well-known that the Jews grabbed vast amounts of wealth in Central Europe over the centuries.

"If six million Jews were slaughtered in Germany, what about all the other fine people who were killed in the lunacy of that war? Several nations participating in the Second World War lost several million people each, in addition to vast numbers who were wounded and maimed, for whom life was hardly worth living thereafter. Maybe someone should remember them as having given their sweet lives for nothing in a war which

The writer went on to protest that he did not hate Jews and to mention Einstein, Disraeli, and others as great men. He even added, "I have several good Jewish friends who are quite willing to admit that the Jewish attitude may some day mean the end of their race, but, once again, that seems to be one of the things that everyone agrees is wrong but nobody does anything about."

The foregoing is an object lesson that we must all perpend. It is, in a way, an epitome of our racial dilemma. We have here two men of our race, equally uninformed, equally ignorant of the historical facts, equally deceived by the intensive brainwashing to which the Jews subject Americans from the cradle to the grave.

The Unitarian minister is an intelligent man. He's much too intelligent to believe in the foolish miracles of Christian mythology—too intelligent to take seriously the great hoax called the "New Testament." But he gullibly accepted an equally flagrant hoax. It is true that he evidently did not have the very elementary knowledge of chemistry and physics that would have shown him that the Jews' tales about their "Holocaust" were as physically impossible as a claim that a man who had been very dead for three days was able to sneak out of his tomb when no one was looking, but he presumably had the common sense that prevents a rational man from believing that Satan picked up Jesus, a piece of God, carried him to the top of a mountain, and tempted him by offering a lot of money and a job as a king. But the minister's common sense did not warn him that if Hitler did try to rid Germany of Jews, he, a man of great and undeniable accomplishments, which presuppose a very high degree of prudence and practical knowledge amounting to genius, must have done so for rational and cogent reasons, and not because Satan inspired him to slay a Holy and Blameless Race.

The minister must have shut up his common sense in a closet and locked the door before he started orating to whip up the blind emotions of his captive audience. He might as well have stirred them up with rhetoric about how Jesus-God had himself killed so that he would not punish them for the sins they were going to commit after they were born, two thousand years later. One subject is as useful as the other for exciting mindless emotions, and I have seen a salvation-huckster reduce the females in his congregation to sobs as he intoxicated their imaginations with artfully rhetorical embellishments of the silly story. If that had been the Unitarian's purpose, he would have done better to stick to the old hokum, but given the high opinion of him expressed by an intelligent man, we may assume that the preacher was sincere and really believed that the Holohoax had actually happened, contrary to all of human experience, and so presumably through some supernatural agency!

How shall we explain the startling contrast between the preacher and the man who heard him but had not left his own common sense in the deep freezer at home? Needless to say, we may not generalize from a single instance, but I shall suggest a tentative hypothesis. The preacher had emancipated himself from most of the Christian superstitions, but he had retained a blind and unthinking faith in what may be the most pernicious of all of them, the illusion of a "brotherhood" that denies the biological facts of race and implies something so patently absurd as the equality of races and even the equality of individuals, since the great difference between individuals is attributed to what they have been taught, not to genetically innate qualities. And, as I have so often remarked, a person who narcotizes his common sense so that he can enjoy undisturbed the comforting hallucinations that human beings are not subject to the laws of biology, has so weakened his mind that he can also believe any kind of hokum for which clever con men whet his appetite.

THE EXEMPLARY JEWS

Americans differ about the propriety and expediency of taking a large part of Palestine from the Arabs and giving it to the Jews to have as their own country, the state now called Israel. They often deplore the action by which the British government betrayed the Arabs, whom they had promised that region as one of the inducements to persuade them to revolt against Turkey, and promised it to the Jews in return for American troops and munitions, which the Jews' puppet in the White House would supply to save Britain from a crushing defeat in her war against Germany. The Balfour Declaration, so called because it was signed by the Foreign Minister in Lloyd George's government, was really the work of Lord Milner (on whom, see part II of my 'Populism' and 'Élitism'). We cannot tell what was in his mind. It is not inconceivable that, in addition to the urgent need to buy large amounts of American cannonfodder, he had in mind the promise implied by early Zionist propaganda, that if the Jews were given the "homeland" they wanted, all the Jews of Europe would flock to it, and Great Britain would at last be Judenfrei.

All these considerations, however, are water that has long since gone over the Niagara of history. Whether or not it should have been done, it was done. The Jews now have a country that is theirs, Israel, which they are expanding as rapidly as American resources permit.

Now I learn from a despatch from the United Press, which appeared in Detroit News on 19 July, that the Mormons want to establish an "academic center" (whatever that is) in Israel. I cannot imagine what possessed the Mormons to want to do anything so foolish,* but that is irrelevant here. What is significant is that the project aroused immediate and justified resentment in Israel. Rabbis thundered in alarm; thousands of Jews ran to their Wailing Wall to wail; and Rabbi Meir Kahane, a member of the Israeli government who often says aloud what his more discreet colleagues only think in silence, issued an ultimatum. He has vowed to drive all the Semites (often called "Arabs" because they speak dialects of Arabic) from the territory the Jews now hold or will occupy in the future, as, indeed, his religion requires Jews to do under penalty of severe chastisement from Yahweh, if they disobey his commands. Kahane, naturally, could not tolerate an invasion of his country by aliens, American goyim. He bluntly told the Mormons: "Get out or we will throw you out."

No American in his senses can blame Kahane for loyalty to his race or for an intelligent understanding of what constitutes a nation. On the contrary, we must recognize in him a clear-sighted and sagacious patriot in his own country, a man who has set us an example that we should take to heart and emulate in our country—ours in the sense that we could recover possession of it, if we had the courage and intelligence, i.e., if we are still a

* Although there are many signs of incipient decay and eventual collapse, the principal Mormon sect, with headquarters in Salt Lake City, is still the most cohesive and flourishing Christian church in the United States. As everyone knows, it supplements the Christian Bible with much improved gospels, composed by Joseph Smith. It has kept a great deal of Christian terminology, with some interpretation of its own, and I remember that years ago, when I was lecturing in Salt Lake City, one of my hosts, an eminent Mormon, pointed out to me the curious fact that Utah is the only place in the world where Jews are Gentiles.

If we Aryans are not hopelessly degenerate, we will claim the United States as our own country, and we will tell all the pestiferous and pullulant swarms of aliens now squatting on our soil, "Get out or we will throw you out."

MUTTON FROM MUTTON-HEADS

I learn from the Jewish Press, 14 June 1985, p. 44, that some citizens of San Angelo, Texas, full of Christian luff for God's People, selected twenty-seven choice sheep and shipped them, at "enormous cost," by chartered airplane as a gift to a small agricultural commune, or kibbutz, south of Jerusalem. San Angelo is a town of perhaps 80,000 in west central Texas, about 150 miles north of the Rio Grande. Six Christian holy men whooped it up for the great airlift, and funds were collected from local goyim. The sheep were of a special breed, called Rambouillet, produced by the ordinary techniques of genetics to yield superior wool and mutton. The sheep were not bred for intelligence. Neither were the mutton-heads who shipped them.

GOD'S WILL

I learn from the Christian News that more than six hundred pious Christians, of the varieties that a friend of mine likes to call "funny-mentalists," met in Basel in the hall that was made sacred when the first publicly announced Zionist Congress met in it eighty-eight years ago. The god-fearing folk were representatives of various churches in Europe and America and pledged themselves to make their churches understand that it is God's will that all Christians dedicate themselves, body and soul, to helping God's People exterminate the Semites in at least part of Asia Minor. Their "inerrant" Bible, they said, imposes on all goyim a "philosophical [sic!] mandate" to venerate, love, and serve God's Own.

In addition to the various sects of "funny-mentalists," the Roman Catholics were represented by some of their high-pressure theologians, including a professor from the Catholic University of Tilburg, who deplored the failure of his Pope to coöperate closely with the holy folk who are at present terrorizing and butchering the inhabitants of Lebanon, in accordance with the will of their blood-thirsty god. The professor knew somehow that "Jesus prayed for unity between Jews and Christians." Since Jesus is at least a piece of God himself, Jesus must have been praying to himself in a kind of divine soliloquy, and although the professor did not disclose the time at which the praying was done, Jesus must obviously have done it when back home in his Heaven, and one wonders what the sanctified souls of Martin Luther and a hundred other holy men, now revered by Fundamentalists, thought when they heard Jesus contradict what he had told them.

I know there are many Christians who will dissent from the pronouncements of their delegates in Basel, but unfortunately they are trapped in a dilemma. If their Bible is "inerrant," as they claim, no sophistries can avail against Yahweh's explicit and repeated promise that he will help his ferocious pets annihilate by stages all the inhabitants of all the countries they invade. More than that, he has laid upon his People the absolute duty to exterminate not only all anthropoids in the countries they take over, but every animal: "thou shalt save alive nothing that breatheth" (Deuteron. 20.16; 7.16); although at other times Yahweh seems to be content with less blood: "ye shall drive out all the inhabitants of the land from before you . . . and ye shall dispossess them" (Numer. 33.52-53), and at other times he promised his Chosen that the goyim would be their slaves (Isaias 61.5). And the Christians can't pretend that their god changed his mind, because their Jesus emphatically stated that he was interested only in Jews and called non-Jews dogs (Matt. 15.24-26; 10.6). So Christians, if their Bible is "inerrant," had better hasten to do obeisance to their god-given masters. And if it isn't "inerrant," but is just a story-book full of nonsense, their religion has no basis at all and is certainly less entertaining than the Arabian Nights or the Kathāsaritsāgara.

I am sincerely sorry for the poor folk who are impaled on the horns of that dilemma, but there is no escape from it. The Jews are foreclosing their mortgage on their Christian subsidiary, and that should be no surprise. It was in 1886 that Rabbi Solomon Schindler told a Christian congregation in Boston that Christianity was just a wayward daughter, who was out having her fling, but would have to come home to her nice Jewish mama and beg to be forgiven.

The only question is whether the American delegates in Basel, in their preoccupation with what the Jews are doing again in their old Canaan, quite perpended the fact that they, like the other Americans, are the inhabitants of the New Canaan and can learn from the passages in their Bible that I cited above just what is in store for them.

BROTHERS UNDER THE SKIN

The Religious News Service reports from Vatican City on the latest promotional work of John Paul II, Vice-President in Charge of Sales in the Catholic Corporation. (The President, a Jew named Jesus, has retired to his home in the clouds, and does not visit the office.) After having tried to tap the huge market in China without much success, John Paul paid a visit to King Hassan II of Morocco, who claims to be a descendant of Mahomet. The Pope told the Moslems that they all worshipped the same god and that the only obstacle to a merger of two great corporations was a trifling difference of opinion, the question whether old Jesus was a piece of Allah or simply a divinely-inspired precursor of Mahomet.

That proposition would have left dumbfounded all the heroes of Western Christianity, from the legendary Roland to the historical Charles Martel, Godefroy de Bouillon, and the thousand other leaders of the millions of Christians who, during thirteen centuries, smote the paynim hip and thigh and died on behalf of a god whom they called Christ, incidentally saving Europe from conquest by Semites and asserting the valor and power of our race. Had they known what John Paul, in his official capacity as their God's Vicar on Earth, was going to tell King Hassan, they would have hanged their priests on Odin's tree and our civilization would not have flowered with a lethal canker in its heart.

There are today many literate Christians, who have read both their Bible and the Koran (Qur'ān, 'the Reader,' edited by Mahomet from the text in Heaven). They have probably heard of John Paul's sales talk to Mahomet's great[33] -grandson, but I don't know whether they threw both books into the trash-bin or retired with a quart or two of Glenlivet to think things over.

There could be no better proof that Western Christianity is dead and gone. It was part of a great era in our history and deserves an honorable burial.

L'ENVOI

I have had frequently to discuss in these pages what appears to me to be the crux of our race's dilemma and the prime cause of its prostration, religion. I have often spoken of it unsympathetically, but not without a latent regret for a past for which we may all feel a hopeless nostalgia. One aspect of it, I think was most concisely expressed by Sir William Watson in his well-known poem, "The Churchyard":

I wandered far in the wold,
  And after the heat and glare,
I came at eve to a churchyard old:
  The yew-trees seemed at prayer.

And around me was dust in dust;
  And the fleeting light; and Repose;
And the infinite pathos of human trust
  In a God whom no man knows.

THE JEWISH PSYCHE

It is always extremely difficult for a member of one race to understand, or even to appraise fairly, the mentality of another race. I have often commented on a puzzling aspect of the Jewish mind, the strange désinvolture—no, it's more than that: the downright negligence with which they perpetrate hoaxes that an Aryan would not attempt without spending an hour or two to make sure that his canard was plausible. (I gave some examples in Liberty Bell, November 1984, pp. 8-17.)

Consider, for example, a booklet, The True Authorship of the New Testament, written by a Jew who uses the pseudonym Abelard Reuchlin, and published by the Abelard Reuchlin Foundation in Kent, Washington.

Everyone who has even a superficial knowledge of Roman history knows of the conspiracy to overthrow Nero that was led by C. Calpurnius Piso, a scion of one of Rome's greatest families, and included Lucan (M. Annaeus Lucanus), one of Rome's greatest poets. Nero has always been regarded tenderly by the Jews, because, after he murdered his mother and his first wife, he married one of his mistresses, the aristocratic Poppaea Sabina, who was either a Jewess through some Jewish contamination of her family line, such as is so common in the remnants of the British aristocracy today, or a light-headed and exhibitionistic female, like so many wealthy women who today take up bizarre and exotic religions to nurture their astral souls.* Presumably under her influence, Nero showed great favor to the Jews, and that, in Jewish estimation, seems to outweigh actions to which they might object: when a swarm of Jewish Bolsheviks (called Chrestiani, just as their modern successors are called Marxists) confessed to having set the great conflagration that destroyed a large part of Rome, he had them executed with notable cruelty; and when the Jews in Palestine attempted another revolt, he sent a few legions to put them down in a peace-keeping operation that resulted, after his death, in the siege and capture of Jerusalem. They even forgive him for having killed Poppaea Sabina by kicking her in the belly when she was pregnant.

Now the tale imagined by "Abelard Reuchlin" and presented as historical is that under Nero all the Romans were about to recognize the supremacy of the Jew god, Yahweh, and the race he had Chosen to rule the earth, but C. Calpurnius Piso was a very wicked goy, a 'Nazi' by anticipation, who conspired against Nero to prevent the world from being blessed by the Jews. When he failed, his vile son carried on his dastardly work by forging the "New Testament" and all the writings of Josephus to slander and defame God's People.

The story, set forth with elaborate and absurd pseudo-historical argument, is so preposterous it isn't even funny, and I mention it here only for the name its author chose for his imaginary son of the historical Calpurnius Piso: Arius Calpurnius Piso. He intends us to believe that the son's praenomen was 'Arius,' just as the father's was Gaius (for which C. is the standard abbreviation).

Now ten minutes in a respectable library would have informed "Abelard Reuchlin" that the Romans used a very limited number of given names, and he could have found a complete list of them in any one of a score of standard reference works, e.g., Egbert's Introduction to the Study of Latin Inscriptions. The great families of the aristocracy each limited themselves to a very small range of given names for their children, and a reference to the index to Broughton's Magistrates of the Roman Republic would have shown that the Calpurnii gave to each son one of six praenomina, of which the Calpurnii Pisones used only five: Gaius, Gnaeus, Lucius, Marcus, and Quintus. That a member of the family could have been given the name 'Arius' is a fiction so preposterous that is not even ludicrous: it is merely contemptible.

* I gave here a commonly accepted story about Poppaea Sabina, which is presupposed in the booklet I am discussing, but I must not be thought to guarantee its authenticity. Many historians regard the story about her Judaism as just another Jewish hoax, and I am inclined to agree with them.

If you and I were to devise some hoax to trap boobies that involved inventing a son for George Washington, we would probably call that son George, Jr., and if we didn't do that, we certainly wouldn't imagine a son named Igor Washington or Texas Washington or Sitting Bull Washington or Mohammed Washington. And if we were so ignorant that we thought such a name acceptable, we, being Aryans, would spend a few minutes in a library, discover why such a name was utterly impossible, and revise our fiction to make it at least superficially credible. But Jews never spend the few minutes. I don't know whether that is because truth to the Jewish mind is whatever is Good for the Jewish People, or because they have such sovereign contempt for a race that has been willing to put faith in tales about virgin births and dead men who sneak out of their tombs after three days, or because they like to show their dominion over their vassals by making the cringing creatures profess to believe fictions that were designedly made preposterous, such as the famous "Holocaust."

THE MIRACULOUS NEEDLE'S EYE

The late H. L. Hunt was one of the eight or ten men whom journalists liked to call "the richest man in the U.S." He was noted for his eccentricities, parsimony, and dogmatism, which he often supported with lavish subsidies. He tried to arrest the continuing Communization of the United States with a well-printed and ably edited magazine that brought to prominence the late Dan Smoot (the author of The Invisible Government), and then he liquidated it overnight on what was evidently a sudden whim. He published under his name an odd work of fiction about an imaginary country called Alpaca, for which he devised an ideal constitution (his ideal, of course). And in his later years he financed a very expensive radio program that tried to make an emulsion out of Jesus, free enterprise, and capitalism as Hunt understood it.

H. L. Hunt's most prominent heir is Nelson Bunker Hunt, who attained some notoriety with temerarious speculations in silver, and more recently adorned with his visage the cover of the Saturday Evening Post for January-February 1985. He is, of course, an extremely rich man and not without some cultivation, for he has an extensive collection of Greek vases, coins, and bronzes, but according to the article in the Post, he regards Christianity as his "greatest investment." Aside from a trifling $5,500,000 for a movie about the famous Jesus, he promotes such wealthy showmen as Robertson and Falwell, who so lucratively pitch the woo for Jesus and the Jews over the boob-tubes, and he rejoices that Falwell's collegiate incubator is hatching out two hundred and fifty fast-talking theologians every year to "fight agnosticism and atheism" with clever gabble to stun the simpleminded. He finances a Campus Crusade to make college students even more superstitious than the public schools have made them. And he has his god's spiel, brought up-to-date in Hollywood with all the tricks of the cinema business, spread "world-wide" in "60 or 80 languages" to induce all kinds of fuzzy-wuzzies to lease apartments in the mansions that old Jesus is said to be building someplace up there in the clouds. The article does not venture to guess how many scores of millions N. B. Hunt must dispense each year to promote mental fixations on Jewish myths.

The only interesting thing is that this egregious billionaire professes belief in the Bible and must have read, in his favorite King James Version, the tales in which Jesus ben Yahweh loudly proclaims, thrice for emphasis, "It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God." Now since this Jesus is a god or at least one-third of one, he must be presumed to know what he is talking about, especially on a point like this, which he makes over and over and without contradicting himself, as he so often does when he hasn't thought things out clearly. So Jesus has most emphatically assured N. B. Hunt that he, the aforesaid N. B. Hunt, is going to be broiled for millions and billions of years and thereafter for all eternity on a red-hot griddle somewhere under the ground and yet where the happy ghosts of trillions of squalid and malicious proletarians can gloat over his sufferings. And yet N. B. Hunt is spending millions and millions to glorify the celestial monster who is going to torture him for all eternity!

It doesn't make sense, and since we must credit Hunt with some intelligence, it follows that he must have been convinced by some slick holy man that Jesus didn't mean what he said. That should be hard to do, since there is no possible mistake about what Jesus meant by the standard rhetorical figure of adynaton (reductio ad impossibile). The tales are full of his assertions that people who own property must sell it and give to the poor, i.e., poor holy men, and everyone knows that the economics of the gospels are pure Communism, so that one could infer that Jesus must have been reading Karl Marx's piffle, if there were no chronological difficulties in the way.

God's con men, however, can talk their way out of any logical impasse, and when they find a rich sucker to milk they usually resort to one of four standard ploys to convince him that they can keep him off the red-hot griddle even if he doesn't make himself a pauper, and they commonly use good capitalist bait by promising that what he gives them is an A-1 investment, guaranteed by old Jesus in person to yield 10,000% profit plus a bonus of "everlasting life" in Jesus's great retirement home upstairs. The profit, by the way, can be collected only after death, and it is a fact that no investor's ghost has ever sued a salvation-huckster for fraud or misleading promises. Christians think this a proof that the game is on the up-and-up.

I don't know which of the standard ploys was used to dazzle N. B. Hunt into making his "greatest investment," on which he is to collect the 10,000% after his funeral, so I list all four of them:

(1) The most common trick of all, perhaps, is to claim that there was in Jerusalem at the time of the story a gate called "The Needle's Eye," so narrow that a laden camel had to be led carefully to get through it. This, of course, is simply a lie, but how could there have been a Christianity to begin with, if the story-tellers had told the truth?

(2) A slightly subtler dodge is to claim that the word 'camel' in the original really means a kind of thin rope or pack thread which can be threaded through the eye of a large needle by a clever seamstress. That's another lie, of course, but few of the con man's prospects would be able to check his statement in a dictionary, and by the time they've heard the rest of his spiel, they are so dazzled they stop thinking anyway.

(3) One argument is that old Jesus didn't mean that all rich must fry—just that they were likely to, if they didn't mind their p's and q's and stay in good with the dervishes. In other words, god on earth was just trying to scare the suckers into signing on the dotted line and getting their souls renovated by professionals.

(4) Some enterprising salesmen in the soul-laundering business simply quote another remark attributed to Jesus: "With God all things are possible." This is taken to mean that if old Yahweh put his mind to it, the largest Bactrian camel could zip through the eye of the needle in your wife's sewing machine as easily as Jesus walked on water or puffed himself up to float up into the clouds, where his daddy was waiting for him. By that rule, of course, one can believe that the whale swallowed Jonah and the wolf swallowed Little Red Riding Hood's grandmother. And if Yahweh took a notion to play hob with arithmetic, why 2 + 2 could equal 5.65 or 1.82 or anything else. Needless to say, that means there is no reality, and it would be much more reasonable to go all the way and adopt the Hindu doctrine that the material universe is only Mahā Māyā, the Great Illusion, and nothing is real. But the salesmen for Yahweh & Son, Inc., never mention the advantages of competing wares.

I can't tell you which bit of hokum convinced Nelson Bunker Hunt that his soul could eventually flit up to Jesus unsinged, and there is the further possibility that what really convinced him was the argument, so widely accepted a century ago, that Christianity can be used to bolster our racial morality, which it boldly expropriated centuries ago and actually undermined. I cannot remember now whether it was Wyndham Lewis or one of his contemporaries who remarked that in the Nineteenth Century the Christianity of the upper classes consisted in pretending to believe what they hoped the lower classes would believe.

INNOVATIVE SALESMANSHIP

I learn from the press that a salvation-salesman in Belleville, Michigan, has invented a new way of attracting customers and reports that it is highly successful. He has leased a "drive-in" theater in which he exhibits nightly, free of charge, godly films, such as The Cross and the Switchblade. During an intermission, he makes his pitch for Yahweh & Son's exclusive merchandise. So now you can repent of your sins and get a dose of Jesus while sitting comfortably in your automobile and fondling the female you have chosen for the evening. It looks as though the United States is fast becoming a Christian nation.

GLADDER TIDINGS FOR CHRISTIANS

Some of the more intelligent among the True Believers have wondered why Christians have been praying away for almost two thousand years without ever having a single prayer answered by their deity. Now, at last, their dubeity is ended by a pronouncement from an unimpeachable source. The answer is simple. They have been barking up the wrong tree.

Their god's real name is Yah-weh, which means 'Daddy Yah,' and he is peeved, if you call him by any other name. He had a son, the Saviour, whose name, naturally, is Yah-shua, which means, 'Yah's son,' just as Jacobson means 'Jacob's son.' You must never, never call him 'Jesus,' because that is the name of a Greek god, Zeus, mispronounced. So when you prey to 'Jesus,' you are really praying to Zeus, and no wonder he won't have anything to do with you.

Yah-shua was born in 68 B.C. on October 13, so that's the day you ought to celebrate, not the pagan festival of the Winter Solstice. He was never crucified. The stupid Jews arrested the wrong guy. Yah's son became a world traveler, lived until he was 110, and was buried in the Great Pyramid at Gizeh. He is to be worshipped on the True Sabbath, which begins at sundown on Thursday and lasts until sunset on Friday. That is because the day is Friday, which means 'Free Day,' although wicked philologists pretend that the name is Anglo-Saxon Frigedæg, 'Frigg's Day.'

There can be no possible doubt about this, and I hope no Christians will condemn themselves by being wicked sceptics, when they believe so many more improbable things every time they go to church. You see, Yah's son got himself born again on earth just to save the pious from their fatal blunder. He calls himself Dr. Joseph Jeffers, and he runs the Kingdom of Yahweh, Inc., in Sun City West, Arizona (P.O. Box 5115). Christians who mean business about getting themselves Born Again had better hot-foot it to the real Messiah while there's time.

A DISCREPANCY

The editor of Liberty Bell noticed the discrepancy between the spelling of 'Maranos' in my quotation from the Jewish encyclopaedia on p. 7 of the June issue and the form 'Marranos' in my comments and in a quotation from a later Jewish compilation. The distinction is one that I should perhaps have explained in a footnote, so I remedy the omission here.

It is commonly but incorrectly said that the Jews were expelled from Spain in 1492. The only Jews who were expelled at that time were Jews who refused to be sprinkled with the Christians' magic water and outwardly adopt Christian practices by attending Christian churches, having their children baptized, etc. The many Jews who professed to be Christians but practiced Jewish rites in secret were not disturbed by the Spanish government in 1492, and the Jews who had theretofore practiced Jewish rites publicly were permitted to remain in Spain if they were willing to be "converted." Only the Jews who refused to profess Christianity were expelled by the decree of Ferdinand and Isabella in 1492.

It is true that the Spanish Inquisition was established for the primary purpose of detecting and punishing Jews who professed to be Christians but secretly continued to perform Jewish rites. This was a perfectly legitimate exercise of governmental power in terms of both Christian and Jewish religious principles. Jews who profess their tribal religion cannot logically object to the Inquisition as politically improper, but only that it was wrongly directed against them. Modern Christians, who apologize for the Inquisition and often describe it as a special wickedness of the Roman Catholic Church, must do so on the supposition that their supposedly omniscient god changed his mind about what he wanted, perhaps at the time that he realized he had made an awful mistake in loving Jews and hating the rest of mankind for several thousand years (4004 B.C. to A.D. 30 or thereabouts).

Since the Fathers of the Church succeeded in exterminating all the other Christian sects, all Christians, with the exception of a very few heretics, have based their faith on a holy book that included what is called the "Old Testament," which teaches, over and over again, the lesson that old Yahweh punished the tribe that he loved for tolerating in their territory persons who did not scrupulously observe the barbaric rites and customs he ordained. It was the responsibility of the tribe or nation to see to it that no individual in their power transgressed the rules that the whim of the big Jew in the clouds had imposed on his Chosen Pets, and if the tribe failed to do so and permitted some person to violate the rules in secret, the vicious old god punished the whole tribe for its negligence in not detecting secret sins. That is the whole burden of the Christians' Jew-book, and according to all Christian theory, after old Yahweh became peeved with the Jews for killing a piece of him, he decided to try the Christians as his pets, and while he changed some of the rules (e.g., about circumcision) for their convenience, it was reasonable to assume that he continued to govern according to his principle of collective responsibility. That has been the belief on which all Christian legislation has been based. It is assumed that old Yahweh is irritated when he sees people dancing on Sunday or watches a woman have an abortion or beholds some other conduct which, according to his dervishes, will get him hot under the collar. Now old Yahweh will grab the transgressors after they die and have them fried in eternal flames for hundreds, thousands, millions, and billions of years, and some of you may think that such endless torture of the offenders should be sufficient to vent his ire. But no, according to Christian doctrine, old Yahweh treats his new pets just as he treated the old, and he will inflict terrible chastisement on the nation that didn't prevent persons from dancing on Sunday or prevent a woman from having an abortion, even if the accursed sinners did so so covertly that no one else could have known about it. Old Yahweh is indeed a terrible god, and it is no wonder that pious Christians live in constant fear of what he may do next.

For fifteen centuries, Christians have been yelling for legislation to force everyone within the nation's borders to do what will please old Yahweh, as determined by the holy men who are in vogue in the given nation at the given time. And Christians have always got the legislation they wanted wherever one of their sects succeeded in dominating the country. And even today they are clamoring for legislation, e.g., to forbid abortions, on the grounds that old Yahweh or some piece of him will smite whole nations that permit conduct he doesn't like. (Abortions are, of course, a racial problem, but Christians can never think about anything rationally, so they squawk about what they think their god thinks about such things.) At the present time, the Christian witch-doctors who put out their bait on the Jews' boob-tubes have been assuring the suckers that old Yahweh didn't really change his mind about the Kikes and will do awful things to nations so wicked they don't submit to his Master Race, but before the Jewish occupation of Western nations, Christians chose to believe the parts of the Jesus-story according to which the incarnate third of their god called his erstwhile pets a "synagogue of Satan" and promised to have them fried in Hell for not guessing who he was in his human disguise.

According to this long unquestioned principle of Christian theology, old Yahweh would afflict all the Spaniards in the Spanish peninsula if they did not prevent Jews from performing in secret the rites which, after the Crucifixion, he began to abominate. The Inquisition was therefore an act of national defense, defense not against human enemies, over whom courage and arms might prevail, but against an irresistible supernatural power that could and would destroy the entire nation, if irritated. To the Spaniards, terror-stricken by their Christian faith, the Inquisition was a solemn duty incumbent on their government. Persons who do not understand that and censure the Spanish people or the Spanish monarchy instead of their Christian superstition are irrationally unjust. After every Jew who practiced openly the religion that had become offensive to old Yahweh had been run out of the country, there were left the many, many thousands of Jews who professed to be Christians but secretly continued to perform the rites to which old Yahweh had taken such vehement dislike. And since old Yahweh was keeping his eye on everyone, every time he saw a Jew try to please him in the ways he liked before he changed his mind about them, old Yahweh was irritated, and if he saw such forbidden conduct very often, and especially if the Spaniards had not shown the utmost diligence in trying to root out the damned Jews, Yahweh was likely to lose his temper and squash Spain as one squashes a cockroach by stepping on it. The Inquisition was Spain's one hope of escaping perdition. The Spanish people, being good Christians, naturally endorsed and supported the Inquisition, and it was only natural for them to hate the perfidious Jews who were endangering the whole nation and might any day destroy it by annoying old Yahweh.

It is true that the Inquisition did not work very well. For one thing, it is simply impossible for any human agency to keep everyone under surveillance all the time. Yahweh, of course, can watch everyone all the time and he does. (You remember that in the old days of the "Old Testament," he, who obviously has the latrine-mentality of the Jews, used to watch them to make sure that they defecated and urinated in Kosher style to entertain him.) Despite the Inquisition and all its spies, who tried to spy on everyone, as does our F.B.I.-Mossad combination, but without modern means of electronic surveillance, disguised Jews who exercised a modicum of circumspection could meet in secret and perform their ancestral rites with very little risk, whenever they wanted to affirm their faith or exercise their contempt for the stupid goyim. And doubtless many Jews no more believed their mythology than do the Zionists today, and thought that the fun of thumbing their nose at the half-witted Aryans in secret wasn't worth the trouble. They, of course, were perfectly safe.

The Inquisition, furthermore, became almost as corrupt as is the American government today. Jews, disguised as Christians, penetrated and perhaps controlled it from the very first. Torquemada is said to have been a Jew himself; his successor as Grand Inquisitor almost certainly was. The Inquisitors did have to punish Jews who became slap-happy or had bad luck and displayed too publicly their contempt for the religion they professed, but the Inquisition was gradually deflected to pursuit of rational men who did not conceal their scepticism, of Christians suspected of Protestant or other heretical thoughts, of unlicensed astrologers and other adventurers who performed magic in competition with the Church, and to in-fighting within the Church, especially between the Dominicans and the Jesuits. The Inquisition was also used to protect political corruption. When one considers the tragic fate of Juan de Mariana, for example, it is almost impossible to determine the relative importance of the venemous hatred of the Dominicans for the Jesuits as opposed to the influence of Spain's Prime Minister, who became righteously wroth because Mariana accused him of doing what he was actually doing but hoped the boobs were too stupid to notice. (He was doing what the Federal Reserve and Congress are doing today.)

In the meantime, Jews who pretended to be Christians penetrated and gained control of the Church in Spain by becoming Bishops and Archbishops; of the aristocracy, chiefly by marrying richly-endowed Jewesses to impoverished or greedy noblemen and thus polluting the aristocracy genetically, as they have done in Britain today; and of the government, by placing Jews in positions of administrative power or, even better, appointing them as letrados to advise and direct stupid goyim in high office, as they do in the United States. Jews have sometimes boasted that they thus ruined Spain to punish the nation for the decree of 1492, the Jews in Spain acting in concert with the Jews ensconsed in other nations to undermine the nation. At all events, Spain did not long remain the dominant world-power, and Jews could gloat over her decadence, whether or not they had conspiratorially engineered it.

Let me repeat emphatically that no Jew was ever expelled from Spain or harassed for being a Jew—only for performing Jewish rites and thus putting the entire nation in peril. No doubt, a few crypto-Jews became tired of keeping up the masquerade or overestimated the risk of being detected by the Inquisition, and accordingly left Spain, especially if they saw an opportunity of greater pickings elsewhere, but they emigrated voluntarily, not under compulsion of any kind.

So much for the Inquisiton, which, to a considerable extent, actually protected the crypto-Jews. Before it was established, a luckless Jew sometimes was caught in, or suspected of, some act that might set off old Yahweh, and the scared Spanish populace broke out in riots in which many Jews were killed, despite efforts of Church and State to protect them. After the Inquisition was charged with the responsibility for keeping watch on the Jews, popular indignation or alarm resulted in only a denunciation of the suspected individual to some spy of the Holy Office.

Now the Spanish term for a Jew who pretended to be Christian and performed Jewish rites in secret, thus endangering the whole nation, was marrano, a good Spanish word meaning 'pig,' and, like the English word, it was used both literally and metaphorically. Crypto-Jews were called 'pigs' by the Spanish from the personal filth by which many of them betrayed themselves, filth which was noteworthy even in a nation that had been much influenced by the Christian disapproval of baths. One thinks of the sweet Jews from Poland who were so cruelly treated by the wicked Nazis, who deprived them of their dear body-lice and subjected the tender bodies of God's people to contact with water for the first time in their lives. That, of course, is the atrocity for which the Germans will never be forgiven. It is called the Holocaust.

Not all crypto-Jews in Spain were like the Jews in Poland and Russia and some of them, no doubt, were as clean as the Christians, but 'pig' is always a term of opprobrium, and it may have been considered especially apt for the secretly religious Jews whom the Spanish so feared because, as is notorious, Jews are forbidden to eat pork, perhaps because a pig or boar was their tribal totem at one time. There can be no doubt but that the Spanish called the crypto-Jews marranos, i.e., 'swine.' That is now admitted by everyone, including educated Jews, as, for example, in Professor Cecil Roth's History of the Marranos (Philadelphia, Jewish Publication Society, 1932), and the Jewish propaganda book, called an "encyclopaedia," published in 1973, from which I quoted.

Thus 'Marranos' is the only correct term for the crypto-Jews in Spain, and is used by extension for Jews who feign conversion to the culture of the nation in which they have taken up residence.

That is admitted now, but for a long time the Jews tried to deny that so opprobrious a word was applied to members of their race who pretended to be Christian. They accordingly spelled it 'Marano,' as in the scholarly Jewish Encyclopaedia published in 1901-1906, and derived it from some fanciful etymon, most frequently a Hebrew term meaning 'in appearance only' or the term maranatha found in the "New Testament" and of uncertain meaning.* This made possible an extension of the word to cover the fairly numerous Jews who, both before and after

* The word occurs only in the Pauline Ep. ad Corinthos, I.16.22, where it is treated as an adjective in the King James version: "If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be Anathema Maranatha." This was naturally taken to mean a particularly solemn and terrible form of anathema, and the phrase has often been used in English to mean the most powerful and frightful curse that can be laid on anyone. This fits the context and may well be right, 'maranatha' being a magic word, as were 'abracadabra' and 'hocus-pokus' before they became comical. Such expressions, which sound like words but are actually meaningless, are useful in magic, since they convey the impression that an unknown language of special power over gods and spirits is being used. And ritual cursing is made to sound more dire by the use of such portentous nonsense. Such meaningless and therefore mystical pseudo-words are common to all superstitions. The curses found written in Egyptian hieroglyphic were full of them. Excellent examples in Greek and Latin may be found in the defixiones, the curses that were written on lead tablets and buried for the instruction of the daemones of the Underworld. For an amusing collection of such curses, see A. Audollent, Defixionum tabellae, Paris, 1904. Many of the tablets have collocations of syllables like 'maranatha,' e.g., 'egdarata' and 'atracatetraca' and 'ethaëithouma,' which were supposed to put an extra zip into curses. Christian holy men have claimed that maranatha was Greek transcription of two Aramaic words that meant "O Lord, come!" or "May the Lord come!" or "The Lord is coming!" It is hard to see why the composer of the epistle should have lapsed into Aramaic at that point, but, of course, holy fakirs do odd things, and anyway, it doesn't matter a tinker's damn.

1492, evidently had no pronounced religious beliefs and prudently refrained from performing Jewish ceremonies in secret. They conformed outwardly to Christian customs, perhaps in the spirit of many agnostics and atheists today, who attend churches because that is good for business or expected of politicians, or, if they are too honest to dissemble their beliefs in that way, may conform to the prevalent superstition in such matters as weddings and funerals from mere courtesy. The Jews in Spain who thus sensibly refrained from Jewish rites were, of course, damned from the orthodox Jewish point of view, even though many or most of them worked for the eventual triumph of their race over the hated goyim, whom they had ostensibly joined. That some of those Jews, who had little or no faith in their tribal mythology, were unjustly suspected of secretly performing Jewish rites is quite possible, and it is possible that their indifference to religious myths of any kind may have exposed them to suspicion more often than suspicion was incurred by the practitioners of such rites, who were usually very circumspect in their public behavior and more practiced in hypocrisy.

In the quotation on p. 7 of my article, 'Marano' is used in the extended sense, and that is why I did not challenge it, but did challenge 'Marrano' in the quotation on p. 9 and the note I joined to it. The Marranos whom the Spaniards really hated and feared were, of course, the ones who, while pretending to be Christians, secretly offended Yahweh and could bring down on all Spain his tyrannical vengeance. And they were hated and feared the more because most of them were clever enough to avoid detection and no legal sanctions could be imposed on them.

Tired of hearing about the Jews? Well, you should have learned a little more about them before you gave them the country that once was yours, dear Aryan kinsman. They are not going to let you forget them now, not even after you have acquired the habit of automatically kow-towing every time you see a member of old Yahweh's Master Race. □

DEDICATION

To my long suffering parents and my closest political colleagues who have taught me the value of real friendship.

PART ONE: THE CONTEMPORARY SITUATION.

"The modern tyrant is evil because of his elusiveness. He is more nameless than his slave. He is not more of a bully than the tyrants of the past; but he is more of a coward."

All Things Considered

G.K. Chesterton.

Wherever we look today amongst the nations of Britain and of Europe, we see mounting evidence of disintegration and of decay. The evidence is there for all to see; it is incontrovertible fact.

On the political level we find that the worst type of individual, the self-seeking and mean of spirit, has risen to the leadership of Establishment parties and structures, and in so doing, has guaranteed that government throughout Europe, from Lisbon to Leningrad and from Belfast to Belgrade, has made corruption and treason a way of life. Politicians and party bosses, caring nothing for the people they claim to represent, are lining their own pockets by selling out their countrymen to poverty, to degradation and to hostile, foreign interests. In our land, the Thatchers and Kinnocks, Owens and Steels, are junketting around the world at our expense, receiving the adulation of a deceitful media, whilst Britain slowly but surely bleeds to death.
